TAKE CARE

when drinking Cocoa to have the pure article only, as many so-called "Pure" Cocoas contain added matter that is not only unnecessary, but often positively harmful.

CADBURY'S

COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL—Article on "Drugged Foods," June 4th, 1898—says:

"There is a general consensus of opinion that the addition of active drugs, belonging to the classes of nervine stimulants to beverages and articles of dietary in ordinary domestic use is not for the benefit of the community, and is likely in time to produce a deterioration of the public health. . . At the present moment we are beset by another danger arising from the addition of kola to certain articles of food. . . Kola has been found on analysis to contain 2·13 per cent. of caffeine. Caffeine is undoubtedly a useful drug when employed in suitable cases and in appropriate doses, but if taken habitually in large quantities it is capable of inducing an undesirable condition of over-stimulation of the nerve centres."

CADBURY'S COCOA IS ABSOLUTELY PURE, AND "A PERFECT FOOD."

SHORT STORIES

No. 575.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 6th, 1900.

A PREMATURE RELEASE.

An Incident in the History of "L'Affaire Dreyfus."

It began with one of those frequent occasions on which Skipper Saxey—a plucky little American sailor—found himself stranded in London. His tastes were too literary, and his temperament too Quixotic, for the making of a successful ship-master. He knew this, but stern necessity kept him to the calling, and providing that he came out safe in the end, he rather enjoyed the escapades into which he was so often lured. They gave an extra flavour of romance to the mystic spell of the sea; and this alone, apart from need, made him tackle a good many commissions no other sane man would have looked at.

He was striding briskly along the East India Docks one misty night, his hands in his coat pockets and the eternal cigarette between his lips, mentally figuring out how many days his £5 odd would last, when a quick, nervous step behind attracted his attention, and he pulled up.

Someone was endeavouring to overtake him, and hearing him stop, called to him by name. Saxey faced round, on his guard.

"Have no fear, M'sieur Saxey," said the unknown. "It is a friend, who wishes only to speak with you."

Saxey recognised in the figure that emerged from the fog a man whom he had seen several times lately in one or two of the usual haunts of seamen, and asked briefly what his business was.

"If M'sieur will be so good," said the other, "he will come with me to a quiet place where we can talk alone. Or, if he would prefer, we can go to his hotel."

The tall skipper looked the sallow, adipose little Frenchman up and down twice.

"I'm not afraid of you," he said, "but I take no risks in this rabbit-warren. If you've something particular to say, come on to my hotel, as you term it. I should say it's a sort of cross between a woodshed and a hayloft. This way."

A street further on the pair entered a rickety-looking public house, went up a creaking stairway and entered a stuffy little attic. Saxey locked the door, turned up the wick of an odorous paraffin lamp, nodded his visitor to the solitary chair, and waited, his whole attitude an unvoiced question.

"It is a leetle delicate, this which I must ask you, captain," his visitor began. "But I think you are not so very—er—rich?"

"Never mind my bank account," said Saxey, with a grim smile. "Let's be hearing your delicate business, and if there's any dollars in it I'm ready, short of actual murder or treason."

"I am afraid it is something like that—'treason' you call it," the other said. "You have heard of l'affaire Dreyfus?"

"Yes, by thunder," said Saxey, "I have, and what I've heard has been enough to make every man who is not a Frenchman thankful for the fact. Well?"

"Then, like so many of your noble countrymen, you have sympathy with the prisoner?"

Saxey acquiesced emphatically.

"Then my task will not be so difficult. I have heard of you at several ports, and when this—commission—was put into my hands, I thought of you at once. You are the man we want. You have at present no ship, and you are not hard to please. We have a ship waiting to take you out if you will dare the risk."

"I tumble," said Saxey. "Some of you revisionist chaps want to liberate Captain Dreyfus without waiting for the verdict of the law. It's a dangerous job, and so you want some dare-devil to pull your chestnut out of the fire."

"I don't know what you mean by tumble, and chestnut," said the Frenchman, "but you understand me, it is evident."

"Have no fear, M'sieur Saxey," said the unknown. "It is a friend, who only wishes to speak with you."

"Yes, that's so," said Saxey. "If there's dollars in the biz, I'm your man. But I must be sure of those dollars. Fixed as I am, I'll have to put my price high. The French Government's a big enemy for one man to dodge successfully. What are you going to do with Dreyfus if I get him?"

"If we can only produce him unexpectedly in Paris at a great revisionist meeting, side by side with his wife, we shall win the day," said the Frenchman. "My countrymen are very—what you call—volatile. The event would carry Paris by storm, and the scoundrels who are sheltering behind the 'honour of the army,' would instantly take flight. If you are successful, M'sieur Captain, have no fear of my Government. You will be the idol of the French people. As to reward, do not trouble yourself. Here are some bank-notes for immediate expenses; twice the amount will be handed to you when you sign your articles for the ship; and ten times as much as that when Captain Dreyfus steps on French soil."

Saxey's eyes opened wide at the roll of notes, value £400. Putting them quietly in the breast pocket of his coat, he said:

"We are agreed, sir. Shall I write you a receipt?"

"No, no," said the other. "Paper is incriminating. We trust in M'sieur's honour. Those behind me have unlimited funds."

"Indeed," said Saxey. "And now for particulars. Granted that I get within sight of the Captain's prison, how do I proceed? Have you made preparations there?"

"M'sieur is—sharp!" said the Frenchman. "Yes. Francs have value, even in the Ile du Diable. We have friends in the garrison of that hell. We have also a friend who will go with you who is the perfect image of Captain Dreyfus. It has taken us months to find this man, and weeks to persuade him, even with gold, to play the part we wish. He will go with you, and on the night when chance favours our friends and the Captain escapes to the place where you are waiting, he and the prisoner will change clothes. You will then put off, leaving him to be discovered by the soldiers, who will search for the escaped prisoner. It will be a strange experience for the double, but, of course, when our triumph comes, he will be released and recompensed. Does the scheme seem so wild now, M'sieur?"

"I must own it's well planned," Saxey said. "The sooner we get to work the better. I'll be ready to start the day after to-morrow."

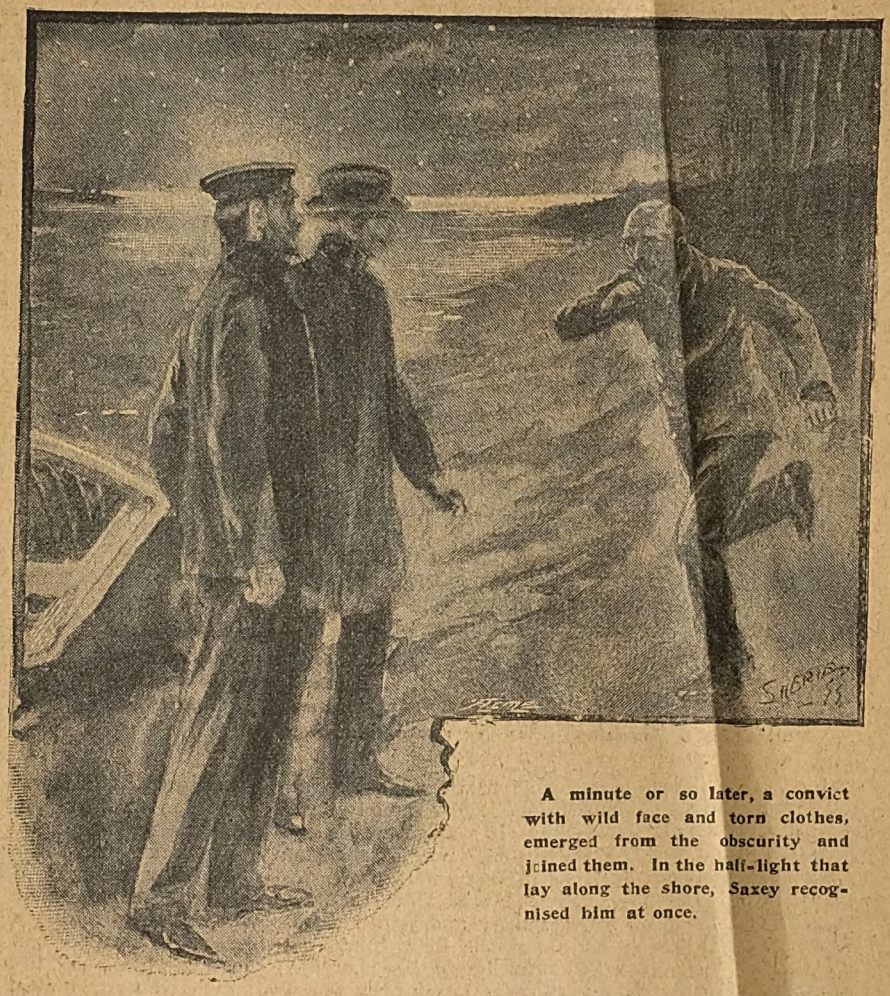
"Good," said the Frenchman, his eyes twinkling with hysteric joy. "To-night a better day dawns for my misguided country!"

With which patriotic if somewhat mixed declaration the Frenchman departed, promising to call for the skipper at the right time.

Three days later, the Juno, a small but well-equipped steam yacht, weighed anchor and stood down the Thames. Her owner, ostensibly, was M. Jules Lervane, a retired gentleman who intended travelling in the South Pacific. Skipper Saxey, her acting master, stood on the bridge in spick and span new nautical attire as she went out. He had the air of a man on whom all the world smiles.

M. Jules Lervane was an eccentric character. The Juno made a long and circuitous voyage before she entered the southern seas. Her crew was small, she carried no passengers, and Saxey was allowed to rule all and sundry with a rod of iron. The owner was seldom seen on deck except in the evenings, and was never known to land at any port, and though he and his English skipper held many private consultations over the business in prospect, it was never alluded to in the presence of any of the crew. Saxey often wondered whether they were in the know or not, and the ship's doctor—an Englishman named Watson—often aroused his curiosity for the same reason, but on this point he remained unsatisfied.



A minute or so later, a convict with wild face and torn clothes, emerged from the obscurity and joined them. In the half-light that lay along the shore, Saxey recognised him at once.

The ship routine went on with unusual smoothness, and long before the dreaded penal settlement was approached Saxey had read through all the scientific works he had brought to beguile the voyage.

At last, just as he was finishing the study of Weismann's "Germ-Plasm" for the second time, the low shores of the island were sighted. It needed all Saxey's sea-skill and native cuteness to keep out of danger for the next two days. Prying French gunboats and cruisers had to be dodged or duped, and a week went by before the Juno ventured to cast anchor on a sand spit that was hidden from view of the interior by a somewhat high bluff and a thick wood.

This part of the island was desolate and dismal beyond all description, and here it was that M. Jules Lervane was to step into the place of the convict, Dreyfus. The arrival of the yacht had of course been timed by previous agreement, and that night, or any one of the following six dark evenings, the attempt was to be made.

Four nights passed without a sign. The Juno lifted gently on the ground swell, to all appearance a deserted ship stranded on an uninhabited island. There was nothing to look at but the restless motion of the sea, the glaring sun in the clear sky by day or the silent stars by night; nothing to hear but the lap of the waves, the cries of the few sea-birds, the murmur of the breeze in the dark wood, and occasionally a faint distant cry from inland, as of some being in mortal pain.

A wailing note of more than usual intensity was heard as Saxey and Lervane beached their boat on the sand the fifth night. It was followed by the booming echo of a distant gun. They shivered when they heard it, although the atmosphere was oppressive as that of a dark oven. Saxey threw himself on the sand and ground his teeth, but neither of the men spoke.

With every nerve and sense alert they waited for the signal that should tell them that Dreyfus had escaped through the outer line of sentries. The time dragged on slowly, and Saxey, unable to read, unable to smoke, chafed under the suspense. He anathematized the dull swish of the ebb tide on the sand, the sighing of the night breeze in the dark wood, the heat, and his own foolishness; he scowled at the glorious dome of stars that twinkled down at him in magnificent indifference.

"We will leave you the dead man, M'sieur," said the officer, as a parting thrust. "Friends in Europe may be inquisitive when you return. Au revoir!"

But presently a long, low whistle, with a double rise and fall in its tone, reached them. Both sprang at once to their feet. They answered it. It was succeeded by another and much nearer sound—the sound of someone coming rapidly through the crackling undergrowth. A minute or so later, a convict with wild face, and torn clothes, emerged from the obscurity and joined them.

In the half-light that lay along the shore Saxey recognised him at once. So marvellously like Lervane was he that but for the dress of each the skipper would not have known even then which was the convict, and which the intended substitute. There was no time for ceremony or delay, so he stepped back at once for the boat.

"Be quick with your change of togs," said he to Lervane as the Frenchmen exchanged greetings. "There's no telling how soon we shall have this hornet's nest about our ears."

"We will be swift, m'sieur, fear not," said the convict, ridding himself of the hated prison garb with feverish celerity. "The alarm has already been given. You will have heard the gun. I had then been free an hour, but had not dared to make the signal because I feared that I was being tracked. Here, my friend."

It was at this moment that Fate intervened. Lervane had undressed as quickly as the prisoner, and the two men, clothed as Nature made them, were putting out eager hands to seize each other's attire, when there came a hurried trampling and crackling in the undergrowth around. A dozen excited shouts, a scuffle, and a squad of soldiers were upon them. The two unfortunates made a sprint for the boat, which Saxey already had on the move, but the soldiers were too near. Even before the lanky skipper had time to use his revolver the trio were in the hands of the enemy.

The officer of the squad, a stout, red-moustached man, whose natural joviality had been soured into a very grim kind of humour by the gruesome character of the place, looked his three prisoners up and down carefully. He was apparently nonplussed at the two Messieurs Dreyfus, and still more at the presence of the American, but gradually began to see light. The boat, and the dim outlines of the ship on the sand-spit, seemed good circumstantial evidence. Though he with difficulty suppressed a yawn—the men had been roused from sleep for the pursuit—he smiled meaningly as he said:

"It is strange, gentlemen. I come to seek one prisoner and I capture three fugitives. I look for one Captain Dreyfus and I find two, with a mutual friend. There is more than a mere attempted escape here. There is a conspiracy, there is treachery. Captain Dreyfus has friends in France, and those friends have money. They have also genius. But they evidently do not know how watchful are the guardians of the prison. Confess, gentlemen, that I am right?"

The unclothed unfortunates could only confess.

"And you?" speaking to Saxey. "I can talk English, you hear!"

"I guess you're pretty central," said Saxey sullenly. "Only a fool could help it, who uses his eyes. Yes, we've come over for your blessed convict, and you've euchred us instead. What are you going to do next? If you'll take your man back, you're welcome to him; we shall only be too glad to say good-bye. I wouldn't keep you out of bed a moment, I am sure, on my account. I know when I get to a dead end as well as anybody, and I give you my word that this will be the last time I'll set foot on this cursed spot."

"I shall take back my man, certainly," said the officer, "but which of these two naked ones is he? Perhaps you can tell me that, m'sieur? Whichever I take, I shall certainly have the other shot. Can you tell me, now, which is the real Captain Dreyfus?"

Saxey was in a quandary. Had he known which was which, he would scarcely have liked to say, and he was not sure of their identity himself now. While he hesitated the two Dromios spoke.

"I am the real Captain Dreyfus!" said the convict. "I am ready to return to my cell."

"I am the real Captain Dreyfus," said M. Lervane, the fear of death strong upon him.

"Ah! You both prefer the Ile du Diable to the Great Hereafter!" smiled the officer. "But you make things confused with such a queer agreement. I cannot wait here all night. I have an idea, m'sieur" (this to Saxey), "I cannot tell which is the man I want, nor do I care, so long as one returns with me and one is shot. With you, it is different. I do not wish to be harsh with you, if you are here simply as the tool of others. You might be missed, also, and foreign inquiries and complications are detestable. I am satisfied that if you go back alive we shall not again be troubled with you. But before I let you go you must tell me which is the true Dreyfus and which is the double.

"I'm not sure that I would if I could," said Saxey, "and I'm quite sure that I can't even if I would."

"Then, m'sieur, we must see how chance decides. So long as we get the affair ended quickly I do not mind at all which we choose. We shall be sure to secure one traitor and execute another. I love a jest so we will throw the dice for them. We were playing at sunset and I have the ivories here. You shall throw, m'sieur, unless the gentleman will save you the trouble by declaring themselves."

The two men, white-faced but resolute, reiterated their former statements. Each one claimed vehemently, to be the real and only Dreyfus. The soldiers, between their yawns, laughed immoderately. The officer shrugged his shoulders.

"You see, m'sieur," he said to Saxey, in mock deference, "I am compelled to appeal to chance. I need not say that if you refuse I shall reconsider my decision regarding you. Are you ready?"

The tall man, liberated from his captors, took the dice box with an unsteady hand, muttered under his breath, and waited for the signal. The two men were placed against separate trees some distance apart and a file of soldiers with rifles at the ready, facing each of them. The officer stood between his two files and turned to Saxey.

"Now, m'sieur, throw! High for death, low for the prison. First cast for the right hand man."

The American, after a rapid consideration of his position, complied. Unmarried, he might have faced the matter out in defiance, but the thought of his patient little wife in Philadelphia raised a lump in his throat. He rattled the dice and rolled them out on the palm of his left hand.

"Six—four—ten," said the officer. "Now for the other."

The dice rattled and rolled again.

"Five—five—ten! Sacré! Again, m'sieur."

Twice more Saxey threw the fatal dice, great beads of perspiration breaking out on his forehead.

"Five—four—nine. Two—six—eight. Right hand file, fire!" shouted the officer.

There was a sharp, unhesitating volley, a swiftly-ended cry of fear, and someone died. The other put on the convict's dress in haste, not waiting to be told. The soldiers closed round him and marched away.

"We will leave you the dead man, M'sieur," said the officer, as a parting thrust! "Friends in Europe may be inquisitive when you return. Au revoir!"

Saxey's answer to this was of too forcible a nature to be embodied in printer's ink. He picked up the body, put Lervane's clothes upon it, dragged it to the boat, and rowed back to the ship. The crew were, of course, anxious to know what the firing was about, but Saxey's strict orders that no man was to leave the vessel had been obeyed. He carried the body down to the cabin himself, curtly informing his questioners that there had been a misunderstanding with the French garrison, and their owner was badly hit. Once in the cabin, and the doctor with him, he locked the door.

"Why, the man's dead!" said the doctor, after a brief examination.

"Hush, I know that," said the tall man, stroking his chin viciously. "There's a good reason for it. But we've got to bluff these compatriots of his if we want to get away from here alive, Watson. This is not exactly a salubrious neighbourhood for our health, I can assure you. You'll read between the lines, I raps, and if you can't I might tell you some day. And the sooner we're off this ship the better. As long as they think the boss is alive they'll obey my orders like so many sheep, and we've got a chance to scoot. You'll report him dangerously ill, for the present—see?"

"I see," said Watson, and went out.

Directly he was gone Saxey turned the body over and looked at the tip of the left ear. There was a small dark mole on it, so small as to be but dimly visible in the electric light. He had noticed that once before, when its owner had ventured on deck.

"Why, man, he's dead!" said the doctor, after a brief examination.

The body was that of M. Jules Lervane. The Ile du Diable still held its famous prisoner.

THERE'S NO FOOL ✣ ✣ LIKE A BORN FOOL.

WHO has not, in a measure, committed suicide? Does not everyone kill himself, more or less. Some by too much dissipation; others by working to excess; others by making night day; others by loving those who do not love them. Means of suicide abound; one has only to choose.

I, too, have committed suicide, just like many another, not precisely to the same extent as those whose tragic end is reported in the daily newspapers, but I did what I could.

I had been sent to Paris to study art, by my parents, who were anxious that I should enjoy the advantage of the best French masters at an early stage in my career; and I had been a student in the artists' quarter for nearly two years, having become almost a Frenchman, when I first met Gabrielle, under the chestnut trees of the Luxembourg. When I saw her it was as if a thunderbolt struck me. I laid my heart, my twenty years, my scanty purse, at Gabrielle's feet.

Gabrielle made a face.

I did not notice it, because I loved her.

She condescended, however, to accept breakfast under the arbour at Viroflay, invitations to the theatre, and many articles for her wardrobe.

She gave me to understand that I would be the last of men to be loved if I did not present her with a scarf, earrings, a parasol—two, three parasols. I saw my last sou vanish.

I sold everything that I could realise, including my one and only arm-chair. I was obliged to confide the care of my watch to one of those hospitable houses which we English call "my uncle," the French term "my aunt," and which we art students baptized "the nail" with graphic simplicity.

I raised money on my books. Gabrielle also appropriated my links, my new hat, and the queen of my pipes. She had a way of saying: "Does my big dog wish to please his little Gabrielle?" which was irresistible.

When she found that I was without money, without credit, and even in debt, having vainly exhausted the resources of my imagination to extract from my parents in far-away London an addition to my allowance, she left me calmly, without a word of pity, without a shadow of shame. She was of that class of women called lioness, doubtless because they know how to consume men.

And I loved her! What despair! She had moved away, they told me, to distant, almost unexplored parts which vague and mysterious expression described the Latin Quarter, "the right bank."

I walked with grief in the shade of the garden where I had met her. How dismal it was there now! There were many promenaders, children, lovers, but it seemed to me deserted.

"My life is ended," I said with the naïveté of twenty years. "Everything is hollow. Why am I here? I can never again be interested in anything."

I resolved to die! There was nothing left to be done, but choose a suitable way to disappear.

Fumes of charcoal! That was the mode of suicide for girls.

The dagger was very much used. The dramas of the day were full of Venetian, Florentine, Arabian, Castillian daggers, Spanish dirks and Damascus swords, with which the actors killed themselves very decently behind the scenes, and even on the stage.

But I had no money to buy a dagger.

There was the rope. That was vulgar; then, too, the hanged are so ugly.

There remained poison, but what poison? Arsenic was bourgeois, very bad form. The poison of the Borgias would have suited me. Many novels spoke of it. But the recipe seemed to be lost.

Should I jump out of the window? To frighten women and bespatter the pavement! No.

Die by starvation? I had too good an appetite.

I finally decided on a very simple and economical method, one which the mild weather (it was spring) made seasonable; I would drown myself.

I neither breakfasted nor dined on the day of my suicide. I smoked my last pipe, my stock of tobacco being exhausted.

At nightfall I walked down toward the Seine. The water was black. The full moon threw on the river a silvery light. Walking at random, I arrived at the Pont des Arts and resolved to end there a life which was intolerable to me without Gabrielle. The place seemed propitious. The bridge was deserted. Not a boat. Not a lantern.

I leaned against the balustrade and looked at the water running like a flood of ink. It dashed against the piers. I breathed the night air.

"This is the last time," I said to myself, "and it is such a lovely evening!"

I thought quickly of all I was leaving, of my parents, my friends, my home in dear old dirty London, the art that inspired me, of my youth, and also of my immortal soul. I placed all these on one side, and my recollections of Gabrielle on the other, and the latter were the more weighty; they turned the scale. Tears came to my eyes.

"I must die." I murmured. "Good-bye all! One name more is about to be added to the martyrology of love."

Love! This is the holy name that a youth was giving to his miserable passion, to the absurd child's-play which was leading him to death. It is only later we learn that love lives by sacrifice, that it is the brother of hope, and that, far from killing, it gives strength to live.

I grasped the balustrade and was preparing to leap, when, suddenly, I noticed a young Frenchman standing near me on the bridge, about thirty feet away. Could one not kill himself without being interrupted? Had he come there to play the spy? No, he did not even seem to see me.

He was looking down at the water. The moonlight was so bright that I could see the details of his person and his clothes distinctly. Like me, he wore a large Rembrandt hat, a long coat, and trousers narrowing at the foot. He had a red silk handkerchief, long hair, full beard, a youthful form. He was a student, an artist, like myself. What was he doing there?

He was gazing at the Seine. He raised his eyes to heaven, passed his hand sadly across his forehead, breathed rapidly, took a few steps to the right, then to the left, stopped in the middle of the arch, and seemed to measure the distance with his eye. Was he about to commit suicide, too? Were all the young men killing themselves? The Latin Quarter would soon be depopulated.

I was vexed. Had I not selected this bridge for my personal use? Why had he not chosen the Pont Neuf? However, although the unknown disturbed me, I felt a certain sympathy for this brother in suicide. He appeared to be about my age, and perhaps similar motives had brought him there. The stranger threw down his hat, looked at the moon, passed his right leg over the balustrade. In three bounds I was upon him and pulling his coat tail.

"What are you doing, monsieur? Are you mad?"

He struggled.

"Let me alone."

I seized him around the body and held him.

"Let me alone. Attend to your own affairs. This is disgusting. What are you here for? Go away."

"But," I replied ingenuously, "I have just come to commit suicide."

"What! you, too?"

"Yes, I was about to leap when I discovered you."

He turned and stared at me.

"Ah! this is strange enough," he said as he sat astride the balustrade.

We gazed with curiosity at each other to see how men look who are about to kill themselves. He had a good face in spite of his terrible black beard.

"Love, of course?" he asked.

"Love," I sighed.

"My case exactly, love."

"At our age one seldom commits suicide for any other reason."

"Well, monsieur," he resumed, after a short silence, "since I have the pleasure of meeting a travelling companion, shall we drown together? Only let us measure our distance so as not to risk grappling in the water if one of us, governed by the instinct of preservation, should have the weakness to change his mind after the plunge is made. You know how to swim?"

"Like lead."

"Are you ready then?" he said. "Take care not to bruise yourself by striking against the pier. Stand between the piers. A little farther off—there—that's right. Count, one, two, three. At three we jump. I do not say au revoir to you, dear monsieur, but I am charmed to have made your acquaintance—too late unhappily to cultivate it. Well, I am ready."

My co-suicide counted "one—two——"

"Good-bye, Gabrielle," I cried.

But instead of counting three:

"Which Gabrielle?" demanded my unknown friend.

"She for whom I drown myself. What is that to you?"

"Gabrielle of the Luxembourg? Gabrielle who has a little black mole under her left eye?"

"Assuredly," I replied, "Gabrielle whom I love, and for whom I perish."

And I rushed forward, but he stopped me and grasped my arm.

"Wretch, traitor, felon," he shrieked. "You love Gabrielle, my Gabrielle? You have the presumption to commit suicide in her honour, when it is I who have come here to drown myself for her. You have taken Gabrielle from me! Swords! Knives! I want your blood, sir; I must have your blood!"

He danced with rage. He shook his fist.

I observed coolly that, as we were about to die, it would not be necessary to butcher each other. This seemed to him a reasonable argument. He gradually calmed down.

I learned that he was a student, that Gabrielle had abandoned him a fortnight since, at the very time I met her. Naturally, we continued to talk about her.

"Ah! my dear predecessor, what eyes she had, and what a silvery laugh! How jolly, and saucy, and fiery she was!" I babbled.

"What delightful times we had together," he replied; "at Robinson, at Viroflay! She sang like a bird. She had a rose-coloured parasol which cost me a half louis, I think."

"Yes, I know," I interrupted, "what those parasols and many other things cost."

"Well, my friend, it is evident that those gifts have been our ruin."

As one is talkative at twenty, and our hearts were overflowing, we began to discuss women in general, à propos of Gabrielle, and our love in particular, à propos of women. Our experience was brief; besides, we had perfect and decided theories which we were expounding both at the same time with lofty eloquence.

"How could it be otherwise?" philosophically concluded my rival. "She had a way of looking out of the corners of her eyes which turned me like a glove, and when she said: 'What will my big dog do to please his little Gabrielle?' I lost my senses."

"So did I. She called me her big dog, too, and it produced the same effect on me."

He smiled sardonically.

"My dear successor, I should not be surprised if at this very monent a third gentleman were not Gabrielle's big dog."

"Alas!" I replied, "you are an optimist. I am sure that Gabrielle possesses half a dozen dogs of our kind."

At this bitter thought I stove in my hat with a blow of my fist, and my rival tore his hair, a luxury which the abundance of his Merovingian mane allowed him.

"And is it for princesses of this quality," cried he, "that two good fellows like us wish to drink dirty water. That would be too idiotic!"

While jabbering we walked up and down, for the evening was cool. Just then we found ourselves at the end of the bridge, directly in front of the institute.

I spat to show my contempt for the "Temple of Classic Literature." My companion spat also, making a defiant gesture at the cupola.

"And these scoundrels of academicians, will it not delight them to learn that two romanticists with long hair have drowned themselves before their very door? Listen! the more I think, the more I believe that we ought to reflect before taking the fatal plunge. One can commit suicide but once. It is an important affair and deserves more consideration. First I should like to dine, for it is well known that wise decisions are made on leaving the table. There is an admirable restaurant near the Grande Chaumiere, which is open all night. My nurse's sister manages it. I have credit there, and can even take a friend. Will you accept?"

"Monsieur," I rejoined, "you are not a serious suicide. Go and dine. Let me drown in peace. Beside, I am not hungry."

I lied. I was hungry as a wolf, and my stomach was howling.

"My nurse's sister," continued my predecessor, "has a more abundant cuisine than can be found anywhere else in Paris. There are miraculous roasts, paties of gigantic proportions, delicious blood-puddings, juicy ham, not to speak of the fried potatoes which are ideal, the Burgundy cheese, and wine which would make you forget all the Gabrielles in the world," he insisted, ashamed of his disloyalty, and not wishing me to kill myself alone.

During this enumeration, hunger pressed me most cruelly, and I felt much admiration and tenderness for madam, the sister of my rival's nurse. However, I resisted.

"Well, monsieur, may you enjoy your dinner. Adieu."

Without paying any attention to me my companion continued:

"After the ham, the pudding, the patie, what do you say to a punch, and a fragrant pipe."

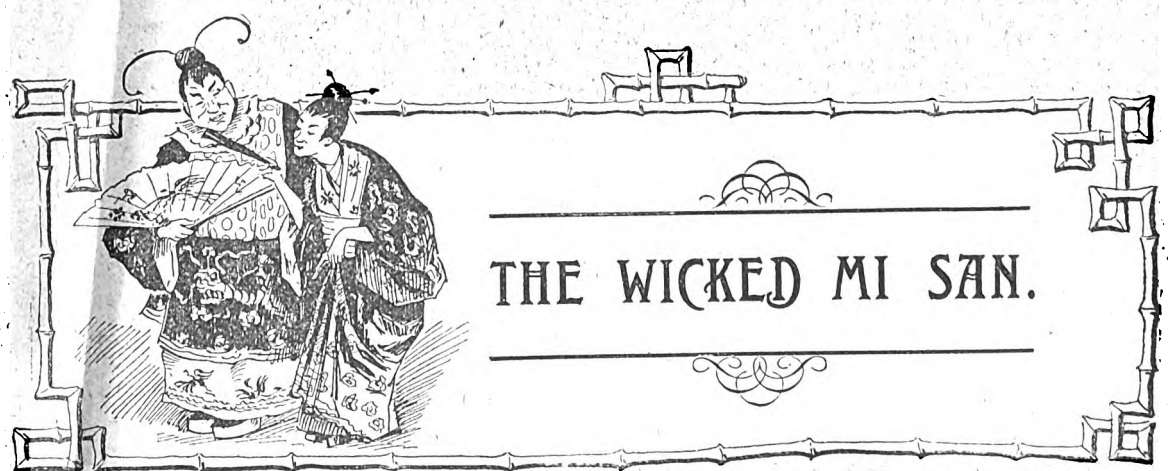
"Do you use lemon?" I asked in a feeble voice.

"Lemon? Punch would not be punch without lemon. Much lemon, my boy quantities of lemon."

With long strides, arm in arm we regained the Latin Quarter by the light of the moon.

"It is strange," I said to my rival, "there is nothing like suicide to give one a good appetite."

N. F. STUTTE.



THE WICKED MI SAN.

MR. AND MRS. CLEMENCE were going home for a year's leave—and going to take their two children with them. Mr. Clemence was a partner in a great firm of merchants who had a branch at Shanghai and had been out there for many years.

He had met his wife on one of his runs home and she had come out a year later to marry him. She liked the life out there very much. It seemed really very like England.

The European part of Shanghai has wide streets and fine buildings—the public gardens are well planted and well kept—and all along the wide boulevard by the quay trees are planted just as in a Continental town.

Then in Shanghai there is a really good cold season; in fact it is often too cold to be pleasant, and in the winter you have to wear much the same clothes as you do at home and as many furs as you can. Then in the summer you go away to a little seaside place, Pient Sin, where many other people of Shanghai go too, and you have shrimping parties and bathing parties and you all take there with you your Chinese carts and ponies—such sweet little ponies, that go so fast!

Life is by no means devoid of amusement in the north of China. In the winter the men have shooting parties and go away on the swamps further north for snipe; but if your husband is lazy or busy, that will not prevent your having game, for it is very cheap in the cold weather in Shanghai, and sometimes the market is simply crowded with snipe.

Europeans there have good, well-built stone houses in gardens, like villas at home; they keep cows and grow vegetables; the long shady road that leads to the Bubbling Well is like nothing so much as the London Road from Brighton through Preston Park; the houses and the gardens are just as good and just as large, and thoroughly comfortable. There are a few European shops, not very many, but of course you can order anything you want, to be sent up from Hong Kong by the weekly mail steamer.

Mrs. Clemence bought silks and furs from the dealers in Shanghai to take home—most lovely embroideries and sable skins. The Russian fur dealers take off the sable tails and sell the remainder of the skins to Chinese dealers for absurdly small prices, and Mrs. Clemence had an evening cloak lined with sable that would have cost a fortune at home. People out in these distant colonies always talk of "home," as if it were a Paradise, yet when they come back they miss the clear, blue sky of North China and the innumerable comforts they have left there and which cost so much more to procure in England.

The Clemences had looked forward to and discussed this leave, for more than two years before it came off. One difficulty was about servants on the voyage. To-to, the little girl of three, was so devoted to her Chinese amah; and yet what on earth should they do with her in an English house? To-to would make herself a nuisance on the voyage if she did not have Mi San, there was no doubt of that. Baby was really too little to care.

"That's all very well," said Mr. Clemence, "but how do you know Mi San will go to England? It is a dickens of a way from all her people."

"Oh, of course she will," said Mrs. Clemence, carelessly, "all the Chinese think it a very swell thing to have been to England."

"Well, take her if you like," said her husband, "but I warn you the Chinese sometimes turn very nasty when they find they are really away from their own country, and with only 'barbarians'—as they call us—about them."

Mrs. Clemence sounded Mi San about going and was surprised to find she had no enthusiasm on the matter at all—it was only after counting up on a Chinese counting-board, the number of dollars she would have collected together by her return, that she said she would go, and then it was in a depressed and doubtful manner. She took To-to for her walk that afternoon along to the Bubbling Well, near where there were seats under shady trees, and where the nurses of the neighbourhood met their friends.

Mi San's friend was the English baker's young man, who delivered the loaves every morning in a neat little hand-cart, painted red. Him, she was going to marry, when their united savings allowed of it. His name was Ann Ling, and he was a very good specimen of the stalwart Chinese of the Yang-tse-Kiang. To him Mi San confided her fears at going away across the wide seas.

"Fool that thou art," said Ann Ling, who was not polite. "Why fear? This England of the barbarians is only like the Rock of Hong Kong, but further off. 'Tis because their own land is so poor and small that they come to China. There is nought to fear, we are of a better race."

"It is not thus, however, that they speak," said Mi San, unbelievingly. "Often will the men tell to To-to of the beautiful land across the sea, and say this is a miserable country."

"Why, then, are they so desirous of living in it?" said Ann Ling, with some reason. "First they take one bit, and then another; I tell thee, Mi San, never were their eyes gladdened by so fair a land before. In all ways do they seek to please the Emperor. Myself have I seen a stone in the country beyond Tientsin, on which it is graven, that in the year of the Great Famine, the barbarians paid many lacs of tribute, long owing. Wherefore should they do this? Theirs is but a poor country, and it seeks a small piece of the Heavenly Empire. Be not afraid to venture forth, take of their dollars as many as can be got, and bring them back to the Flowery Land."

Mi San was much strengthened by this grand language; still she did not like going, but it was her duty to obey the counsels of her future husband, so that evening she told her mistress again that she was willing to go.

"This will save us ever so much bother, Henry," Mrs. Clemence said joyfully; "the children are so accustomed to her, and she is really very useful to me, myself."

"That's all right," said her husband, who was thinking much more of the sale of his horses and letting of his house, than of nurses and babies.

So it was all arranged, and soon the day came, when the big Messageries Steamer was waiting down at the mouth of the Yang tse Kiang, and the launch that goes up and down the twenty miles of the river to Shanghai, was to start from the quay. It was the weekly excitement, seeing all the lucky ones off, giving them flowers, and fruit, and cakes, and packets of tea for the voyage.

All the travellers were very joyful, even To-to, who appreciated highly the bustle and fuss; only Mi San was very sad, as she went on board the launch all alone. Her relatives lived in a farm-house ten miles away, and Ann Ling could not leave his work in the middle of the day to say farewell. True, last night he had presented her with a beautiful bun, on which her name was marked in currants. The launch puffed away from the quay. the whistle blew, and the crowd on the wooden platform waved excited farewells. Then the travellers threaded their way carefully through the many ships moored in the river, past two Russian gun-boats, two British cruisers, a German man-of-war, and loads of small schooners and trading vessels.

But Mi San's eyes were blinded with tears; she saw nothing of the bright June sunshine, She sat huddled up in a corner, of the saloon and paid no attention to To-to's talking. Mrs. Clemence did not see her, she was outside on the deck of the launch, with her husband and the baby, and much too full of her own concerns to care for Mi San's feelings. The stone farm-houses peeped out of the fruit-trees all along the river, and queer little houses, with the corners of the roofs turned up, stood on the edge of green rice-fields—the country all down the sides of the lower part of the Yang-tse Kiang is very well cultivated. It took them about four hours to go down the river, and then alongside the great mail steamer. The Chinese forts at the mouth of the estuary looked strong and solid.

"How easily they could blow us up," said Mrs. Clemence to the Captain, who was French, and did not quite understand her.

The ship had started from Yokohama and was pretty full, but Mr. Clemence had taken their berths some time before, and had secured two good cabins, one for himself and his wife, and another for the amah and the babies, with a skylight opening on to the deck, where the Chinese passengers spent their days. A strong smell of stale fish and opium and Chinese cooking came down this, but Mi San liked it, and thereby felt her spirits revive.

"There are many, very many Chinamen on this ship," she said to herself: "it is not only I, alone, who sail away from my dear homeland."

At the children's meals there were two other amahs one a fat and solid old creature, who said nothing, going only as far as Hong Kong, and the other a person about Mi San's own age. Chinese food was given them for their meals. Mi San had never seen a big ship before, but she showed no surprise at anything; she was contented enough, she sat on deck most of the day playing with To-to, and nursing the baby, and Mrs. Clemence congratulated herself often on having brought her with them. Down the coast on the right hand, was the rugged shore of China—bare grey rocks that made the foam of the waves fly as they struck against them. The sea was rather rough, as it usually is in the Chinese waters, but the ship was a large one, and the motion was not too unpleasant. In about two days and a half they sighted Hong Kong, and steamed into the harbour under the shadow of the Peak. It was tremendously hot here, in June, with the open sea-breezes shut off by the cliffs. A lot of the Chinese passengers got off, but still a lot more came on for Singapore. Mi San, looking over the side, rejoiced, because she thought they were coming to England; at supper she said so to the other amah.

"Oh no," her friend answered, "they get off, as I do, at Singapore. No true Chinaman goes further than Singapore this way, save only a few merchants and ricksha men to Colombo. Then, for months after, you will see no Chinese—no face save only the round eyes and red hair of the barbarians."

This she said out of malice, for she was jealous of Mi San's chance of going to Europe. Mi San went away silently; something seemed to rise up within her and say—"Only once do you live, O Chinese maiden! What good do your dollars do, when you are perchance killed and eaten by these barbarians—when the rocks in China are left far away and you go to the dark Island in the sea?"

Her friend missed no opportunity of impressing on her mind the true wretchedness of England.

"Even tea will not grow there," she said; "the English have their tea from China, miserable red-headed devils that they are! The ones you see in China are improved by the light of that favoured land; in their own country they are savages. You may count on your ten fingers the women of China who have been there and lived to return."

So a great terror grew up in Mi San's heart, and increased daily till they reached Singapore. In the early morning they steamed slowly into the harbour, with the great forts towering down. Past the red and green islands dotted about the Straits, where the red earth is as red as in Devonshire, and where the continual daily showers make the most luxuriant vegetation in the world. Here Mi San summoned up courage to tell her mistress she must return to China, she could go no further away.

Mrs. Clemence was very angry, indeed. She had found the use of Mi San on board ship, and knew the difficulty she would have in getting a suitable person at a day's notice.

"It is impossible, quite impossible," she said. "I will not let you go—if you go off this ship I will tell the policeman to take you, and I will give you no money to take you back to China."

Mi San cried, and implored her to let her go back, but she was too timid to go off the ship without leave, and in the evening the ship sailed again, like a great inexorable Fate that carried her away, whether she wished it or not. A sullen gloom fell on Mi San; nearly all the Chinese had left the ship—her friend, the other amah, had spoken truth; no doubt, in all other things also she had spoken truth, and never would Mi San see the flowery land again.

She was silent and miserable, but she did her work, and To-to toddled by her happily, wherever she went. They went up the Straits of Malacca, and stopped at Penang. Mi San looked at the Malays in the boats, that crowded round the mail steamer, with disgust, these men were not Chinamen; a few Chinese here and there could be still seen, but they were much fewer in number than at Singapore.

"Soon I shall see them no more," Mi San said to herself, "we are already many days from China."

A growing hate to Mrs. Clemence filled her heart—she watched her mistress talk and amuse herself on deck, and for every light word, she hated her the more.

It had been a very hot day. The last point of Sumatra was fading away on the horizon, dinner was over, and all the passengers were lying about in long chairs on deck; some playing whist or piquet, and some too lazy to do anything at all. Only the soft rush of the great steamer through the water was to be heard. Suddenly, a faint splash was heard—then another—but they were not loud enough to be noticed, had not a sailor called out "Child overboard!"

All was changed in a minute. The cry was caught up from one to the other, whistles were sounded and bells rang—not least, the heart of every mother on board stood still with fear. Mrs. Clemence seized her husband's arm.

"Henry, the amah," she whispered, a dreadful prevision of what had happened seizing her heart.

"I will go down and find the babies at once," he said, "don't anticipate evil, dear."

But she came with him, and together they hurried below. She went straight to the children's cabin, where only an hour before she had seen the two sleeping, so securely. Now, there was no one there!

Mr. Clemence rushed out again, calling Mi San—there was no answer; his wife stood in the cabin, stunned, unable to think, almost unable to feel. By degrees, the other women, whose children were safe, gathered round and tried to rouse her to action. One of them, a Mrs. Findlay, turned over everything in the cabin, in the vain hope of finding some clue to the tragedy. Under the mattress of the upper berth, nearly dead, she found the baby. To lift him out was the work of a minute—a few seconds more, and the poor little creature would have been beyond all help, for the amah had evidently done her best to suffocate him.

Of To-to there was no sign, and the dreadful fact soon dawned on everybody that the amah had first thrown the child out of the port-hole in the passage, and then jumped into the sea herself. The square opening of the nearest port-hole had been lifted, and the wide open space was large enough to easily let pass the slim figure of the amah. The ship was stopped, and for two hours boats were out searching for the bodies, but the quest was hopeless from the first. There is a very strong tide in the Bay of Bengal, that sets to the south, and on the dark waste of waters, the two bodies—the murderess and her victim—may have been carried miles in a very short space of time.

So, in the middle of that miserable night, the ship went on, carrying with it the mother, who vainly longed to share her child's fate herself.

NANINE.

"Oh! what shall I do? What shall I do? What shall I do?" This was her tragic voice; Nanine could not help it. It was part of her nature, even when quite alone to use her stage tricks.

She threw herself on the sofa in the most affecting attitude, and looked volumes in the fire. She had a way of looking; she would say "good-bye," to a friend, and look as if to say: "I love you. Oh! how I love you! When shall we meet again in this sad world? Perhaps never!" In all probability her thoughts were: "Oh what a duck of a hat! It would suit me better than you too; I wonder where you bought it."

Now, however, her flippant little soul was stirred. There was a sickly smell of flowers which annoyed her. She went over to the table, and taking a huge bouquet of lilies—trophies of last night's success—threw them in the fire.

"Faded!" she shuddered. "They were fresh last night. The heated atmosphere of the theatre makes them die quicker. The atmosphere is stifling!" She clutched at her collar as if she felt the sensation then. "Am I faded?" She walked over to the long mirror. "Am I faded?"

The mirror showed her a slim, fragile figure, with a pale oval face, surrounded by quantities of brown, wavy hair, and the eyes that looked back at her—well, every leading paper had written many a paragraph about them. Nanine was the star actress—Nanine was the rage. Every little amateur actress aspired to be a Nanine, and was so, too, in the eyes of her fond relatives. "Nanine brown" was the colour of the day, for hair and everything else.

"Yes, I look pale; two fainting fits to-day—I must take care, Harold said so. He's always looking after my health, but then he lives so near, and well—if he only had a practice! If it were not for Lord Borrodaile, if Harold were not so——"

Nanine marry a penniless student! Nanine, who could pick and choose among the peers of the realm; who could be "my Lady," ten times a day if she chose!

A bell sounded; she threw herself on the sofa in her most becoming style, when "Lord Borrodaile" was announced. She just gave him time to get the full effect of her pose, to see how delightful she looked in the fire-light. Then, with a well-bred little start, she rose and welcomed him. "How nice of you to come! Sit down." She waved to a seat.

Lord Borrodaile was enchanted. It was the same voice and the same look she used with her lover in Act IV. of the new play. She pressed a bell; he expected a fairy to appear, but a very ordinary parlourmaid came instead. "Tea, Martin."

Tea was over. Lord Borrodaile was fidgety! Nanine wished he would go. Yes! he was titled, rich, handsome, but he bored her, and she wished he would go. He had never called in this tête-à-tête way before. It was a distinct failure. It came at last with a gasp.

"Nanine, I love you! You must know I love you."

He had studied this speech, he had seen similar ones in novels, he had noticed in her love scenes that this was the usual style of the lover. There was something missing in his tone. Nanine with her quick instincts knew it. It felt like rehearsal. Lord Borrodaile watched her.

"Nanine, may I call you Nanine?"

She smiled. "May I call you Nanine?" Why, the call boys and scene-shifters said it among themselves; the walking gentleman said it to her face.

"See, I do not hurry you; I dare not suggest as yet a ring." He caught her by the hand. "But this for the moment, answer me to-morrow night." He slipped a heavy gold chain on her wrist, kissed her and was gone.

She shuddered. It was cold that chain and heavy. A chain, too, with a padlock; where was the key? She tried violently to take it off, it was too tight. "He has the key." She gave a hollow little laugh, "I wear the chain, how cold it is!"

"Victorious!" Borrodaile hugged himself with delight. She had not promised to marry him, but she would, of course. Why, hundreds of mammas were angling for him all over London, suburbs and country—Borrodaile of Borrodaile Towers, with ancestors dating back centuries. Nanine! why no one even knew her parentage. True, she was beautiful; beauty fades; he had never looked upon it in that light when contemplating his own good looks, though. Only an actress! actresses were the fashion. Fashions change and she was clever enough to know it.

At his club they had guessed Borrodaile's little game and betted high stakes, too, that he would not win. "Nanine will surprise us all some day—disappear with a penniless boy—these southern natures are always impulsive, romantic, don't you know."

Borrodaile had devised a plan; he would win, and they should know of his victory, and had trotted down to his club full of it the day before. "See this?" he held up the massive gold chain. "Look well at it, stake your last sou, Nanine will wear this to-morrow night. Go down to the theatre, look, if it is so, know I am accepted."

It was agreed. Borrodaile booked the stage box. The more he thought of it the more delighted he felt. It had been a grand idea, he knew well the size of her slender little wrist. On opening the chain it would go on easily; closed, it was far too tight to pass over the hand. It had been made on purpose with a tiny padlock and key—nothing else would open it. To a lady with her lady's maid always within reach this would be no inconvenience. That he had kept the key was of course an accident. The mechanism he had not explained to his friend; all is fair in love and war. A scrap of conscience left over perhaps from his youth made him feel rather mean.

An Italian organ woman was playing one of the latest tunes outside the stage door of the theatre. Nanine, emerging from her carriage, directed her maid to give her some money. She was always good to the poor. Italians appealed to her, for was not she born on Italy's sunny shores! The woman watched her till she was quite out of sight. She was olive-complexioned, with marvellous eyes, almost as fascinating as Nanine's. She counted her gains, and evidently well-satisfied pushed the organ up a side street, and leaving it in the charge of an acquaintance, made her way to the gallery door and patiently waited to be admitted.

In her dressing-room Nanine rested. She looked beautiful in her white satin and diamonds, but beneath the rouge there was a distinct pallor. Elise detected it.

"Mademoiselle, take a glass of champagne."

"No, thanks."

"Mademoiselle will faint; two faints to-day already. You worry over this chain. Monsieur—hem! Mademoiselle. Mademoiselle's friend will give her the key—one turn it will be open."

Mademoiselle did not hear, she was deep in thought.

"If he will marry me in spite of all, I will accept him; yes, I will tell him all, and then——"

"Overture. Ov-er-ture, please."

Nanine mused on.

"Overture, ladies, please. Beginners for the first act. Be-gin-ners, please."

Oh! how that call-boy worries! She started up.

There was a polite knock at the door.

"They are ready for you, Mademoiselle Nanine."

It was the stage-manager's voice.

"Mademoiselle!" Elise ran forward with the smelling salts. Nanine was nearly off again. "Mademoiselle Nanine, they are gagging."

"Let them gag."

She pulled herself together and swept out of the room. The orchestra struck up.

She always entered to music in this play. It was one of her small weaknesses, and the author had arranged it to oblige her.

A loud burst of applause greeted the entrance of Nanine.

The woman in the first row of the gallery became excited. In her excitement she stood up and that created a disturbance. She was blind and deaf to all save Nanine, who, on her entrance, carrying masses of costly white flowers, looked radiant. The woman flung something over the rail. "Sit down, will yer." She was roughly forced back in her place. "What are yer thinking of? Flowers? Who wants your flowers? Lidies don't throw things at gentlemen's bald heads a-sitting in the stalls. If yer wants to send them, give 'em to them music chaps. They'll hand 'em up, or behind the scenes" (with a loud laugh) "if yer that intimate."

Her flowers were useless; they had struck an elderly gentleman at the back of the stalls. He had momentarily started, then fixed his attention on the play once more. And the tiny bunch of Neapolitan violets, to which a note was attached, had fallen unheeded. It was a touching play. Between Acts I. and II. there was a wait, in which handkerchiefs were in vogue.

The Italian woman closed her eyes, the tears slowly welled down her cheeks. It was not of the play she was thinking, but of the past. Scene after scene returned. It was cold; with aching arms she was turning her organ; at her side was a child, a little dark child singing and dancing. A gentleman came up, talked, and gave her some coppers. He seemed interested in the child, inquired where they lived, and called. Then all was arranged. He would take the child, have her trained. She would be famous. There was only one condition—the mother must keep out of the way. He would pay her return passage to Italy if she liked. Out of the way she must go. To see her would interrupt the child's education—would ruin her career. To ruin her career, well, if that was her intention, she could keep the child. It had been a struggle.

The big drum of the orchestra disturbed the reverie of Nanine's mother. The curtain went up. Nanine was discovered surrounded by flowers. How ethereal she looked, again in white, this time soft white draperies, no jewellery save a heavy gold chain which gleamed on her white arm. She was softly singing to herself. Suddenly there was a catch in her voice. Consternation, great consternation! Nanine had fallen forward. The woman in the gallery rushed from her seat. Resistance was fruitless, in a moment she had gone.

On the green room couch lay Nanine; on one side stood Lord Borrodaile, Harold Methuen on the other, Elise bending over her with smelling salts; at the foot, much perturbed, was the stage-manager.

The door opened suddenly; in rushed the Italian woman. There was a start of surprise. Only Nanine, slowly opening her eyes, exclaimed, "My mother." They made way for her.

Lord Borrodaile looked at the stage-manager; the stage-manager looked down, but no contradiction was written on his face. My lord gave a low whistle, and departed.

"I must be off," said the manager. "Any medical aid required?"

"Only what I can give," answered Methuen.

The play continued; the understudy had reached her goal. Nanine was again unconscious.

"Don't move her, Elise," said Methuen, "put her things together; by the time the carriage comes she can be moved."

Elise withdrew. The patient roused. "Flowers all faded. The chain! take it; I don't want the chain. It's cold, it's heavy." She opened her eyes. There bending over her stood her mother and Harold Methuen, hand in hand.

She raised herself. "The cue, prompter; quick, the cue."

Harold bent over her. "I love you, I love you."

She rubbed her eyes. "Yes, cue, love."

"I love you with all my heart."

"Curtain, quick, curtain."

"No, dearest, this is the beginning of the act."

She looked from him to her mother in a dazed way, and then recognition came.

"Not acting, it's real all real. Oh, I am happy now."

Hunted by Baboons.

A Story of the Wheel in South Africa.

I.

WELDON and May came down to the breakfast room of the little hotel at almost the same moment, and together revelled in the cool fragrance of the early morning.

"I vote we start at once," said Weldon, "In this bracing air we should make Cape Town easily by lunch time."

"I don't know about that," May, who knew the land, answered. "It's not more than forty miles, but you know, as we near the bay, the roads are pretty rough travelling—any amount of hills, and our South African roads are not laid out, like those in old England, to tempt wheelmen. We'll be doing well if we get in in time for a bath before supper."

"Whew! You must expect to walk half the way?"

"That's about it," said May, "but never mind, it's the finest scenery in the world."

"H'm, that's rather a tall order. I suppose, now, you couldn't scare up a lion or something to make the scene more interesting. This is my last day's ride, you know, and, really, you ought to dig out something sensational, something South African."

"Far too far south for lions or big game, old man," said the Afrikander. "We may sight a deer or so, but I can promise nothing more hair raising, unless you care for baboons. There are a few bands of them between us and Cape Town, I believe."

"Monkeys? 'Pshaw!" said Weldon, "they're beneath notice. I did hope to meet a lion in the path. Ah! breakfast."

The young Afrikander and his visitor, an old chum from home, were quickly out after a good meal to overhaul, like experienced riders, their bicycles before starting on their last day's ride before the latter's return to England. May frowned when he discovered a big Kaffir busily cleaning his wheel, without orders. A Kaffir is not usually skilled in cycles, and more apt to mar than mend when he ignorantly meddles with them. May pushed him aside roughly, and the next instant, as the Kaffir faced him, made a dash for him.

"Hold him, Weldon," he cried, and at the shout there came running the Dutch landlady and other black servants from the roadside inn. The Kaffir, however, was slippery as a snake, twisted out of May's hands and dashed into the woods about the hotel like a fox.

"What was the matter?" cried the surprised spectators.

"The rascal!" cried May. "That fellow worked in my father's store in Cape Town, and is wanted for theft. I don't suppose he will come back, but, if he does, there's a reward offered for him at police headquarters. What was he doing with the bicycles?"

"He clean for baas," a servant volunteered, but May and Weldon examined their machines with some anxiety. It is not a good thing to have one's wheel cleaned by rascals, when a long lonely ride on a rough little-travelled road is in front. But the young men could find nothing wrong.

"He had no time," said the landlady reassuringly. "He only knew this morning the baas were here, and asked me which way the baas were going. He went to the baas' wheels to clean them, but I sent him to his own work, and that was only ten minutes ago. So the rascal had no time to hurt them."

"Oh! He knew I was here, did he?" May asked. "Did he see us last night?"

"When the baas paid the bill before going to breakfast this morning."

"There's something funny about that," said May to Weldon, as they rode away together in the glorious morning. "If the beggar saw me he must have recognised me, and one would think would keep out of my road. His was a daring robbery with assault on the watchman, and I'd certainly hand him over to the police if I caught him. Fancy his impudence! Starting to clean my bicycle."

"To tamper with it," said Weldon. "That was his game, I expect—perhaps to be revenged on you, but more likely——"

Pastimes.

"What?"

"Well, you say it is a lonely rough road. Perhaps your Kaffir would have liked us to walk when our machines broke down, especially as he saw you pay the bill, and knew you had money on you."

"I didn't think of that," said May. "However, no harm is done—he didn't have time."

They sped away, their knapsacks on their backs, at a good pace across a lovely country, and, in the bright morning air of that wonderful climate, soon forgot all about the Kaffir thief. For a while, after leaving the inn, the road ran smoothly and on a fairly level grade round the broad shoulder of a mountain.

"Fairly good road," said May, "but it makes our way much longer. Across the mountain would shorten it by two-thirds."

"The usual path for foot passengers I suppose, but rather impossible for wheelmen," said the other. "Now we're coming to a bad piece."

As one approaches Table Bay from the inland, great mountains guard the water. Through these are numerous passes, called "Kloofs," and, while the scenery along them is of the grandest, they are hard roads for cyclists to tackle.

The riders were now well into the hills, and the Englishman found to his disgust, that he had to spend as much time pushing his bicycle as in the saddle. The sun, also, was now noon-high, and the friends grew silent, mopping their brows, as they climbed the winding roads of the Kloof.

At one of these ascents, May dragged a long way behind, and Weldon reached the top far in advance of his chum. He sat down to rest and enjoy the shade of a tree, and as he threw himself on his back, he glanced at the surrounding country.

It was a comparatively bare spot he was on. The woods ceased for a space, and a stretch of moorland spread broadly out. This was dotted with big black and grey fungus-speckled boulders, and seemed a dreary waste.

Weldon cast his eyes over it before he lay down, lighting his pipe, and saw no manner of living thing.

A minute afterwards he raised his head, and the pipe almost fell from his mouth with surprise.

Sixty yards away, on a big rock, sat a queer-looking man gravely observing the stranger, and remaining absolutely still. Weldon looked from his right where the queer figure had so suddenly appeared to his left, and there also on another rock sat another strange looking man, as grave, as silent, as motionless, observing him.

Weldon looked from one to the other, and his glance surveyed the open space at the back of, and between, these apparent sentinels.

On a large flat-topped rock sat in a silent row, about a dozen similar figures, all very grave, all very observant, the steady gaze of every one of them concentrated on the bicyclist. Weldon was a little short sighted, and he rose to his feet, putting on his eyeglasses to study these strange people more minutely.

"They don't look like the natives—either Hottentot or Kaffirs. Surely they can't be the dwarf Bushmen."

Then his glasses dropped and he threw back his head with a loud laugh.

"Baboons!" he cried. "The ugly rascals—that's certainly one against me!"

At that shout, the little conclave on the rocks was greatly startled and there at once commenced among them such an indignant chattering as might have been in a decorous meeting of church elders, disturbed by a rude intrusion. The sentinels scampered from their posts to join in the general discussion, and many of the almost human monkeys began to grimace at Weldon angrily, and shake their paws threateningly.

But this made him only laugh more loudly. Their jabbering rage seemed so futile and ridiculous. A cheeky little member of the band suddenly ran out in advance of the rest, and with a gamin-like expression of contempt and anger picked a stone from the ground and threw it at the wheelman.

The rock in the hands of a stouter and older baboon might have hit Weldon, but the cheeky little ape's arms were not yet muscular enough. The missile fell short. Still the accuracy of the throw delighted the Englishman, who had never thought that monkeys of any species could attack in this way. He cried out, laughing:

"Good for you, you young scamp, but you must do better if you want to learn to play cricket. Like this, you know."

Lost in enjoyment of this unexpected fun with the baboons, he did not notice that May had come up the hill, and was now looking on with suprise.

Weldon stooped to pick up a fair sized pebble, and, before May could jump forward, crying out "Don't!" the Englishman had hopped a moment on one foot, and let fly the stone with skilful arm.

It was, in its results, too well thrown by far. It caught the unfortunate monkey, who had thrown the rock, fairly in the neck, and he toppled over like a ninepin, and lay quite still.

Weldon was astonished and remorseful at the success of his throw; the little prone figure looked so human and helpless.

He turned to May with a laugh, but was surprised to see his friend leap for his bicycle, and to hear him call out:

"Come on; you've done it now; let's get out of this!"

"What's the matter?"

"Come on! Don't you know a band of baboons are fearless when together and angry? They have been known to drive away a lion, and we haven't even a revolver between us. Come on! See, they're after us!"

Weldon looked at the group which he had found so grave and silent.

Now they were wildly chattering, crying out, and lamenting over the senseless body of their young comrade.

Suddenly, they formed together, and, with a series of great bounds and running, now on all four paws, now on two, they charged on the two friends.

Rather frightened at the consequence of teaching a baboon how to throw, Weldon jumped on his bicycle, and, just as he did so, the baboons resorted to their favourite weapon, and, seizing here and there rocks of large size, they discharged a volley of them after the fugitives.

The stones fell all about the riders; one struck May's front wheel and almost capsized him, but they themselves were unhurt.

The road now wound down a hill, which was too rough and steep for more than cautious riders, but, urged forward by the cries of the baboons and the continued stone-throwing, the friends dashed down it at full speed.

"The brutes are following," yelled Weldon, as a rock grazed his head, and, looking back, May saw that, with incredible swiftness, the pack were bounding behind, never ceasing their revengeful cries, and their artillery fire of stones.

But the cyclists gained.

The road turned sharply and shut them from the view of the monkeys, and then they came to the foot, and, to their disgust, saw yet another steep hill rise in front.

Still the yelps of the baboons sounded in the rear.

"Put your back into it, old man!" yelled May, and the two young men rushed down the last few yards of hill with such speed that the velocity gained carried them up the ascent.

Stooping low they worked the pedals with all their might, but half way up the wheels began to wiggle-waggle, and they had to jump off.

"Push on!" cried Weldon, shoving his machine ahead.

They were still, however, far from the top when the raging and vindictive baboons came chattering to the foot of the hill, and uttered a sort of triumphant screech as they sighted the enemy.

The brutes bounded up the hill in pursuit, with great cunning seeking a shelter from retaliation in the trees and bushes of the roadside.

By leaps and bounds they gained and soon the stone-throwing recommenced, and now both men were struck more than once, blood flowing from a cut in Weldon's head.

"The demons!" he gasped. "They're more like savage men than brute beasts!"

"I wish you'd realised that before you disturbed them," his reproachful comrade grunted.

At last they were at the top, and a declivity again stretched before them, just as the stones came down in a shower. The vengeful apes seemed to have no idea of relinquishing the chase. The riders sped down at break-neck speed, and now they thought they were fairly and safely away. The road twisted and wound. Before long they were out of sight, and soon after the yelps of the pack sounded more faintly.

"Thank Heaven!" cried May, who was a little in advance. "That was a tight hole."

"I'll know better another time than to meddle with a pack of these monkeys!" Weldon gasped. "Halloa!"

They were turning a corner at full speed, the danger behind rendering them blind to any in front. As Weldon cried out, May ran up against an obstruction, and was pitched far over the handlebars, a good ten feet, into some bushes by the wayside.

There was no possibility for his friend to escape; he was scorching directly behind, and the descent was steep.

He struck the obstruction and his chum's bicycle together, and, like an arrow sped after another, he also shot through the air and lighted behind May. There, hidden by the bushes, they lay still and senseless.

Immediately, from the other side of the road, where the wood was dense, a brutal black face, with wide yellowish eyeballs peeped out, listened for a moment, then leaped to the two lifeless men, and began to rifle their pockets.

It was the same Kaffir who, in the morning, had been almost caught by May—the man who was wanted in Capetown for assault and robbery. Excited by the sight of the gold which May had shown when settling the hotel bill, disappointed in tampering with the wheels, he had been in time to tie a grape vine taut across the path, with almost fatal results to the white men whose bicycles lay smashed in the road.

The Kaffir rogue lost no time in searching his late master's pockets, but he had hardly begun to do so when he was arrested in the act by a strange tumult up the hill. Fearful of capture he left his prey, and ran across the road to his former hiding-place.

He was not half way across when a huge old grey baboon, far in advance of the others, bounded round the bend, a big rock in its forepaw. It saw the Kaffir and, with a scream of fury, discharged the missile.

The stone struck squarely between the robber's eyes, and he sank to his knees, stupefied with terror and blinded with blood. In an instant the pack came up, yelping, and immediately they set upon the unhappy wretch, stoning him until he was a shapeless heap—quite dead.

They sniffed about him for a while, apparently seeing no difference between him and the one who had thoughtlessly killed their small companion, and at last, chattering triumphantly, they went back, satisfied with their revenge.

When the two wheelmen at length came to their senses, the lonely road was very quiet and still. They soon learnt what a swift and dreadful punishment had befallen the robbing Kaffir, whose stone-surrounded black body, battered almost beyond recognition, lay by the side of the grape vine, witness of the man's attempt to kill and steal.

The bicycles were useless, so they had a long silent walk to the nearest station of the mounted police, where they told of their escape from the baboon pack, and still stranger escape from robbery and murder.

OLD PHILLINGHAM'S DAUGHTER.

WHEN poor old Phillingham pegged out there was a general feeling amongst us that something ought to be done for his daughter. Masters suggested that she should be "finished" at a boarding-school, but the bare idea of Roma going through the mill of a polite education roused our ire.

"Why you'd break her spirit, spoil her temper, and ruin her figure," cried Bob Owen, "Roma's not the girl to endure intellectual, any more than physical stays let me tell you."

Masters agreed with a whimisical shrug, and tentatively put forward proposition number two.

"Was there any profession or calling for which she could be trained. She has a splendid voice, and a face like hers would make a fortune on the stage."

"I don't like the idea of old Phil's girl becoming an actress," said Owen.

"Has she any artistic taste? You've seen more of her of late years than I."

"Oh, as for taste, she wouldn't be her father's daughter without it, but I don't know that her talent lies in any special direction. I don't think she'd make a successful painter, for one might as well expect a blackbird to pipe to order, as for Roma to conform to rule."

"But, my dear Owen, she'll have to do something."

"Exactly, but the question is, what will she do?"

There was a long pause. Masters looked sarcastic, Owen frowned, and the rest of us gave vent to our feelings by wishing ardently that Phillingham had deferred his decease for a year or two at least.

"Best speak to the girl herself," said Sketchley at last. "Roma has plenty of sense in that pretty head of hers, and she'll make up her mind in next to no time."

"If it's me you're talking of," interrupted a sweet voice with a touch of the brogue, "I've made it up already, and thank you kindly."

"My dear child, how did you come here?" asked Owen anxiously. It was raining cats and dogs, and of all nights the most unfit for a girl to be out.

"Walked," said Roma laconically, stretching out a slender foot, shod, as we mournfully observed, in the oldest and most shapeless of shoes.

"I'm wet," she added, slipping off her cloak. "I want a good warm, a comfortable chair and a cigarette."

"But Roma—" commenced Owen reprovingly.

She checked him with a sudden movement, clasping her hands on his arm, with a pleading expression on her sweet upturned face, curiously childlike in the firelight's glow.

"I know what you are going to say, Bob, and in the words of Punch, take my advice and 'don't.' You surely wouldn't have me stay all by myself, and eat my heart out in the darkness. I always went everywhere with Dad," with a little catch in her voice, "rain or snow, it never stopped me. Why should it now?"

After that there was nothing more to be said. Bob settled her in his favourite chair, Masters packed her up with cushions, and Sketchley, with the gravest air possible, handed her a cigarette.

"And now," she said after a bit, "suppose you all go on where you left off. I believe you were talking about me?"

"Quite right, my child," said Sketchley, "we were just discussing your future."

"Come to any conclusion?"

"Well, as a matter of fact, we decided to refer the question to you."

"So I should think," laughed the girl. "At seventeen if ever, one should have views of one's own."

"Are you only seventeen, Roma?"

"Why, Bob, you ought to know. Haven't you taken me out every birthday ever since I could remember?"

Bob said nothing but I noticed a queer expression in his eyes as he bent to make up the fire, which set me thinking.

"But I am getting away from my subject," continued she. "So far as I can understand, you are all wondering what is to become of me, now—now that I'm left alone."

"We thought, Roma," broke in Masters eagerly, "that if you would choose a profession or calling—painting—singing—anything you prefer, you couldn't do better than study at it for the next two or three years."

The girl nodded—"And I suppose you meant to send the hat round for the exes, didn't you?"

"Well, my child," said Bob, "and surely we have a right to look after our old friend's daughter."

"I'll never dispute that," she answered in a low tone, "only," raising her head with a bright smile, "I'll have to be looked after in my own fashion."

Masters groaned.

"What mad nonsense are you after now?" he asked testily.

Roma glanced at us all under her lowered eyelids, then taking the cigarette from her lips, she answered from a cloud of smoke:—

"I'm going to be a model."

"The deuce you are," said Masters. "I won't consent to any such preposterous nonsense. What do you say, Owen?"

But Roma smiled in a sort of confident fashion, as Bob prepared to answer.

"You won't go against me, will you?" she asked.

"I can't give an opinion yet," he replied gravely, "it is not at all what I was prepared for."

The girl flushed, and a mutinous glance crept into her eyes.

"I didn't think men were so mean-minded," she said, the scornful emphasis bearing witness that women in her estimation were on a decidedly lower plane than the lords of creation. "Here, I have sat to all of you ever since Bob painted me a wee mite of three years old. Why," she added proudly, "I don't believe that anyone of you have sent out a figure painting for years, that did not owe its eyes, hair, hands or feet to me. Is it true or not?"

Somewhat abashed we were constrained to admit it was.

"Exactly," she replied, "and yet now when I propose to adopt as a profession what as hitherto only been a pastime you all looked shocked and groan. I don't suppose you'll treat me any differently when you pay me for my services than when you had them gratis."

"Well," said Masters slowly, "if you'll undertake to limit your connection to your father's friends, it might perhaps be managed."

Digitized by Google

"Not a bit of it," laughed Roma, "my father's friends shall always have first call on me, but it's impossible to suppose that they could find sufficient work to keep me genuinely employed all the year round."

"In that case, Roma," said Masters gravely, "you will practically place yourself on a level with a professional model?"

"Well, why not?"

It was difficult to explain exactly why. The girl was so utterly fearless, so innocently unconventional, that it seemed impossible to tell her that by adopting such a calling she would in the eyes of Mrs. Grundy at all event lose caste.

"As to terms," continued the girl composedly, "I shall accept neither a penny more nor less than the usual rates for a first class sitter. Half a guinea a day."

"Come," she added, as none of us broke the silence, "don't be cross. Can't you see how impossible it would be to let you, any of you, pay for me for the next two or three years? Charity, even when bestowed most lovingly, is still charity, and I will have none of it."

"But, my dear, where will you live. Who will look after you?"

"I shall keep on a room in our old lodgings where as you know, the landlady has always been most kind."

"If it's me you're talking of," interrupted a sweet voice, with a touch of the brogue, "I've made it up already, and thank you kindly."

"Well, if you must, Roma, I suppose we can't stop you."

But that didn't suit Miss Wilfulness at all. Having achieved her point, she now set about to win our approval, and so well did she succeed, that the younger half of us, at any rate, were convinced of the propriety of her plan before the evening was over.

Mis Roma was at length in a high state of delight. How charming she looked with her wonderful red gold hair, dark eyes, and lips scarlet as the poppy in the corn. After a while she sang to us some wild gipsy melody, that she had caught up from a Polish fellow who used to hang about the studio.

At last Bob insisted it was time for her to go, and, pout as she might, he carried her off. I can see her now as she stood at the door, the cloak half falling from her shapely shoulders, a cigarette waved defiantly towards us. repartees, and jests upon her lips until the last.

"What a beautiful child it is," said Masters with a sigh. "And what a lot of suffering she's got before her."

"What an idea, pain and Roma can never go together. She's as lighthearted as a bit of thistledown."

"So says youth, with its crude experiences, and immature judgments. She's but a child now, and before she passes into womanhood, she'll have to love, and unless I'm much mistaken she'll take it very hardly."

Afterwards Masters' words came back to me with a curious pang.

Somehow or other things settled themselves very much as Roma wished. We tried to limit her connection as much as possible to those who had known her father, and were, therefore, acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and succeeded fairly well in so doing. Sketchley constituted himself a sort of chaperone in Bob's absence, and used to turn up most days to fetch her home from any of the studios where she might be engaged. Bob, by-the-bye, had gone off on a sketching tour to the south of France, whither he proposed to return the following spring.

I rather think Roma missed him more than we suspected. She had always looked upon old Bob as a sort of second father, though when you came to think of it, he was not so fatherly—as to years—after all. He was only thirty-eight, but somehow or other, his grave ways, and quiet, self-contained manner made him appear a regular middle-aged sort of buffer—who had left his youth far behind him.

As to his pictures, they were just the very sort that you would not expect a man like Bob to produce. Insensibly one presupposed him a painter of half lights, peaceful landscapes, placid cows moonily munching in a field of daisies. It was nothing less than marvellous that his conceptions should be so vividly dramatic, his colouring so daring, his technique so unconventional.

Bob had been gone about three months when Roma told us that Philip Tremaine, the well-known R. A., had asked her to let him have some sittings.

"It's a great compliment, isn't it?" she said. "You know he wouldn't paint anybody whose face is just the least bit out of drawing. How thankful I ought to be that my nose runs straight to the end of the chapter, instead of flying off at a tangent in 'mid-air,'" and she stroked that well-shaped feature complacently.

"You don't seem so very pleased," she added, surprised at the quietness with which her announcement was received.

We were all assembled at Sketchley's, the poor chap didn't boast a studio in the proper sense of the word, but did his work in a large attic with a sloping roof, but a strong north light.

Anyway, it was good enough for him to turn out some first-class black and white work, which ought to have won him more recognition than it did.

"Well, you see, Roma," said our host dubiously, "Tremaine is rather a corker, 'always hung on the line,' so to speak, and therefore with a lofty contempt for those unfortunates who're 'skied,' or left upon the floor. None of us know him—except Bob—and he's not the sort of man one could call upon sans cérémonie."

"I don't see what you're aiming at, Jack," said Roma.

"My dear," said Masters, who by virtue of his having two or three girls of his own, always spoke with a certain authority, "if you sit to Tremaine, you'll be going right out of our set. After him I fear we shall appear very small beer indeed. And we don't want to lose you, Roma."

The girl tossed her hair from her eyes with a quick, impatient movement.

"If you think I'm such a cad as that," she exclaimed, "you'd better have nothing else to do with me."

The door banged, and there was a sound of light footsteps flying down the stairs.

"She'll come back again presently," said Sketchely composedly. "I'm doing her head for The Crayon and Roma never breaks an engagement."

Sure enough in about an hour she reappeared. All traces of temper vanished, as sweet and charming as only she could be. Nothing more was said of Tremaine, but a day or two after I met her just outside his studio. I'm not an observant fellow as a rule, but I couldn't help noticing that she looked prettier than ever, and that her costume—always tasteful if a wee bit careless—was put on with more attention to detail than she usually bestowed. Gloves perfectly fitting, and wonderful to relate buttoned straight, shoes as dainty as the feet they covered.

"Why, Roma," I exclaimed, "this is indeed most wonderful. I don't remember to have seen you for ages in a pair of gloves."

"Don't tease," she interrupted. "I'm bound to look tidy at Mr. Tremaine's."

"H'm! Since when have you honoured your artistic friends by the prefix of 'Mr.' Mostly you appear to forget that they possess anything but nicknames. I fully expected you to allude to the great R. A. by this time as Phil."

She flushed a little under my gaze.

"He's different from all of you, silly boy," she said and ran up the steps.

We didn't see so much of her as usual for the next month, and when she did look in it was usually only a very hurried visit. It happened that I was the only one at that time to whom she was sitting, and save for the two or three hours a week that she spent in the studio I rarely saw her.

Somehow or other she eluded us. Sketchley tried to corner her, as to the neglect she showed her old friends, but she answered in a fashion so unlike herself—the careless, charming, brilliant Roma we all knew, that no further reproaches were attempted.

"Jack," she said with a thrill in her voice, "you don't mean it, you can't mean it, that you think I have grown forgetful, ungrateful to you all. Why, I should be the basest girl on earth if that were so."

She had grown quite white, and there was a suspicious brightness about her eyes—Roma's eyes that were the home of laughter.

Of course we all declared we didn't mean it, and Sketchley called himself all manner of hard names for having suggested such a thing. All the same we felt that in some subtle way Roma had changed, though we were none of us clever enough to discover how.

And then one day a man of the name of Cavendish, a friend of Owen's, but a stranger to most of us, threw an unwelcome light upon the subject.

"Haven't I heard you chaps rave about old Phillingham's daughter," he said as he pottered round Sketchley's attic.

"Rather," said Jack, "most perfect face you've ever seen."

Cavendish listened with an amused smile.

"I heard that she was sittting to some of her father's friends, but I was a bit surprised to learn that she was one of Tremaine's models. I was up there the other day," he went on, "and had a little chat with her. She's a charming girl as well as a beauty."

No one spoke, and he glanced from one to the other in a puzzled sort of fashion.

"Why don't one of you paint her portrait for the New?" he asked.

Sketchley turned abruptly from his easel.

"We've all painted Roma so many times that I fancy she's a bit tired of our style. Wants a change."

"Ah," said Cavendish, "well Tremaine is certainly a change. All the same I should try and persuade Miss Roma not to put all her eggs into one basket."

None of us commented on what Cavendish said, but Sketchley voiced the general feeling, as, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, he remarked, later:

"I shall write to Bob to-night. It's time he came back."

Meanwhile Jack Sketchley bestirred himself in an unusual, and mysterious fashion. He took to denying himself to his friends, working like a fiend at all hours until I grew quite worried with trying to imagine why he did it. At last, however, I arrived at the solution of the mystery.

"I've been doing a lot of work lately," he said, "really good work, not your wretched pot-boilers, and I've received a commission from The Easel to illustrate a series of articles on Egyptian art. It appears that Tremaine is a great gun on that sort of thing, and I've a letter of introduction to him. Do you care to come with me to present it."

Needless to say I went, and never was I more supremely conscious of the great gulf that lies between the "elect" of art, who sit in high places, and worship—if at all—luxuriously in her temple, and the sweepers and cleaners thereof, who labouring sorely, reap no reward but love.

We were ushered into a delightfully cool oak-pannelled room, leading into the studio. It was evident that the great R. A. had forgotten that we were waiting, for he continued his conversation with some one we did not see.

Judging by the tones of his voice he was speaking to a woman, doubtless young and pretty, and to whom he seemed to be making love. It was an uncomfortable position for us, and, presently Sketchley rose, and drawing back the curtains, which separated the room we were in from the studio, prepared to enter.

Suddenly he drew back, and after a moment I did the same. Philip Tremaine was standing by the window, holding the hands of a slight young figure in his own. As we looked he deftly slipped his arm about her waist, and drew her to him.

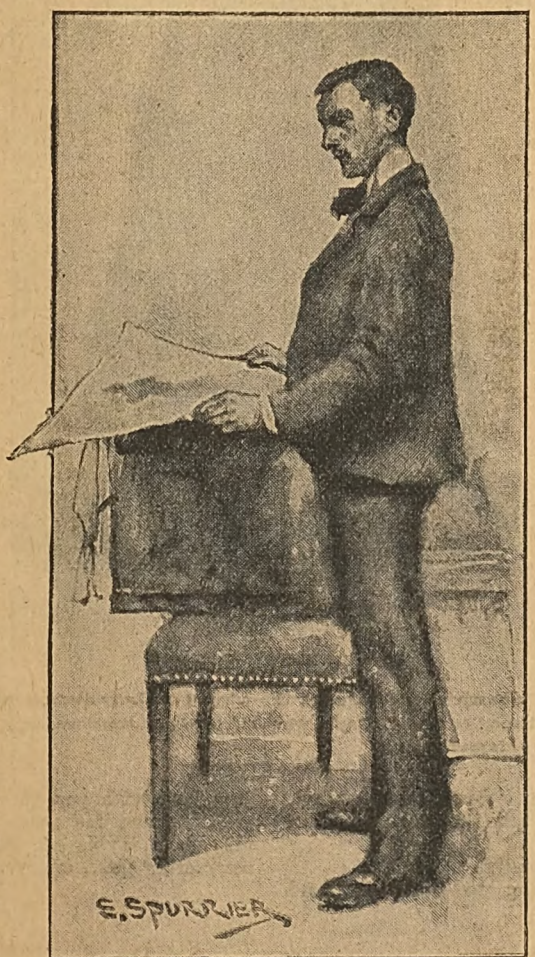
"No, no," she cried faintly protesting. But even as she spoke she yielded, and we could see the hot blood dye her face as he stooped and kissed her on the lips.

"You love me, sweet?"

"Ah, so much," and then she broke from him, and hid her face behind her hands.

"Roma," he whispered, "Roma," and Roma, wilful, head strong Roma, came at his call. A minute later and a sudden influx of visitors—a party of fine ladies—swept into the room, from thence into the studio, and we followed.

Tremaine received us with his usual charm of manner, and was especially gracious to Sketchley in spite of Jack's determined stiffness. As for the women they surrounded him in a moment and compliments, delicate and flattering, sounded on all sides, enough indeed to turn a stronger head than Philip Tremaine's.



"Haven't I heard you chaps rave about old Phillingham's daughter?" he said, as he pottered round Sketchley's attic.

All this time Roma stood aloof, waiting as in truth we waited, for him to introduce her to his friends. Some of the women stared at her in a supercilious sort of fashion, others criticised her with a well bred air of insolence. One in a loud tone of voice asked, "If she were a model," and advanced to inspect her as a curiosity.

Roma stood her ground quietly, conversing in an undertone with Sketchley and me, and apparently taking no heed of Tremaine's neglect.

"Are you coming, Roma?" I asked after a while. "Jack and I are going now."

"Yes," she said, "I will come."

She advanced quietly to Tremaine and said something, what, I could not hear. I caught however something of the reply.

"It's not my fault, Roma, indeed I could not help it. If only you were not a model."

It was a very silent walk home, neither of us had the heart to talk to the poor child, and Jack seemed too indignant after she had left to do more than swear fiercely under his breath.

That evening Bob came home and as of yore, most of us turned up to see him. A sudden violent ringing of the bell disturbed us, we glanced at each other.

"Sounds like Roma," said Masters, and Roma it proved to be.

She went straight up to Bob, her slim figure looking pathetically childish, her big eyes infinitely sad.

"Bob," she said simply, "will you please send me to school, as you once promised? I'm tired and I don't want to be a model any more."

It was some three years later when I next saw Roma Phillingham. She had more than fulfilled the promise of her youth, and was the most perfectly beautiful woman I have ever seen. All her waywardness had vanished. In the brilliant woman of the world there was no trace of the charming little Bohemian we had all spoiled and petted.

She made her début under the wing of old Lady Scarlett, a distant relative of Bob's, who had taken an immense fancy to his protégée. The beautiful Miss Phillingham, her face, her voice, her admirers were the sensation of the hour. And none so persistent, so admiring as the great R. A., Sir Philip—he had lately been created a Baronet—Tremaine. We used to talk over her triumphs, and speculate as to who would be the lucky man. Needless to say Sketchley and I never referred to the scene in the studio, but somehow or other I fancy Bob had an inkling of it and how matters stood in that direction.

One night I dropped in on Bob for a chat, and found him regularly down in the mouth. He was studying a society paper which I remember contained a rumour of Roma's engagement to Sir Philip. He put it down as I entered, but didn't seemingly want to talk, so we smoked in silence.

After a while he remarked casually:

"I see our little girl's going to make a grand match. I hope Tremaine is worthy of her, but I doubt it."

"Most people would consider her very lucky," I said. "I suppose it's certain she's accepted him?"

"Nothing certain in this world, dear boy, except rent day," said a mocking voice.

"Roma," I exclaimed.

She laughed and turned to Bob.

"I've come back again, you see," she said; "airs and graces and all. You won't send me away, will you?"

Bob rose and laid his hand upon the bell.

"I'm going to send for a hansom," he said calmly, "and pack you off at once. Go, will you, and see to it, there's a good fellow."

I went obediently, returning some few minutes later with the intelligence that the cab was at the door. As I entered—the room was in shadow save for the flickering fire light—for the moment I could not discover where Miss Roma was. After a bit my vision, mental as well as physical, grew clearer.

Roma was kneeling by Bob Owen's side, her head upon his shoulder.

"And you really want to know why I refused Sir Philip's offer?" she asked softly. "It's a foolish, and I'm afraid you'll think it a very selfish, reason."

"Well?"

In the dim light she drew nearer.

"I don't want to marry him," she answered, "because if you don't mind I'd rather marry you."

"Roma——"

"Oh, Bob, Bob," she cried, "my darling, let me stay here with you for ever."

He opened his arms and like a tired child she crept into them, laying her head upon his heart. Henceforth her resting place for ever.

JOHN K. PROTHERO.

She made her debut under the wing of old Lady Scarlett, a distant relative of Bob's, who had taken an immense fancy to his protégée.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of H. E. Dudeney's popular novel, "Hagar of Homerton," to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. H. Cawte, of Frimley Road, Camberley. Attempts for this week's prize may deal with any subject, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 8th. Post-cards only, please.

Their Proper Place.

A FEW days ago two or three reservists belonging to the Guards (all friends) were about to rejoin their regiment at the depôt, prior to their departure for South Africa.

They arrived at the local station just as the heavily laden train was about to depart.

"Hurry up," roared the guard, in deep stentorian tones, from his van which was next the engine. "Hurry up, you'll have to come in here with me, there's no room anywhere else."

"Never mind about that," replied they altogether "Everything's just right. Here we are altogether, all Guards, all in the van, and all at the front. Hurrah!"

A New Metal-Polish.

THE other day a lady discovered her servant-girl trying to clean the fender with a copy of Short Stories.

"Bridget!" exclaimed the astonished lady, "whatever are you doing with my paper? You know I only bought it this morning."

"Oh!" replied Bridget, "you said that it always brightened you up, and so I'm trying it on the fender."

He Returned Them All.

THEY had quarrelled, and the high spirited girl said, as she handed him a package: "There, Mr. Ferguson, are the presents you have given me. Now that all is over between us, sir, there should be no reminders of the foolish past."

"You are right, Miss Keezer," he said humbly, "and I suppose I must return the gifts you have presented to me."

"I never gave you anything, sir, that I remember."

"Indeed you did."

"Sir, I——"

"Miss Keezer—Katie!" he exclaimed, with something that sounded like a sob, "I value them beyond everything else in the world! It would break my heart to return them, but there is nothing left for me to do."

"Will you kindly tell me, sir, what you are speaking of?"

"I am speaking, Katie, of the kisses you have given me! They are not mine now. It is my duty to restore them. Forgive me, darling, but I cannot go away without——"

"Oh, George!"

When the clock struck eleven, about three hours later, George was still returning them.

Pricked Their Victim with Pins.

IT was at a tent meeting held some years ago.

During a lengthy address one of the audience had fallen asleep, leaning against the side of the tent.

He suddenly awoke with a yell, and used strong language, to the amazement and horror of the hearers.

It was afterwards found out that some boys, who were outside, seeing the bulky figure pressing against the canvas, had probed it with pins and produced this amusing incident.

A Good Way of Getting Even.

A DUBLIN tramcar the other day was the scene of an incident that fully deserves immortalisation, if only to illustrate the natural keenness of wit and kindness of heart possessed by the lower classes in Ireland.

The car was hailed on O'Connell Bridge by a countrified looking girl, very like a farm servant in search of a city place. She got on to the step and coolly demanded of the conductor:

"Change for half-a-sovereign, please."

The man looked at her open-mouthed, and was preparing to deliver a volley of indignant abuse, when his expression suddenly changed; the innocent confidence of the country girl had evidently given him an idea.

"Who tould ye to ask for change?" he said.

"A man at the crossing," answered the girl. "He told me just to stop the first tramcar I see, and ask for change, and they'd give it to me, aisy."

"Where's your half-sovereign?" demanded the conductor.

She gave it, he counted out the change, handed it to her in silence, and started the tram as she made for the pavement again.

"I'm even with the mane villyun, whoever he was, anyway," commented the conductor, and the passengers looked as if they would have liked to clap.

An Army Contract.

PASSING along Princes Street, Edinburgh, one day, a herculean Scots Grey stopped at the post-office, and called on a street arab to polish his boots. The feet of the dragoon were in proportion to his height, and, looking at the tremendous boots before him, the arab knelt down on the pavement, and shouted out to his chum across the roadway:

"Jamie, come ower an' gie's a hand; I've got an army contract."

Proofs of Madness.

A HULL lady went to a doctor to consult him as to her husband's sanity.

"What proofs of madness has he given?" asked the physician.

"Last night," she replied, "he ate a pie large enough for four men, then he went to the kitchen and kissed the cook."

"That is nothing, madam," said the doctor. "Had he kissed the pie and eaten the cook, the matter would have been serious."

Why Neighbour Jones Couldn't Gather Them.

IN a certain Sunday-school, the teacher was endeavouring to explain that a man could not expect to reap if he never took the trouble to sow.

"But what he does sow he will reap," he continued. "To make matters plainer I will ask you a question. If I planted turnip seed, what do you think I should get?"

"Turnips!" shouted several.

"Right!" said the teacher.

"But it doan't allus come off," put in one precocious youth. "It didn't wi' neighbour Jones."

"Indeed," remarked the teacher.

"Yis," went on the bright scholar, "'e sowed some taters a little while ago, but 'e ain't reaped none."

"Well, perhaps he's gathered them."

"No 'e ain't gathered 'em."

"Well, dug them up, then."

"No, nor dug 'em up naythur."

"Oh, I see," smiled the teacher. "The potatoes are not ready yet. He will gather them by-and-bye."

"No, I doan't think as 'e will," persisted the scholar.

"Why?" asked the puzzled teacher.

"Why, you see," responded the other calmly, "we gathered 'em when he was in town the day before he was going to."

The "Waits" Remuneration.

LAST Xmas day the vicar of a certain village near Birmingham received a visit from the village "waits" who provided a rich (?) treat outside the vicarage for about an hour.

On the following morning the leader called to receive the remuneration. He was shown into the vicar's study, and he at once began:

"Sir, I am the leader of those 'waits' who paid you a visit last night."

"I am glad you have called," said the vicar.

"Yes," beamed the other, "we thought you would gladly remunerate us for our performance."

"What!" exclaimed the vicar, "you have come for money! Why I thought you had come to apologise!"

Collapse of musical director.

The Representative of Death.

A VIENNA paper relates an amusing incident which happened to a great lady just recovered from a long and severe illness. Seated in her boudoir, she was looking over the cards of condolence that had been left with her.

Among the names of counts, barons, and other aristocratic sympathisers, emblazoned with coronets and coats of arm, she came upon the plain card with the simple inscription of "Herman Berger." In vain the lady asked who Herman Berger was. The servants could not give her any information than that the individual had been a remarkably handsome young man.

The lady's curiosity was excited, and she gave orders to admit the person in case he should call again. The order was punctually obeyed, and on the next day she received a really charming young man, dressed in exquisite style, who evidently felt greatly embarrassed at the honour of a tête-à-tête with the still charming, though somewhat faded, beauty.

"I can hardly find words," said the lady with a blush, "to thank you for the sympathy you have manifested for a stranger."

"I beg your pardon, gracious lady," stammered the dandy; "but I am the agent of Messrs. A. and B., the undertakers."

Not a Sack!

AT a certain builder's yard in Glasgow, it is the custom to pay the men their money in little bags each week.

One Saturday, the master told Pat, an Irish labourer, when paying him, that he should not require his services any more.

On the following Monday, as the master was going round the yard, he saw Pat at work, as usual.

"Hullo, Pat!" said he; "didn't I give you the sack on Saturday?"

"No, sir," said Pat; "shure it was the same little bag I've always had."

Pat's services were retained.

A Flattering Testimonial.

A VERY eminent London surgeon, one of the lights of the profession, one day observed a gentleman knocked down by a runaway horse. He went to his aid and found he had broken his leg. It was only a simple fracture, but the man was badly hurt.

The surgeon used his umbrella as a splint, and with his own hands borrowed handkerchiefs, bandaged the limb tightly, put the patient in a cab, and drove to the nearest hospital. There they were received by a young medical student.

"You've bandaged this pretty well," said the youth patronisingly.

"Not at all," said the other.

"I suppose you've been attending some ambulance class. They say a little learning is a dangerous thing, but the little you've learnt you've put to good account. I can't give you your umbrella now, but if you leave your address it shall be sent to your house."

"I had better give you my card," said the eminent surgeon. And he did so.

THE REAL STORY ABOUT KETTLESHAM.

WHEN the members of the No. 2 touring company of The Hidden Hand—a drama in three acts and several scenes—heard that the agent in advance had been ordered to Kettlesham, and that they were booked to play at the dreary colliery town for a fortnight, they experienced feelings which they were careful not to express.

It had been arranged that they were to proceed to Bray-bridge, but Bray-bridge had been the scene of a mining disaster, which, as it had plunged the whole community into gloom, rendered it, for their purpose, impossible, or at least inadvisable. Kettlesham was the substitute, and Kettlesham excited emotions amongst the histrions that were the reverse of pleasant.

It was not the town so much as the theatre that they objected to. Few people are so superstitious as actors, and there was scarcely one who had played there, who had not, all unknown to the audience, been hampered by a foreboding of disaster that at least on some occasion had been realised. Tales of suicide, of foul play on the stage, of accidents in the wings that baffled explanations, of a hundred-and-one untoward things had centred round the building, and by mere dint of repetition had come to be believed.

No doubt had it been possible to trace these stories to one common source they would have been dispelled. But then as nearly every "pro" had a different tale of disaster, with a different explanation, this was impossible, and the stories grew and grew until at last there was probably not one touring company who did not hold the place in dread. Certainly if that company existed it was not The Hidden Hand Company No. 2.

Its members, however, did not express their feelings. On the contrary, they were loud in their scorn of the thing that caused them.

"We shall get to the bottom of those ridiculous yarns poor Grimsby's suicide set afloat even if we do play to empty houses," the heavy man remarked. "Really, it's time such preposterous rot was put on the shelf."

"As you say, dear boy," the light comedian assented, "they're quite rot, of course. But I always understood it was Milly Langdon's extraordinary death that gave Kettlesham its reputation."

A lady member of the troupe interrupted fiercely:

"Milly Langdon's not dead. I met her before we left town. She's quite well, and married, and living in the suburbs."

"It's the same thing," the comedian retorted wholly unabashed, "anyway, she disappeared."

"And," continued his corrector, "I always understood it was Mr. Keighton's collapse there that made peopl think the place funny."

The heavy man and the comedian shrugged their shoulders at this new schism. Both were prepared to confute it on the clearest possible grounds, when the leading lady—a person of great dignity and some importance—imparted a new tone to the discussion.

"In my opinion," she announced angrily, "these stories are very discreditable to the dignity of the profession. I've no patience with anyone who can repeat such rubbish. It's my firm belief that the whole thing has its origin in too much drink," and with this, a hard knock at the heavy man, and her week's salary, she flounced out of the room, plainly discomposed, and plainly angry with the others for making her so.

But, the leading lady's protest notwithstanding, the discussion continued. All the members of the company save two were present, for it was treasury day, and only the leading lady had been paid. As each member had a different explanation, and as they each insisted that theirs was the right one, the debate would have probably been indefinitely prolonged, had not the arrival of the absent member of the troupe, Sidney Transome, ended it.

Transome was a man held in peculiar respect by his brother histrions, more probably because he had that quality so rare among actors—reserve—than from the fact that he was of a higher culture than their own. It was a habit of the company's to refer matters in dispute to Transome's arbitration. Now they sought it eagerly.

His arrival was the signal for an instantaneous rush in his direction, and a universal demand for his decision as to which was "the real story about Kettlesham." But on this occasion his confreres were to be disappointed; and for once his reserve was broken down. For no sooner did he hear the name of the town they were to play at, than his face changed—changed so suddenly, and indeed so awfully, that the men about him were silent. For a moment he stood with his hand to his head, the next he turned sharply on his heel, and without a word walked out.

Then The Hidden Hand company No. 2 drew their salaries, this time in silence. Transome's face had shown them what they all felt—dread.

* * * * *

Whatever was the cause of Transome's inexplicable conduct, which the leading lady was understood to have referred to in tones of severe censure, he played his part the first night at Kettlesham with a verve and force that captured the audience and astonished his brother actors. As a rule, the icy restraint that marked him out in everyday life hung on him even on the boards, and cramped his powers. Now he had flung it aside, and for once did himself justice.

And this perhaps was just as well. For the actors, men and women, were in a state of hysterical nervousness and boastful self-assertiveness that rendered their performances inept. The contagion of panic had seized them the moment they had seen that Transome felt afraid, and panic held their souls firmly now.

All except one—that was little Alice Etheridge, or if she felt afraid she disguised it cleverly. She alone played up to Transome's lead, and betrayed not the least sign of nervousness. But then as she had but a small part, and was not generally considered of any importance, her example did not inspire imitation.

Still, except for bad acting, things went without a hitch, and the performance over, the histrions' spirits recovered wonderfully. At the bar matters were discussed excitedly, but this time reassuringly. The relief from the tension through which all had passed found expression in loud talk and strong assertions, the heavy man being particularly in evidence.

"I always said," he remarked, "that the thing was pure nonsense, and ought not to be discussed. Only if you remember Transome insisted on doing so. Transome, I consider, is wholly responsible for the needless anxiety which some of our ladies have been suffering to-night."

And Transome being absent, this was the general verdict.

"But," said one of the ladies in question, speaking in a whisper that was still reminiscent of awe, "they say it always happens on the third night, don't they?"

The company became instantly indignant. To tell the truth the reminder that there were eleven other evenings of anxiety to go through was the pin-prick to their bladder of joy. And they were all correspondingly angry with the person who had given it.

What was it that happened on the third night, they asked, and if the lady did not know, why had she spoken? In fact, the protests her innocent remark aroused were so violent as to cause her to tremble. Finally, it ended in the formation by the heavy man and the leading lady of a league—which was instantly joined by everyone present, "For the Suppression of Superstition in the Profession," and by the retirement of the timid lady in a flood of tears and an opera cloak.

Despite this courageous conduct, however, the members of the company felt by no means comfortable. And, indeed, they had some excuse for the fact that they looked forward to each performance with secret dread. To act a part, even for the hundredth time, and to act it well, requires a large amount of self-control, and nervous energy under any conditions: to act with the momentary expectation of something dreadful happening, of the silence of the audience being broken by a shriek, or of hearing a cry from the wings, is a trying experience indeed. To do so for several nights in succession is even more so. And the result was that the nerves of the company were worn to fiddle strings.

The leading lady became "indisposed" and her part—that of the heroine—had to be played by Alice Etheridge, while the heavy man fell back on alcoholic support to a greater extent than before. Even the stage-manager became affected, and on several occasions deserted his post, with the result that supers walked on and off at wrong moments.

And yet the thing, the calamity, the disaster did not take place, and as night after night went by even the fear-stricken actors began to think that, as they had loudly asserted, "nothing unusual would happen."

But happen it did though not the third, or the fifth, but on the last night of the run.

It was a woman who caused it, a woman who had been introduced behind the scenes that very night. She was known to some of the company as a girl who had been on the stage and had left it "for something better," as she said—(the "something" being marriage). That evening two of her old comrades had met her in the town, and brought her to the theatre, and during the last act she had stood in the wings watching Transome's performance.

Now behind the scenes is, while the play proceeds, a busy place, and the members of the company were far too much occupied with their own affairs to notice that their visitor had consumed during the evening more liquid refreshment than was good for her, or that towards the end of the piece she began to display marked excitement.

They had in fact forgotten her when the catastrophe happened.

It was at the end of the final scene—the scene in which the hero, parted from the heroine by a series of impossible events claims her for his own, and it was while Transome was delivering his last speech that it happened.

"A man's wife," he said, "should be the finer spirit of his life, through which the grosser filters only to be purified anew. She should never—she can never—leave him. In all he does, her spirit should abide with him—in his struggles that he may win worthily, in his hopes that he may plan nobly, in his defeats that they may teach him. And the spirit that lifts should guide him also. She should be a shield to cover him, a star to guide him, and a fire in his heart to urge him on, and that woman—my wife——"

Scarcely had he said the words than the audience saw him drop the heroine's hands sharply, and following his eyes, saw that another figure had come on the scene—the figure of a woman, who swayed unsteadily in her walk, but yet came towards Transome with set purpose on her face, a woman whose dress seemed gaudy even on the stage—gaudy yet soiled.

Then they saw Transome cower, and hang his head like a man detected in a mean offence. Still the woman advanced.

All this they saw with Transome's last words "That woman—my wife," ringing in their hearts, and then suddenly the man changed and faced them boldly, a passion seemed to shake his frame. "My wife," he shouted, "My wife," and then, pointing at the woman: "That is my wife," he said.

Somehow it was the woman who cowered then, but as the curtain came down on her, the fainting heroine, and the hero of the story, the audience were silent. One does not cheer reality.

* * * * *

They have added many to the stories about Kettlesham since then, but the true one is not of the number.

Transome is a big actor now and his shyness hampers him no more. They say it left him for ever the night he told his secret to the world.

The Angel of the Revolution

By George Griffith

CHAPTER LIII.

In Old Aboukir's Bay.

Five days later was fought a second battle of the Nile, a battle compared with which the former conflict, momentous as it had been, would have seemed but child's play. On the one side Admiral Beresford, in command of the Mediterranean squadron, had collected every available ship and torpedo boat to do battle for the defence of the all-important Suez Canal, and opposed to him was an immense armament formed by the junction of the Russian Black Sea squadron with the Franco-Italian fleet, or rather those portions of it which had survived the attacks or eluded the vigilance of the British admiral.

The battle, fought almost on the ancient battle-ground of Nelson and Collingwood, was incomparably the greatest sea-fight in the history of war.

The fleet under Admiral Beresford's command consisted of fifty-five battleships of the first and second class, forty-six armoured and seventy-two unarmoured cruisers, fifty-four gunboats, and two hundred and seventy torpedo boats, while the allied fleets of the League mustered between them forty-six battleships, seventy-five armoured and sixty-three unarmoured cruisers, forty gunboats, and two hundred and fifty torpedo boats.

The battle began soon after sundown on the 24th of August, and raged continuously for over sixty hours. The whole issue of the fight was the question of the command of the Mediterranean and the British line of communication with India and the East vid the Suez Canal.

The prize was well worthy of the tremendous struggle that the two contending forces waged for it, and from the two Admirals in command to the boys employed on the most insignificant duties about the ships, every one of the combatants seemed equally impressed with the magnitude of the momentous issues at stake.

To the League victory meant a deadly blow inflicted upon the only enemy now seriously to be reckoned with. It meant the severing of the British empire into two portions and the cutting of the one remaining channel of supply upon which the heart of the Empire now depended for its nutrition. To destroy Admiral Beresford's fleet would be to achieve as great a triumph on the sea as the armies of the League had achieved on land by the taking of Berlin, Vienna, and Constantinople. On the other hand the defeat of the Franco-Italian fleets meant complete command of the Mediterranean and the keeping open of the Suez Canal, the maintenance of communication with India and Australia by the shortest route, and what was by no means the least important consideration, the vindication of British prestige in Egypt, the Soudan, and India. It was with these enormous gains and losses before their eyes that the two forces engaged and fought as perhaps men had never fought with each other in the world before.

Everything that science and experience could suggest was done by the leaders of both sides. Human life was counted as nothing in the balance, and deeds of the most reckless heroism were performed in countless instances as the mighty struggle progressed.

With such inflexible determination was the battle waged on either side, and so appalling had been the destruction accomplished by the weapons brought into play, that by sunrise on the morning of the 27th, more than half the opposing fleets had been destroyed, and of the remainder the majority were so crippled that a continuance of the fight had become a matter of physical impossibility.

What advantage remained appeared to be on the side of the remnants of the Franco-Italian fleet, but this was speedily negatived an hour after sunrise by the appearance of a fresh British squadron consisting of five battleships, fifteen cruisers, and a large flotilla of gunboats and torpedo boats which had passed through the canal during the night from Aden and Suakim and appeared on the scene just in time to turn the tide of battle, decisively in favour of the British Admiral.

As soon as this new force got into action it went to work with terrible effectiveness, and in three hours there was not a single vessel that was still flying the French or Italian flag. The victory had it is true been bought at a tremendous price, but it was complete and decisive, and at the moment that the last of the ships of the League struck her flag, Admiral Beresford stood in the same glorious position as Sir George Rodney had done a hundred and twenty-two years before, when he saved the British Empire in the ever-memorable victory of the 12th of April, 1782.

The triumph in the Mediterranean was, however, only a set-off to a disaster which had occurred more than five weeks previously in the Atlantic. The Russian fleet, which had broken the blockade of the Sound, with the assistance of the Lucifer, had, after coaling at Aberdeen, made its way into the Atlantic, and there, in conjunction with the Franco-Italian fleets, operating along the Atlantic steamer route, had, after a series of desperate engagements, succeeded in breaking up the line of British communication with America and Canada.

This result had been achieved mainly in consequence of the contrast between the necessary methods of attack and defence. On the one hand, Britain had been compelled to maintain an extended line of ocean defence more than three thousand miles in length, and her ships had further been hampered by the absolute necessity of attending first to the protection of the Atlantic liners, and secondly to warding off isolated attacks which were directed upon different parts of the line by squadrons which could not be attacked in turn without breaking the line of convoy which it was all essential to preserve intact.

For two or three weeks there had been a series of running fights, but at length the ocean chain had broken under the perpetual strain, and a repulse inflicted on the Irish squadron by a superior force of French, Italian, and Spanish warships had settled the question of the command of the Atlantic in favour of the League. The immediate result of this was that food supplies from the West practically stopped.

Now and then a fleet Atlantic greyhound ran the blockade and brought her priceless cargo into a British port, but as the weeks went by these occurrences became fewer and further between, till the time news was received in London of the investment of the fortresses of the Quadrilateral by the innumerable hosts of the League, brought together by the junction of the French and Russian armies of the North and the conquerors of Vienna and Constantinople, who had returned on their tracks after garrisoning their conquests in the East.

Food in Britain, already at war prices, now began to rise still further, and soon touched famine prices. Wheat, which in the last decade of the nineteenth century had averaged about £9 a ton, rose to over £31 a ton, its price two years before the Battle of Waterloo. Other imported food-stuffs, of course, rose in proportion with the staple commodity, and the people of Britain saw, at first dimly, then more and more clearly, the real issue that had been involved in the depopulation of the rural districts to swell the populations of the towns, and the consequent lapse of enormous areas of land either into pasturage or unused wilderness.

In other words, Britain began to see approaching her doors an enemy before whose assault all human strength is impotent, and all valour unavailing. Like Imperial Rome, she had depended for her food supply on external sources, and now these sources were one by one being cut off.

The loss of the command of the Atlantic, the breaking of the Baltic blockade, and the consequent closing of all the continental ports save Hamburg, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Antwerp, had left her entirely dependent upon her own miserably insufficient internal resources and the Mediterranean route to India and the East.

More than this, too, only Hamburg, Antwerp, and the forces of the Quadrilateral, now stood between her and actual invasion, that supreme calamity which, until the raid upon Aberdeen, had been for centuries believed to be impossible.

Once let the League triumph in the Netherlands, as it had done in Central and South-Eastern Europe, and its legions would descend like an avalanche upon the shores of England, and the Lion of the Seas would find himself driven to bay in the stronghold which he had held inviolate for nearly a thousand years.

CHAPTER LIV.

FROM CHAOS TO ARCADIE.

DURING the three months of incessant strife and carnage which deluged the plains and valleys of Europe with blood after the fall of Berlin the Terrorists took no part whatever in the war.

At long intervals an air-ship was seen from the earth flyng at full speed through the upper regions of the atmosphere, now over Europe, now over America, and now over Australia or the Cape of Good Hope, but if they held any communication with the earth they did so secretly, and only paid the briefest of visits, the objects of which could but be guessed at.

When one was sighted the fact was mentioned in the newspapers, and vague speculations were indulged it, but there was soon little room left for these in the public attention, especially in Britain, for as the news of disaster after disaster came pouring in, and the hosts of the League drew nearer and nearer to the western shores of Europe all eyes were turned more and more anxiously across "the silver streak" which now alone separated the peaceful hills and valleys of England and Scotland from the destroying war-storm which had so swiftly desolated the fields of Europe, and all hearts were heavy with apprehension of coming sorrows.

The rapidity of their movements had naturally led to the supposition that several of the air-ships had taken the air for some unknown purpose, but in reality there were only two of them afloat during nearly the whole of the three months.

Of these, one was the Orion, on board of which Tremayne was visiting the various centres of the Brotherhood throughout the English-speaking world, making everything ready for the carrying out at the proper time of the great project to which he had devoted himself since the memorable night at Alanmere when he had seen the vision of the world's Armageddon. The other was under the command of Michael Roburoff, who was busy in America and Canada perfecting the preparations for checkmating the designs of the American Ring which were described in a former chapter.

The remainder of the members of the Inner Circle and those of the Outer Circle, living in Aeria, were quietly pursuing the most peaceful avocations, building houses and water-mills, clearing fields and laying out gardens, fishing in the lake and streams, and hunting in the forests as though they had never heard of the horrors of war and had no part or share in the Titanic strife whose final issue they would so soon have to go forth and decide.

One of the hardest workers in the colony was the Admiral of the aerial fleet. Morning after morning he shut himself up in his laboratory for three or four hours experimenting with explosives of various kinds, and especially on a new form of fire-shell which he had invented, and which he was now busy perfecting in preparation for the next, and as he hoped, final conflict that he would have to wage with the forces of despotism and barbarism.

The afternoons he spent supervising the erection of the mills, and the construction of new machinery, and in exploring the mountain sides in search of mineral wealth of which he was delighted to find abundant promise that was afterwards realised beyond his expectations.

On these exploring expeditions he was frequently accompanied by Natasha and Radna and her husband. Sometimes Arnold would be enticed away from his chemicals, and his designs upon the lives of his enemies, and after breakfasting soon after sunrise would go off for a long day's ramble to some unknown part of their wonderful domain, in which, like children in a fairy-land, they were always discovering some new wonders and beauties. And, indeed, no children could have been happier or freer from care than they were during this delightful interval in the tragedy in which they were so soon to play such conspicuous parts.

The two wedded lovers, with the dark past put far behind them for ever, found perfect happiness in each other's society, and so, it is almost needless to add, left Arnold and Natasha pretty much to their own devices. Indeed, Natasha had more than once declared that she would have to get the Princess to join the party, as Radna had proved herself a helpless failure as a chaperone.

Everyone in the valley by this time looked upon Arnold and Natasha as lovers, though their rank in the Brotherhood was so high that no one ventured to speak of them as betrothed save by implication. How Natas regarded them was known only to himself. He, of course, saw their intimacy, and since he said nothing he doubtless looked upon it with approval, but whether he regarded it as an intimacy of friends or of lovers remained a mystery even to Natasha herself, for he never by any chance made an allusion to it.

As for Arnold he had scrupulously observed the compact tacitly made between them on the first and only occasion that he had ever spoken words of love to her. They were the best of friends, the closest companions, and their intercourse with each other was absolutely frank and unrestrained, just as it would have been between two close friends of the same sex; but they understood each other perfectly, and by no word or deed did either cross the line that divides friendship from love.

She trusted him absolutely in all things, and he took this trust as a sacred pledge between them that until his part of their compact had been performed love was a forbidden subject not even to be approached.

So perfectly did Natasha play her part that though he spent hours and hours alone with her on their exploring expeditions, and in rowing and sailing on the lake, and though he passed many another hour in solitude weighing her every word and action, he was utterly unable to truthfully congratulate himself on having made the slightest progress towards gaining that love without which, even if he held her to the compact in the day of victory, victory itself would be robbed of its crowning glory and dearest prize.

To a weaker man it would have been an impossible situation, the constant and familiar companionship with a girl whose wonderful beauty dazzled his eyes and fired his blood as he looked upon it, and whose winning charm of manner and grace of speech and action seemed to glorify her beauty until she seemed a being almost beyond the reach of merely human love—rather one of those daughters of men whom the sons of God looked upon in the early days of the world, and found so fair that they forsook Heaven itself to woo them.

Trained and disciplined as he had been in the sternest of all schools, and strengthened as he was by the knowledge of the compact that existed between them, there were moments when his self-control was very sorely tried, moments when her hand would be clasped in his, or rested on his shoulder as he helped her across a stream or down some steep hillside, or when in the midst of some animated discussion she would stop short and face him and suddenly confound his logic with a flash from her eyes and a smile on her lips that literally forced him to put forth a muscular effort to prevent himself from catching her in his arms and risking everything for just one kiss, one taste of the forbidden fruit within his reach, and yet parted from him by a sea of blood and flame that still lay between the world and that empire of peace which he promised to win for her sweet sake.

Once and once only she had tried him almost too far. They had been discussing the possibility of ruling the world without the ultimate appeal to force when the nations, weary at length of war, should have consented to disarm, and she, carried away by her own eloquent pleading for the ultimate triumph of peace and goodwill on earth, had laid her hand upon his arm, and was looking up at him with her lovely face aglow with the sweetest expression even he had ever seen upon it.

Their eyes met, and there was a sudden silence between them. The eloquent words died upon her lips and a deep flush rose to her cheeks, and then faded instantly away, leaving her pale and with a look almost of terror in her eyes. He took a quick step backwards, and, turning away as though he feared to look any longer upon her beauty, said in a low tone that trembled with the strength of his repressed passion:

"Natasha, for God's sake remember that I am only made of flesh and blood!"

In a moment she was by his side again, this time with her eyes downcast and her proud little head bent as though in acknowledgment of his reproof. Then she looked up again, and held out her hand and said:

"Forgive me; I have done wrong! Let us be friends again!"

There was a gentle emphasis on the word "friends" that was irresistible. He took her hand in silence, and after a pressure that was almost imperceptibly returned, let it go again, and they walked on together; but there was very little more said between them till they returned to the settlement.

This had happened one afternoon towards the middle of September, and two days later their delightful companionship came suddenly to an end, and the bond that existed between them was severed in a moment without warning, as a nerve thrilling with pleasure might be cut by an unexpected blow with a knife.

On the 16th of September the Orion returned from Australia. She touched the earth shortly after midday, and before sunset the Azrael, the vessel in which Michael Roburoff had gone to America, also returned, but without her commander. Her lieutenant, however, brought a despatch from him, which he delivered at once to Natas, who, immediately on reading it, sent for Tremayne.

It evidently contained matters of great importance, for they remained alone together discussing it for over an hour. At the end of that time Tremayne left the Master's house and went to look for Arnold. He found him just helping Natasha out of a skiff at a little landing-stage that had been built out into the lake for boating purposes. As soon as greetings had been exchanged, he said:

"Natasha, I have just left your father. He asked me, if I saw you, to tell you that he wishes to speak to you at once."

"Certainly," said Natasha. "I hope you have not brought bad news home from your travels. You are looking very serious about something," and without waiting for an answer, she was gone to obey her father's summons.

As soon as she was out of earshot Tremayne put his arm through Arnold's, and drawing him away towards a secluded portion of the shore of the lake, said:

"Arnold, old man, I have some very serious news for you. You must prepare yourself for the severest strain that, I believe, could be put on your loyalty and your honour."

"What is it? For Heaven's sake don't tell me that it has to do with Natasha!" exclaimed Arnold, stopping short and facing round, white to the lips with the sudden fear that possessed him. "You know——"

"Yes, I know everything," replied Tremayne, speaking almost as gently as a woman would have done, "and I am sorry to say that it has to do with her. I know what your hopes have been with regard to her, and no man on earth could have wished to see those hopes fulfilled more earnestly than I have done, but——"

"What do you mean, Tremayne? Speak out, and let me know the worst. If you tell me that I am to give her up, I tell you that I am——"

"'That I am an English gentleman, and that I will break my heart rather than my oath'—that is what you will tell me when I tell you that you must not only give up your hopes of winning Natasha, but that it is the Master's orders that you shall have the Ithuriel ready to sail at midnight to take her to America to Michael Roburoff, who has written to Natas to ask her for his wife."

Arnold heard him out in dazed stupified silence. It seemed too monstrous, too horrible to be true. The sudden blow had stunned him. He tried to speak, but the words would not come. Tremayne, still standing with his arm through his, felt his whole body trembling, as though stricken with some sudden palsy. He led him on again, saying in a sterner tone than before:

"Come, come! Play the man, and remember that the work nearest to your hand is war, and not love. Remember the tremendous issues that are gathering to their fulfilment, and the part that you have to play in working them out. This is not a question of the happiness or the hopes of one man or woman, but of millions, of the whole human race. You, and you alone, hold in your hands the power to make the defeat of the League certain."

"And I will use it, have no fear of that!" replied Arnold, stopping again and passing his hand over his eyes like a man waking from an evil dream. "What I have sworn to do I will do; I am not going back from my oath. I will obey to the end, for she will do the same, and what would she think of me if I failed! Leave me alone for a bit now.

old man. I must fight this thing out with myself, but the Ithuriel shall be ready to start at twelve."

Tremayne saw that he was himself again, and that it was better that he should do as he said, so with a word of farewell he turned away and left him alone with his thoughts. Half way back to the settlement he met Natasha coming down towards the lake. She was deadly pale, but she walked with a firm step, and carried her head as proudly erect as ever. As they met she stopped him and said:

"Where is he?"

Tremayne's first thought was to try and persuade her to go back and leave Arnold to himself, but a look at Natasha's white set face and shining eyes warned him that she was not in a mood to take advice, and so he told her, and without another word she went on swiftly down the path that led to the lake.

CHAPTER LV.

Love and Duty.

The brief twilight of the tropics had passed before Arnold reached a grove of palms on the western shore of the lake towards which he had bent his steps when he left Tremayne. He walked with loose, aimless strides, now quickly and now slowly, and now stopping to watch the brightening moon shining upon the water.

He caught himself thinking what a lovely night it would be to take Natasha for a row, and then his mind sprang back with a jerk to the remembrance of the horrible journey that he was to begin at midnight—to take Natasha to another man, and leave her with him as his wife.

No, it could not be true. It was impossible that he should have fought and triumphed as he had done, and all for this. To give up the one woman he had ever loved in all his life, the woman he had snatched from slavery and degredation when not another man on earth could have done it.

What had this Roburoff done that she should be given to him for the mere asking? Why had he not come in person like a man to woo and win her if he could, and then he would have stood aside and bowed to her choice. But this curt order to take her away to him as though she were some piece of merchandise—no, if such things were possible better that he had never——

"Richard!"

He felt a light touch on his arm, and turned round sharply. Natasha was standing beside him. He had been so engrossed by his dark thoughts that he had not heard her light step on the soft sward, and now he seemed to see her white face and great shining eyes looking up at him in the moonlight as though there was some mist floating between him and her. Suddenly the mist seemed to vanish. He saw tears under the long, dark lashes, and the sweet red lips parted in a faint smile.

Lose her he might to-morrow, but for this one moment she was his and no other man's, let those who would say nay. That instant she was clasped helpless and unresisting in his arms, and her lips were giving his back kiss for kiss. Wreck and chaos might come now for all he cared. She loved him and had given herself to him, if only for that one hour.

After that he could plunge into the battle again, and slay and spare not—yes, and he would slay without mercy. He would hurl his lightnings from the skies, and where they struck there should be death. If not love and life then hate and death—it was not his choice. Let those who had chosen see to that; but for the present love and life were his, why should he not live. Then the mad, sweet delirium passed, and saner thoughts came. He released her suddenly, almost brusquely, and said with a harsh ring in his voice:

"Why did you come? Have you forgotten what so nearly happened the day before yesterday?"

"No, I have not forgotten it. I have remembered it, and that is why I came to tell you—what you know by this time."

Her face was rosy enough now, and she looked him straight in the eyes as she spoke, proud to confess the mastery that he had won.

"Now listen," she went on, speaking in a low, quick, passionate tone. "The will of the Master must be done. There is no appeal from that either for you or me. He can dispose of me as he chooses, and I shall obey, as I warned you I should when you first told me that you should win me if you could.

"Well, you have won me so far as I can be won. I love you, and I have come to tell you so before the shadow falls between us. And I have come to tell you that what you have won shall belong to no one else. I will obey my father to the letter, but the spirit is my affair. Now kiss me again, dear, and say good-bye. We have had our glimpse of Heaven, and this is not the only life."

For one more brief moment she surrendered herself to him again. Their lips met and parted, and in an instant she had slipped out of his arms and was gone, leaving him dazed with her beauty and her winsomeness.

An hour later he walked back to the settlement looking five years older than he had done a couple of hours before, but with his nerves steady and with the light of a solemn resolve burning in his eyes. He went straight to the Ithuriel, and made a minute personal inspection of the whole vessel, inside and out. He saw that every cylinder was charged, and that there was an ample supply of spare ones and ammunition on board, including a number of his new fire-shells. Then he went to Lieutenant Marston's quarters, and told him to have the crew in their places by half-past eleven, and this done, he paid a visit to the Master to report all ready.

Natas received him as usual, just as though nothing out of the common had happened, and if he noticed the change that had come over him, he made no sign that he did so. When Arnold had made his report, he merely said:

"Very good. You will start at twelve. The Chief has told you the nature and purpose of the voyage you are about to make, I presume?"

He bowed a silent affirmative, and Natas went on:

"The Chief and Anna Ornovski will go with you as witnesses for Michael Roburoff and Natasha, and the Chief will be provided with my sealed orders for your guidance in the immediate future. The rendezvous is a house on one of the spurs of the Alleghany Mountains. What time will it take to reach there?"

"The distance is about seven thousand miles. That will be from thirty to thirty-five hours' flight according to the wind. With a fair wind we shall reach the Alleghanies a little before sunrise on the 18th."

"Then to make sure of that, if possible, you had better start an hour earlier. Natasha is making her preparations, and will be on board at eleven."

"Very well; I will be ready to start then," replied Arnold, speaking as calmly and formally as Natas had done. Then he saluted and walked out.

When he got into the open air he drew a deep breath. His teeth came together with a sharp snap, and his hands clenched. So it was true, then, this horrible thing, this sacrilege, this ruin, that had fallen upon his life and hers. Natas had spoken of giving her to this man as quietly as though it had been the most natural proceeding possible, an understood arrangement about which there could be no question. Well, he had sworn and he would obey, but there would be a heavy price to pay for his obedience.

He did not see Natasha again that night. When the Ithuriel rose into the air she was in her cabin with the Princess, and did not appear during the voyage save at meals, when all the others were present, and then she joined in the conversation with a composure which showed that, externally at least, she had quite regained her habitual self-control.

Arnold spent the greater part of the voyage in the deck-saloon with Tremayne, talking over the events of the war, and arranging plans of future action. By mutual consent the object of their present voyage was not mentioned. As Arnold was more than two months and a half behind the news, he found not a little relief in hearing from Tremayne of all that had taken place since the recapture of the Lucifer. With a portion of this the reader has already been made acquainted, and the rest may be given here in the Chief's own words as he told it to Arnold in the deck-saloon after breakfast on the morning of the 17th.

"You know, of course, of that mysterious movement which has been taking place for many months past now all over the East. Well, as the Americans say, the fall of Constantinople brought that to a head, and with almost miraculous rapidity too. By some means or other the Sultan, Mohammed Reshad, as fierce an old fire-eater as ever smelt powder, managed to escape from the city before the French and Russians got in.

"He got on board one of the Turkish ships that went to the Nile with Beresford, in disguise, and was landed in Egypt with the Turkish troops before the battle, without anyone knowing who he was, and he went straight to Cairo. About a week after he got there, the great mosque was crammed to suffocation by a vast crowd of Turks and Arabs. When prayers were over who should enter the pulpit but Sultan Mohammed, arrayed in his sacerdotal robes as the Sheik-ul-Islam, or Commander of the Faithful. Two of the muftis unfolded the Black Banner of the Prophet behind him, and then he began to preach the Holy War.

"I needn't tell you what inflammable stuff these Moslems are made of when it is a matter of religion. The fall of Constantinople had roused them almost to madness, and a week after that speech the whole Moslem world was in a blaze. You know how miraculously news travels among Orientals and Arabs. The telegraph had something to do with it, of course, but by whatever means it was accomplished, every Moslem capable of pulling a trigger was up in arms, from Morocco to the Ganges, in less than ten days after the Tecbir sounded in the streets of Cairo.

"Then came a series of wholesale butcheries. I believe every male Christian in Northern Africa was slaughtered within a week. The Moors and Arabs settled what French garrisons had been left in Algiers, the Turks turned on the British in Egypt, outnumbering them, as they did, a good hundred to one, and killed them to a man. By this time the flame had spread to India. Nearly all the British troops had been withdrawn as soon as it was clearly seen that Russia would have to be fought, not on Indian but on British soil, but what were left have never been heard of since.

"That, for the present at any rate, has been the end of British rule in India. What happened after that, or what is happening now, it is impossible to say with any degree of precision. Communications between East and West have been completely stopped for the last three weeks or so. No ships have come through the Suez Canal, and as every available vessel in the Mediterranean Squadron, or rather what was left of it after the big battle in the Bay of Aboukir, has been ordered to Gibraltar, so as to be handy for home defence if needed, nothing is known beyond a rumour that the Turks have blown up several vessels in the Canal and completely blocked it. If there are any garrisons left at Suez Suakim, or Aden, they are completely surrounded, and, a's all the telegraph wires and cables have been cut, there is very little probability of any news reaching them.

"Before I left Australia the other day, however, I heard news which, if it is true, as it probably is, means nothing more nor less than a recurrence of what happened in the days of Ghenghis Khan, when the Tartars and Mongols swept Asia from east to west as clean as a chess-board.

"The news was brought by a tea-ship from Shanghai to Melbourne. There was not much of it because she had left in a hurry, but what there was was terribly to the point. All the millions of China are on the war-path; the Manchu dynasty has been overthrown, and the supreme power is in the hands of a Buddhist priest, who claims to be a re-incarnation of Buddha, and who is worshipped almost as a god by every Buddhist throughout the East.

"Japan, too, has suddenly cast off her new Christianity and European civilisation, torn up her ready-made constitution, and followed the priests of her old religion to the feet of the new Buddha. As China and Japan have both powerful fleets and almost innumerable armies, I expect the next definite news we shall get will be of a descent on India, where the Moslems will be cutting Buddhist throats wholesale.

"There will be some tremendous fighting between them and the Buddhists, and after that probably a descent on Eastern Europe by the victors. So far as European civilisation is concerned that will be the beginning of chaos, unless the Anglo-Saxon race rises to the occasion and stands between the world and another Oriental conquest."

"I don't think there is very much fear of that," said Arnold, as Tremayne stopped speaking. "I believe there is plenty of grit left in the Anglo-Saxon yet, and when he once clearly sees that either he or the Mongol or Moslem, as the case may be, has got to possess the earth, he will fight as long as he can put an army in the field.

"Added to that I believe the Moslems will render a pretty good account of the Chinese and Japs before they get very far West. There may not be so many of them, but they're soldiers to a man, and I don't expect we shall have many of the others to reckon with by the time they have done with them. Can you tell me now what the prospects of carrying out this great Federation scheme of yours are?"

"Of course, I can only give you a rough estimate, but I think I can say that, thanks to the marvellous organisation of the Brotherhood, which, of course, has been placed entirely at my disposal by Natas, the success of the scheme is practically assured so far as the vast majority of the industrial classes is concerned, and I needn't say that if we have them the so-called upper and middle classes must either join us or be crushed.

"The fact is that those who turn the world's raw material into available wealth are heartily sick of being manipulated by the capitalists. Without the war, and without the threatened extinction of Britain as a Power, they might not have risen for another hundred years, if they had ever risen at all; but now, you see, it is a question not only of an economic revolt, but also of breaking the power of the League or becoming subject to it.

"As for America, the capitalist and his very humble servant, the professional politician, have between them reduced things to such a state of political and economic rottenness that the moment we proclaim a general Federation of the Anglo-Saxon peoples and declare war on the World, the League, and the Almighty Dollar, industrial America will rise to a man, and that colossal sham, the United States Government, will collapse like a broken bubble."

About eleven, on the night of the 17th, Tremayne went to his cabin, and Arnold told the man on the look-out to go below until he was called. Then he took his place, and remained alone with his thoughts as the Ithuriel sped on her way a thousand feet above the deserted waters of the Atlantic, until the dark mass of the American Continent loomed up in front of him to the westward.

As soon as he sighted land he went aft to the wheel-house, and slightly inclined the air-planes, causing the Ithuriel to soar upwards until the barometer marked a height of six thousand feet. At this elevation he passed over the mouth of the Chesapeake and across Virginia, and a little more than an hour before sunrise the Ithuriel sank to the earth on one of the spurs of the Alleghanies, in sight of a lonely weather-board house, in one of the windows of which three lights were burning in the form of a triangle.

The Brain Gymnasium.

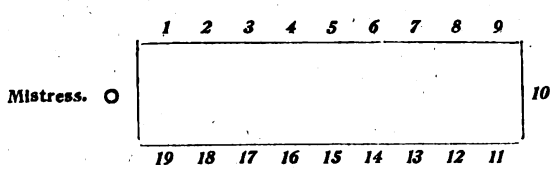
THE competitions in our Christmas number have met with such a hearty welcome from my readers, that I have decided to inaugurate on this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set will be comparatively easy of solution, while others will be designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In each of the competitions a prize of ten shillings will be awarded to the sender of the first correct solution dealt with, and to the sender of the next five correct ones will be presented, in the case of the odd number competitions, one of our silver pencil cases, and, in the case of the even number competitions, a copy of a popular six-shilling novel.

All solutions must be written on separate postcards, and must reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, January 15th, 1900. Mark the postcards "Brain Gymnasium, No. 7," "Brain Gymnasium, No. 8," etc., according to the number of the competition of which the solution is sent.

No. 7.

NINETEEN girls and their mistress sat down at a table for refreshment thus:



At the end of the repast it was decided that every seventh person should leave the room, and the last one remaining should discharge the bill. How did the girls arrange so that the mistress was left last in the room?

No. 8.

MY 1 2 3 4 5 is to make an impression; my 4 1 3 5 2 is a hamper; my 4 3 5 2 1 is to provide; and my 5 1 3 4 2 is to repeat.

What am I?

No. 9.

To a certain number, add two-thirds of it three times in such a manner that a word is represented in twelve different ways.

No. 10.

REARRANGE the following vertical lines so that a well-known proverb can be read horizontally:

E D E R O V Y
A I G S S H H
Y D D A E A N
R A V Y N E M
S U H H R I O

No. 11.

FOUR boys, A, B, C, and D, had a certain number of marbles equally divided. A like number was afterwards given to them in the following proportions: A received half, B received half of the remainder, C got a fifth of what A and B had, while D got a quarter of what B and C received. After playing, it was found that A had won two-fifths of B's marbles, half of C's, and all of D's. B possessed the remainder, which were just a third of what A had. How many did each have at the commencement?

Food and Guy's Tonic.

Guy's Tonic is of the most positive value in all Stomach Disorders, bringing about a better Appetite, greater enjoyment of Food, and accomplishing the Digestion of the latter, both in the Stomach in the first instance and its re-digestion in the Tissues, where Nerve force and Vital power for the Body are created from Food.

The pain and suffering avoided by the use of Guy's Tonic is a strong incentive for you to use it. It prevents those Stomachic Ailments and errors of Digestion which cause Flatulence, Sourness, unpleasant Breath, coated Tongue, Biliousness, Sick Headache, and the like, whilst the relief it affords in Nerve attacks and Neuralgia completes the circle of good work it is in the province of Guy's Tonic to effect.

"Enjoys Food and Sleeps Better."

Mr. H. Dibben, of 5 Fore House, High St., Woolwich, writes:

"I am most particularly pleased with Guy's "Tonic. My wife has suffered from a very severe "form of Indigestion for a long time. Doctors have "done her little or no good, but since taking your "grand Tonic the improvement is really wonderful. "She can now sleep and take her Food with "enjoyment."

Doctors recommend Guy's Tonic.

Edwin H. Stout, Esq., Manager of The Review of Reviews, "Mowbray House," Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C., writes:

"I often use Guy's Tonic myself with advantage, "and our Family Doctor frequently prescribes it as "one of the best Tonics he can give."

Guy's Tonic is a British Preparation of Simple Vegetable origin. It is employed with excellent results in Hospital Practice, and is widely recommended by Medical Men. A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

travelled up to town with a lot of chaps, and was met at Waterloo by his elder brother Geoffrey, no end of a swell in his way, for he had left the university covered with glory and been appointed assistant private secretary to a Cabinet Minister.

He and Jimmy were to go out to their people for the Christmas holidays. And a fine time they had of it. Geoffrey was inclined to put a lot of "side" on, but his minor knew him too well to be imposed upon. Jim cheeked Geof into rational behaviour, and the two became jolly chums as of old. They had rare fun racing through France to Marseilles, where they caught a steamer which carried them over to the Italian island.

Cagliari is rather a fine old place, but horribly slow for Jim, because his brother soon got a bad attack of "swelled head." His father introduced him to the British Consul and a few local big bodies, who made no end of a fuss over a young man who was so closely in touch with one of the Queen's Secretaries of State.

Geof had no time to waste over a mere schoolboy, so Jim roamed about the quaint streets and market-places alone, and had soon rubbed up a speaking acquaintanceship with all kinds of folk. One of his friends was a funny old man who dressed in seedy black, and said he was a lawyer. He soon found out Jim's love of adventure, and told tempting tales of the wild country, the grand forest, and splendid sport.

In conversation it came out that the forests round about Cagliari were full of holly, and this set Jimmy mad to have a regular old English Christmas, and he bothered his mother and father, until Geof consented to go on a holly-hunting expedition under the guidance of the snuffy old lawyer.

"Hurry up, Geof, old man!"

Jim was wild with excitement. They had had a long tramp and had penetrated fairly into a dense forest, partly under snow, where holly bushes glowing with crimson berries abounded. They had brought a small pony with them, with the intention of bringing him back loaded with woodland spoils. Both brothers were busily hacking at the bushes, when suddenly three men, armed with guns and hunting knives, appeared from behind trees. Geof thought they were forest guards, and remonstrated, when two of them seized him, and the third laid his hand on Jim's collar.

Jim was taken by surprise, but as the men answered gruffly he caught their meaning; and, wrestling himself free, made a slash at his assailant with his small hatchet, at the same time singing out excitedly:

"Look out, Geof; brigands!"

But the men were too quick, and soon had their two English prisoners secure. The snuffy old lawyer had disappeared. With very little ceremony the three men, powerfully built, dirty-looking ruffians, hurried Geof and Jim off, dragging them through the forest to a little hut on the mountain side. Here coarse food was set before them.

"What's that they say?"

Geof Earl had a quaint theory that his University Latin would enable him to make himself understood by Sardinians, and he had found it work tolerably well with the Italian officials, no doubt because they, too, had enjoyed some kind of a classical training. But now, face to face with danger, the Cabinet Minister's important private secretary had to appeal to the small schoolboy brother, who had managed in a few days to pick up a sufficient amount of the native dialect.

"As far as I can make out," said Jim, rather relishing the turning of the tables, "that old Johnny lawyer chap has gone back to collect ransom from the Governor. Look here, Geof, keep a watch upon them, and we'll give 'em the slip."

The bandits looked at the brothers suspiciously, but as they offered no violence, Jim plucked up courage to ask them what they intended to do.

"They will keep us here till our ransom comes. I say, Geof, they want ten thousand lires. Isn't that an awful lot?"

"Four hundred pounds."

"Whew! no idea I was worth so much. But it's all your fault, Geof, for being such a big bug. But, I say, Geof"—Jim's face clouded over, and a scared look came into his eyes—"what if the Dad hasn't got the money with him?"

"Never fear, Jimmy boy, he'll soon get it," and he threw his arm round the youngster's neck. But he, too, looked anxious, though he tried to hide it.

Jim soon recovered, chatting with the bandits in broken Italian.

Jim, wrestling himself free, made a slash at his assailant with his small hatchet.

and chaffing Geof for being such an important personage. Certainly the bandits had formed an exaggerated idea of Geoffrey Earl's position, and, apparently, their chief reason for detaining Jim was to gain a hold on the elder brother.

As night came on, it grew intensely cold. Warm blankets were handed to the prisoners, and rolled in these, with their feet to the fire, Geof and Jim huddled together on the earthen floor and tried to sleep. For a long time this was no easy matter, but Jim looked on the whole affair in the light of a lark, and, being tired out, dropped off.

It was still quite dark—the blackness before the dawn—when they were roughly awakened. Had the ransom arrived? Jim rubbed his eyes and shivered. It was cold, and no order for release had come. On the contrary, their captors for some reason were hurrying them off again. Horrible pictures came unbidden into Jim's brain, pictures conjured up by hazy recollections of every ghastly brigand and robber tale that he had ever read. As they stumbled out of doors, he clung to Geof, who, with his arm round the youngster's waist, held him up. It was a hurried march, and the brothers silently noticed with alarm as the daylight increased that they were leaving the forest and penetrating the rocky fastnesses of the barren mountains. Jim kept his ears open.

"We are pursued, Geof. I expect it'll be all right."

"Heaven help us," muttered Geof, and he drew Jim closer to him. If they really were pursued by troops then their lives were indeed in danger, for, if pressed too closely, murder might be resorted to by the bandits.

The chief bandit led the way, the two others coming behind their prisoners. It was a long flight, and apparently a perplexing one, for the bandits seemed uncertain as to their movements. Suddenly, while ascending the side of a valley, the leader halted, and made a rapid sign. Geof and Jim were made to lie down behind huge rocks on the mountain side.

Presently they heard the rolling of stones, and then heavy footsteps. Two men appeared lower down the valley coming in the same direction. They were dressed almost exactly like Guiseppe, the bandit leader, and his companions, in hairy, brown homespun, with black felt hats and heavy boots. Each man carried a double-barrelled gun in his hand, and formidable knives in their belts, while large bags hung at their backs—proofs of their illegal calling. These men, who it was now evident were the imaginary pursuers of Guiseppe and his prisoners, ran along the valley for some distance, evidently making for a pass between two crests of a mountain further up.

Quite suddenly, right in front of the banditti, three men in the blue uniforms of the carabinieri appeared, barring the path to the pass. The fugitives hesitated, then made a bolt up the mountain side. At the same instant four more military policemen appeared in the opposite direction, by the same way the men had appeared. All this happened within less than a quarter of a mile of the spot where the Englishmen and their captors were biding. Guiseppe made his companions

Then one of the bandits halted, turned about, lifted his gun to his shoulder, there was a puff of smoke and a reverberating report, and one of the soldiers fell back.

creep farther up the mountain side, keeping well covered behind the rocks. He spoke earnestly with his men, and Jim understood that they contemplated tying their arms and covering their heads with a cloak. But the youngster was tremendously excited by this time, and his chief desire was to see the tragedy which he felt was about to be enacted before him.

"We won't submit to be gagged or tied."

"You are at our mercy, remember," whispered Guiseppe; "and it is far wiser to lie quietly back here with this coat over your head."

"No! Leave us free, and we promise not to make a sign or raise a cry."

Guiseppe consulted his men by a glance.

"Come further up."

They put a further distance between them and the bed of the valley; and, when they settled down again, the position of the parties on the opposite side had somewhat changed. The carabinieri had concentrated forces, and were rapidly gaining on their quarry. The men of law and order in blue fired, but the bandits bounded up among the rocks. More shots were fired. Then one of the bandits halted, turned about, lifted his gun to his shoulder, there was a puff of smoke and a reverberating report, and one of the soldiers fell back. His comrades ran to support him, and carried him behind a rock, but soon left him. Evidently all was over.

The bandits had taken advantage of the panic to run higher up the opposite side of the valley and sought refuge in a small hollow, before which they built up a rampart of stones.

Soon, however, the soldiers began a heavy fire, at the same time cautiously creeping up the mountain behind the cover of the boulders. A brisk return fire was kept up, so the advance was slow, and then ceased.

For a few minutes there was a lull. New tactics were observed. Each side reserved its fire until an incautious movement exposed a cap or a sleeve, when a shot was immediately fired, and more shots aimed at the points where white puffs of smoke could be seen. This lasted for a long time. But the soldiers apparently grew tired, and once more the six remaining men opened a heavy fire and commenced a cautious creeping advance.

The bandits soon understood what was being done, and fired as rapidly as they could. There was a shout, and one soldier fell back behind a boulder. Two men, regardless of their danger, rushed to him. Behind the shelter of the rocks Jim and Geof could see the two good Samaritans busying themselves in dressing the man's wounds, and pouring something out of a black flask down his throat. They propped him up in a safe spot and left him.

There were now only five men to storm the little breastwork high up above them. They preferred to play a waiting game.

Looking down from their quarters, Geof and Jim and their captors could see the soldiers adopt all kinds of means to attract the fire of the enemy. They removed their blue caps, and, placing them on sticks, pushed them just above the rocks.

The caps were immediately pierced by a ball. Then the soldiers gave a shriek, as though one of them had been wounded. But the bandits were not to be drawn. They kept well behind their stone buttresses, and reserved their fire as much as possible. Neither party cared to risk anything.

The unsuspected onlookers, who could see most of the game, felt that if the bandits had sufficient ammunition, they had the best of the position. Night would soon approach, and then they could steal away under cover of the darkness. Meanwhile they held the position, and could easily prevent the soldiers moving. Indeed, retreat seemed almost as dangerous as advance.

Probably the attacking force understood this, and their tactics appeared to induce the besieged to exhaust their ammunition. As matters stood, there seemed to be every chance for the bandits, but the whole aspect of affairs was soon to be changed.

Three more carabinieri appeared over the pass. The onlookers could hear loud shouts from the besiegers, who commenced firing at the cavern. They were shouting directions, and the firing was done with the object of pointing out the spot, perhaps of drawing a return fire. The bandits, however, did not reply. Taking the whole scheme in at a glance the new-comers crept along the mountain-side with an upward slant, intending to outflank the bandits. Seeing this, the bandits kept up a slow but well-aimed fire at the advancing men, who were obliged to seek refuge behind rocks, and dash from one to another. The game was up, but it was still an intensely exciting one.

Recognising the danger that threatened them, the two bandits turned all their attention to the latest arrivals, and gradually warming to their work, forgot about the besiegers in front, and exposed themselves. The mistake was at once perceived, and five shots were fired, toppling one of the bandits over. Ringing shouts rent the air, but the second bandit still possessed a double barrelled gun, and he showed his assailants that he knew how to use it. He kept wonderfully cool, firing cautiously, in such a way as to abate the ardour of his enemies.

But though the fight was a slow one, it now could only end in one way, and so the soldiers felt it was useless to expose themselves. However, they were slowly but surely closing in. Soon the men on the upper side of the mountain would command the breastwork, and then would come the end. Having used all his ammunition, the surviving bandit seized his dead friend's gun and discharged the last shot. Folding his arms, he leant back, his right hand clutching his dagger, while he keenly watched the movements of his enemies.

Apparently the soldiers dreaded that the man was reserving his last two or four shots, and so were chary of making a united assault. But the delay told on the bandit's nerves. He gave a cry, tossed one and then the other gun amidst the rocks, and his dagger after them. This done he stood up with folded arms. He was at once covered with six carbines, while two carabinieri rapidly advanced towards the bandit, who held out his hands, and hanging down his head, allowed himself to be handcuffed.

The other men then came flocking round, and the watchers saw them gesticulating wildly. This soon ended. Four men were told off to carry the dead, whilst two others quickly improvised a stretcher with the guns and a great-coat and carried off their wounded comrade.

As the sad little troop disappeared over the pass Geoffrey Earl heaved a deep sigh. During the progress of the miniature battle he had been too much interested and excited to think of himself and brother; but now that all was over, that the victorious representatives of civilisation had gone, a feeling of despair came over him, and he could have dashed himself against the rocks or tried to fell one of his captors. But they, too, seemed to be greatly sobered by the tragedy they had witnessed. They talked in whispers, and showed every mark of indecision.

At one moment Jim thought that their turn for slaughter had come. Excitement had kept him up, but now he felt sick, and fell back shuddering. Geof caught him in his arms.

Guiseppe also made a hurried movement to save the youngster, but his foot slipped, his gun fell out of his hands, and went off with a loud report, which was instantly followed by a yell, and one of the bandits rolled over, accidentally shot through the chest. The third man darted forward, and let his gun fall.

Jim struggled free, seized the loaded gun, and yelled out:

"Quick, Geof, collar the other guns," and at the same time he butted Guiseppe, winding and sending him sprawling down the mountain-side, and losing his own equilibrium in the effort. But he scrambled to his feet, and, regaining the gun, hurled it with all his might at the kneeling bandit.

Geoffrey had seized the loaded gun and discharged it, but without effect.

"Let's bolt!"

Jim dashed off in the direction taken by the carabinieri followed by Geof and the third bandit, Guiseppe, lame and half stunned, could only join his wounded companion. The two reports had been heard by the military police, and as Geof and Jim ran panting over the rough stony ground the blue uniformed men appeared in the distance, running towards them, then dropping on their knees they opened fire. Horrified, Jim and Geoffrey threw up their arms and yelled. But their action must have been misunderstood, for another report followed, and Geof with a groan slipped and fell. Jim, who was some distance ahead, heard the fall, stopped and ran back.

"Go on, Jim. Go away; do as I tell you. Never mind me," cried Geoffrey.

But Jim heeded not, he was by his brother's side.

"Oh! Geof, they've killed you. Where are you hit?"

There was a red stain on the left shoulder and the arm hung helplessly at his side. Jim tried to staunch the blood with his handkerchief, oblivious of all else, when he saw Geof close his eyes and go off in a faint. Jim thought he was dead, and cried aloud:

"Geof, old chap, Geof!"

Meanwhile, the bandit, seeing the return of the carabinieri, gave up the chase, and hurried back to help his chief, the turn affairs had taken making it abundantly evident that all their energies must now be concentrated in an effort to save their own skins. The police, apparently realising that something unusual was happening, ceased firing and hurried up. They laid rough hands on despairing Jimmy, who was trying vainly to staunch the blood and call Geoffrey back to consciousness. Recognising that the boy and the wounded man were foreigners, two of the carabinieri stayed with them, whilst two others pursued the retreating bandits.

Jim thought he was dead, and cried aloud: "Geof, old chap, Geof!"

It was a long time before Jim could make himself understood, and, in fact, only became intelligible when Geof opened his eyes, after some brandy had been poured down his throat.

It was a terrible journey back, for Geof had to be supported to the high road, a distance of some miles, where they found the dead and wounded carabinieri and a clumsy country cart, in which they were all jolted down to Cagliari, the sufferings of his brother during the bumpy ride causing Jim the greatest distress.

Geoffrey had to keep to his bed for a week, but Jim was up and about in a day or two, fussing over his brother, and hurrying off to the Court-house to hear the news. Guiseppe was caught, and the second bandit was brought in. He died very shortly after, and Guiseppe received for his deeds a term of imprisonment which would effectually put a stop to his marauding habits for a very long time to come. The third bandit and the snuffy old lawyer were never seen again, though an hour or two after Jim and Geof had arrived Mr. Earl had received a mysterious letter demanding a ransom for his two sons. The missive came rather too late. Poor old Jimmy. He saw many another mountain battle, though never under such conditions. GEORGE C. ROTHERY.

A SAD experience is that of "Imperita," which is given in a London paper. Wanting a cook's character, she called upon the "reference." The "reference" was found in a darkened room, lying invalided upon a sofa, her eyes covered by blue spectacles. It turned out to be the cook herself, who had engaged the rooms for a week in order to be able to give herself a good character.

AN Irishman meeting a fellow-countryman inquired of him what had become of a mutual friend. "Arrah now, honey," answered the other, "Paddy was condemned to be hanged, but saved his life by dying in prison!"

"SHE told him she wouldn't marry a man who wasn't able to take her to Australia."

"Well, that's what I call a broad hint."

"HARRY, I'm afraid our baby has a contrary disposition."

"He's too young yet to have any characteristics."

"Well, he's always getting ill when we have a ticket for a theatre."

"FATHER," said the boy, with big, serious eyes, "I want to ask you something."

"What is it, my son?" asked the old gentleman, closing his book and looking wise.

"If a monkey wore shoes on his hind feet would they be mittens?"

DR. YOUNG: "My dear, your throat demands better protection from the draughts of the theatre."

Mrs Young: "Yes, darling; I ought to have a three-string pearl necklace for such occasions."

SUCH LOVE AS THIS.

WHEN I first saw Jim Hicks slouching through the village street I was just as disagreeably impressed and just as ready to endorse the general verdict concerning him as anyone could be.

I was walking with the rector, an old friend of my father's, who had invited me to spend a portion of my summer holiday with him in order that I might quietly pursue my studies for the stiff exam in store for me. I saw this disreputable-looking fellow coming, and I was at first surprised that the rector should greet him so kindly and cheerily as we passed; and, on the other hand, I was not one whit astonished that the fellow made no reply—that was just what I should have expected.

I was about to ask my companion why he troubled to salute the man, when it occurred to me that it was part of his duty and I remained silent. It seemed as though the rector divined my thoughts, for he began to speak on that very subject.

"That young man furnishes a fairly good example of what we may call the tortuousness of human nature," said the Rev. David Lawson. "To all appearances, he is a black sheep—not a very black one, perhaps, but one that it is apparently impossible to make white. Nothing touches him; punishment and kindness are useless. Yet I feel that there is good in him, for at one time he was different."

"What caused the change?" I asked.

"Love has been the chief cause of two changes in him, John," returned my father's friend. "Love turned him from a state similar to that in which you now see him and made him a respectable member of society; and a love disappointment drove him back again. I believe I am the only one in the place who says a good word for him or to him, and it isn't only duty that impels me. I believe she would do the same, but he wouldn't let her speak to him now."

I was curious to know the circumstances; and thus it came about that I heard the story of Jim Hicks when that story was only partly unfolded, while the conclusion came within my own experience.

Four years previously the rector had made a determined effort to reform some of the youths of the village, who were fast becoming a danger to the little community. Jim Hicks, then about nineteen, was the worst; he was a thorough "rough" and the leader in all the mischief and law-breaking. In furtherance of his plan, Mr. Lawson enlisted the services of some young girls who taught in the Sunday-school and otherwise assisted in parish work.

Dora Forbes was one of those who entered fully into the spirit of the idea; the village had declined in respectability during the past year or two, and if it were not to go still lower, the young fellows must be taken in hand. So she took a large part in the work, and it was she who first spoke to Jim and, to the general surprise, induced him to come to a social meeting.

That was only the second social that had been held and it was a grand success; they had songs, recitations, readings and friendly chat, and they actually induced Jim to sing a refined song that he had learnt while at school.

Everybody was delighted, Jim's example was catching; the meetings were well attended, and the young fellows were occasionally present at church instead of loafing round the public house or tossing for coins in out-of-the-way corners.

But the greatest transformation of all was that wrought in the person of Jim Hicks; he was entirely changed before the winter had passed—was sober, industrious and clean in mind and body. Instead of a danger to Northing, he was regarded as one of the coming men.

Thus two years went by, and at the end of that time Hicks had saved enough to start in a small way of business as a jobbing carpenter in Northing. He had been brought up to that line, and as the village carpenter had died, there was a chance for a steady man. It was also Jim's idea to take a small farm later on and work the two businesses together, as a man in a neighbouring village was doing with much profit to himself.

In six months, Hicks, who showed considerable enterprise had acquired a good connection, and was even blossoming into a small builder; then came the chance of carrying out his plan of taking a farm, for one was to be vacant at Michaelmas and he had the first offer.

All the village was on the the tip-toe of expectation; Hicks would want a wife to help him with that farm, and there was more than one girl in Northing who would have said "Yes" with great willingness had Jim asked her to share his lot. But soon a rumour began to be spread about—a rumour that was confirmed very quickly; Hicks had asked Dora Forbes to marry him, and she had declined.

Northing was indignant with Jim for his presumption and quite endorsed the decision of Miss Forbes. She was the only daughter of old Captain Forbes and would come into a lot of money; she was a lady, and, therefore, far above Hicks in station. However could he have supposed that she would accept? He must have been mad!

Probably he was—mad in love. Neither the good people of the village nor Dora could see the working of the man's mind. The interest which the girl had shown in him had appeared in a different light to each of them; to her it had been zeal in a good cause, but to him it had been due to a liking—to affection—for him, and during all the intermediate time he had been influenced by the idea of one day being able to ask for her hand, so that he might possess it as well as her heart.

He was conscious that there was a difference in their positions, but he did not realise the full extent of that difference; he imagined that the kind-hearted old man, as the Captain was known to be, would be satisfied with the two facts that he was getting on and that the young people loved each other. That there would be any difficulty with Dora herself never occurred to him.

When the chance came of renting the farm, he believed that the time had arrived to speak out, and he sought an opportunity of telling Dora boldly of his heart's desire and asking her to be his wife in a formal manner. His first idea was to go to the house and see her, but in the end his courage failed him and he watched her as she went for a walk and followed her.

He waited till she had reached a secluded spot and then approached and began to plead his cause. The first doubt that had ever crossed his mind arose as he saw the continually increasing look of astonishment on her face. He had expected to see quite another expression on those dearly-loved features, and a cold chill struck his heart. Could it mean that she did not love him? Had all this interest in him been a mere sham?

Dora was very gentle with him; she recognised the blunder he had committed and understood quite well the disappointment that the truth must cause him and she was sorry for him. But it was necessary to speak plainly and disabuse him.

"I am extremely sorry, Hicks," she said frankly, "but there is some terrible mistake. I have never entertained towards you any stronger feeling than that of a desire to see you a credit to yourself and to our village. What you ask is an impossibility. There are others——"

Hicks shook his head impatiently; his heart was devoted to her and there was no place in it for any one of the "others." He was turning to go when she held out her hand to him, and involuntarily he seized it and raised it to his lips.

That was the turning point in the career of Jim Hicks; from that day his habits changed and he relapsed into his former style of living. He renounced his claim to the farm, neglected his work to such an extent that he became unreliable and gradually lost his connection, and, in short, he became the loafer of two years before.

From bad he went to worse; there were rumours, as time went on, that he had been mixed up in some of the burglaries and petty thefts of which the people of Northing and the surrounding districts had had to complain, but no direct evidence could be produced against him. The rector sighed in secret every time he saw Hicks, for it really seemed that he was a hopeless case.

Dora Forbes' marriage to the son of a neighbouring squire put the finishing touch to Hicks' backsliding, although in the general opinion Hicks did not require any pushing along the down grade—he was going quite fast enough of his own accord. After a few more months, during which the conduct of Hicks appeared to be more outrageous than ever, his misdoings culminated in the commission of a crime for which he was sent to prison for six months.

The offence with which Hicks was charged was that of assaulting James Munro, the only son of the one medical man in Northing; he had attacked this young fellow while the latter was returning home late at night and had dealt him a severe blow on the back of the head, rendering him unconscious. The object of this attack was undoubtedly robbery, but the evil doer had been disturbed by the approach of a labourer who had recognised him in the moonlight and had given the information which led to Hicks' arrest.

At the assizes Hicks had pleaded "Not Guilty" in a sullen manner, but had made no further attempt at defence. When the sentence was pronounced, most people thought that he had got off lightly and predicted a great increase of crime on every circuit where that judge was sent.

He had been released only a few days when I saw him in the village street. The story, as related by my friend, impressed me in a way that I could not explain, and whenever I went out I caught myself continually awtching for the appearance of Jim Hicks. The conclusion of the story came sooner than was anticipated.

The people of Northing strongly believed that Hicks had a grudge against Dora Forbes, as they continued to call her, for having rejected him and married young Marsh. Presumably they cherished this notion because it is a common failing with human beings to wish evil to those who have not acted just as they are desired to act. but it was a noticeable fact that Hicks was often seen within easy distance of the house occupied by the Marshes, and occasionally dogged her footsteps when she came into the village street.

It was one night during the last week of my stay with the Rev. David Lawson when the final chapter was unfolded. It was rather a dark night, and my friend and I went out about nine o'clock for half an hour's stroll to refresh us before retiring for the night—a custom which the rector had followed for many years. We walked unintentionally in the direction of Mr. Marsh's residence, through some quiet lanes, and on coming within sight of it the rector casually remarked that the Marshs were either out or gone to bed, as there were no lights visible.

The house lay in a somewhat lonely position. There was nothing remarkable about it and I have often wondered why we stood looking at it; I only know that we did so stand for a couple of minutes before turning to retrace our steps to the rectory.

We had covered about half the distance, when the rector stopped and called my attention to a particular star; this led us to turn for the purpose of observing others and we noticed a red glare that made us both ejaculate "Fire!"

"Yes, there is a fire somewhere, and I believe it's at the Marshes!" cried Mr. Lawson. "We must hurry back and see what is to be done. Come along, quick!"

Sure enough Mr. Marsh's house was in flames. Some of the villagers had seen it before we had, for when we arrived we found a dozen people there and we learnt that the village engine was coming as quickly as it was possible to bring it. The house was well alight and it was a fortunate thing, said the villagers, that no one was at home.

Three or four of the men were making a half-hearted attempt to extinguish the flames by throwing pailfuls of water on the lower part of the building, but the devouring element had obtained such a hold on the ground floor that the chance of preventing the complete destruction of the building was very remote.

Those who were unable to assist employed their time in watching the progress of the flames and in speculating upon the probable cause of the outbreak. The general opinion was that a light had been left burning and had been overturned by the cat, and one of the two women who had arrived on the scene was bravely imparting this view to the rector when her remarks were cut short by a loud shout.

"Look, look! Hicks!" came from three persons at once.

We all looked up and there, through one of the windows of the upper floor and plainly visible in the light of the flames, we saw the figure of Jim Hicks. In the minds of those present the cause of the conflagration was made quite clear by this apparition; Hicks had entered the building for some nefarious purpose, knowing that the inmates were absent, and had in some way overturned the supposed light. That he was still in the burning building was explained by pointing out that he had not noticed what he had done and had been surprised by the flames while he was still hunting for money and valuables on the upper floor.

Both Mr. Lawson and I remembered that we had not noticed any light in the house, but it was quite possible that there had been one in the back room. However, it was useless to make conjectures as to the cause of the fire; it was our duty to do what we could in order to save a fellow creature from an awful death or from terrible injuries, even though that fellow creature was so unworthy a man as Jim Hicks.

The engine came up at a run and everyone set to work with a will. But we had scarcely made a beginning ere a frenzied cry close behind us told us that Dora Marsh had arrived and was calling loudly for her child. Then, like a flash the truth was made known to us, although none of us could ever explain exactly in what manner; the husband and wife had gone on a visit, leaving the child at home in charge of the servant, and the latter had put the child to bed and gone out. The terrified and weeping girl was now standing near us, bewailing her neglect of duty.

All this took less time to happen than it does to relate. I saw the mother make a frantic dash for the purpose of entering the burning building, and I helped Mr. Lawson to hold her back; her own death would have been almost certain had she been permitted to enter. Her husband, white as death had gone round to see if there was any chance of making a dash for the bed-room where the child had been left.

At this moment a wonderful thing happened; literally from a fiery furnace there staggered a man carrying a burden wrapped in a blanket. When he reached the open he stumbled a few paces and then fell flat on the ground, from which still perilous position he was quickly dragged by willing hands and strong arms. The man was Jim Hicks, severely burnt; the burden was Dora's child, safe and sound.

Jim was carried tenderly to the nearest house, where he was laid on a couch and everything possible done to soothe his wounds pending the arrival of the doctor, the man whose son he had been punished for attacking. Dora went with him, holding her child tightly to her breast, and her husband quickly followed. It was in the presence of Dora and her husband, the rector and myself, the medical man and the woman who occupied the house, that Jim Hicks regained consciousness and slowly, a few words at a time, told the story of the fire as he knew it—and something else.

The incidents connected with the conflagration were soon related. He was sauntering in the vicinity of the house—he had seen Mr. Lawson and me as we strolled about—when his attention was suddenly attracted by flames shooting up from the ground floor. At first, as he confessed, he had watched the flames with inward satisfaction; he knew that Dora and her husband were out and he had passed the servant in the street an hour previously, and he had pictured to himself the dismay of the Marshes at the destruction of their home. All at once, in the midst of his glee, he remembered that he had not seen the child either with the parents or with the servant; and he also remembered that the baby was usually left at home in charge of the latter and that on more than one occasion he had known her to visit her friends in the village and leave the baby in bed.

Then his old love for Dora, which had been momentarily dominated by fiendish satisfaction, came back in full force and he went into the house to save the child. Not being acquainted with the position of the rooms, he had lost valuable time in searching for it, but had at last succeeded in finding it and had brought it out safely, the brave deed having been performed at terrible cost to himself.

It was all for love of her. And he had done something else, too, for love of her; the crime for which he had been punished had not been committed by him, but he had suffered for it and had refrained from exposing the culprit in order to spare her. That culprit was her brother.

Hicks had seen Tom Forbes strike Munro and kneel down to rifle the young fellow's pocket; he had stopped Tom in his work, and Dora's brother, in his confusion and fear, had confessed that he had given Munro an I. O. U. for a sum of money lost at card-playing which it was impossible for Tom to raise, and he was endeavouring to extricate himself from his difficulty by robbing Munro of the paper. Hicks had released Tom and had returned to the unconscious man in order to render assistance when the labourer had appeared and Hicks had decamped lest he should be accused of the assault. The only thing that had prevented him from telling the truth when arrested was that he wished to spare Dora the disgrace that would fall upon her.

No doubt whatever as to the truth of this confession existed in the minds of any of us who heard it; the doctor had told us quietly that Hicks was dying, and I verily believe that Hicks himself knew it. There was sincerity in every word. And I may say at once that Tom Forbes himself subsequently admitted it.

"I did it for you," said Hicks feebly, his eyes fixed upon Dora with an expression of intense love such as I have never beheld before or since. "I would have done anything for you, anything! You taught me what was good, and I longed to have you for my own, to teach me always and to be with me always; and with you by my side I would have been a good man and a great man. There is nothing I wouldn't have done! And when I found I could not have you, it turned me bad. But I never left off loving you!"

He did not utter another word, but he kept his eyes, still with that expression of intense love, fixed upon the woman of his choice until they became glassy in death a few minutes later.

THE CRUELTY OF A KINDNESS.

JACK MELTON and Granger were always to be seen in deep conversation on the Cape liner Scot. Both men were of that Bohemian type that one so frequently meets with in travels, and although it required no very keen eye to pronounce them gentlemen of the first water, their hard hands and heavily lined faces spoke volumes for troubles that had been experienced. Roughing matters on the Rand, however, had certainly increased the attractiveness of the men, if at the expense of hard hands, empty stomachs, and a complete absence of anything approaching feather beds or spring mattresses and the hundred-and-one other little details which can be identified with the most humble of English homes.

From dawn to sunset, from Cape Town to Madeira, Melton and Granger kept constant company. They were called the "unnatural lovers" by some, but in truth they were the most natural of lovers in the whole world for in their rambles for fame and fortune they shared one another's joys and sorrows—in short, by their attachment they fulfilled to the letter that portion of the marriage ceremony which reads: "To have and hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish and to obey, till death do us part, according to God's holy ordinance; and there to I give thee my troth."

The Scot carried a full complement of passengers, and as soon as she took up the running and threw out her long stream of jet black smoke in sight of Table Bay preparations were made for drawing up a good programme of sports. Melton and Granger took an active part in the arrangements, and it was the appointment of Melton and myself as joint secretaries that brought me into rather close acquaintance with the pair. I imagine that I played gooseberry to an indecent extent, but I had my excuses—I was anxious to know their wanderings and what sort of luck the Cape had bestowed upon them.

A week or so on a floating hotel, with the constant humming of machinery, the lazy motion of the boat, in congenial and pleasant society, encourages sentiment among young bloods, and makes the old folks wish that old age had been left out of the category of human nature. The Scot seemed proud of her human freight and the chief engineer was growled at hourly and daily for putting in two hundred revolutions per minute. It was just the weather and under exactly the circumstances when nobody cares about record-breaking and land-sighting, when quick passages are voted obnoxious and London boards of directors as necessary evils.

We were a happy family on board, well paired on all hands, and when the word was passed that Madeira had been sighted there was much sighing, a good deal of crying and not a few promises. When a mail boat reaches port promises are as thick as the blacks emitted from the ship's funnels. But these rainbow promises are really no more than so many crumbs of comfort; still, they help to make the parting all the easier, and the formality—for such it is—is not without its happy side. The man who is wantonly profuse in his promises ought to sink his credit as much as a tradesman would by uttering a great number of promissory notes, payable at a distant date.

And the woman? Well, she really ought to be a little less ambitious as to what she will do and what she won't, for I have known cases in which such rainbow promises have misled and disheartened men whose after lives have been so much material for table talk scandal.

We disembarked several of our passengers at Madeira, and among those who took their places for a homeward voyage was a very old friend of mine who had been spending a few weeks at the Canary Isles with his beautiful daughter, a charming little woman just out of her 'teens, who had a noble face bedecked with the finest ornament woman can possess—a head of golden hair, which being parted in the middle and brought down in loose waves over the ears, was the perfecting touch to one of the most glorious pictures life was ever breathed into.

But even with sweetly pretty girls one dares to be critical at times, and if every feature and every accessory had to be analysed by the connoisseurs of physical defects, my friend's daughter would not have passed her examination unscathed because of her eyes.

Set under the most perfect of eyebrows and the most luxurious veil of eyelashes, her pale blue eyes always carried a far-away and expressionless look which, to the casual observer merely meant so much coldness of heart, to the friend, slight imperfection of sight; but to her parents and a small circle of friends spelt blindness in its most terrible form.

Only the sightless know the full measure of eternal darkness on this earth. The penalty of the affliction is in no less a degree severe upon the street beggar or the blind minstrel boy than upon those who are well-favoured in other respects; it is sometimes even more terrible but mankind is wont to be more generous with its sympathy where beauty is in distress. Afflictions are looked upon as defects. The afflicted poor may stand at our street corners and hawk their shortcomings to the charitable, but when respectability carries misfortune in its folds its owners are not so apt to air their defects. Sympathy is cheap and not an essential element, so physical defects are hidden as far as possible among the "upper ten."

Painting women in the language of the pen is not an accomplishment of mine, but it would amount to an injustice to call her, my friend's daughter, merely beautiful. To see her was to learn the passion of love.

Such was Trissy—that was her pet name—and a good deal more would be added if Melton or Granger had the penning of this account.

We were not detained long at Madeira, and when we had put to sea again and set course for Southampton I retired in search of the "lovers" to enjoy our customary lounge and smoke on the promenade deck. It was a glorious evening, a slight haze hanging over the ship like so much nuns' veiling; whilst the stars kept up a lively blinking and a full moon and a cloudless sky, made the electric lights which studded the ship's bulwarks look like so many farthing dips scattered about the boat.

I found Melton on the promenade deck. He was alone, a somewhat unusual occurrence, and sideling up to him I waited quite five minutes before he noticed my presence. He appeared to be wandering in dreamland, and when he turned towards me and made some passing remark about the weather I was struck with his nervous condition. His quivering lips spoke of some hidden trouble and when a man is in trouble he wants solitude, not sympathy—so unlike a woman. So I drew heavy on my Havanna cheroot, took note of Melton's sigh and said that I would drop across him later in the evening.

"I wish you would come to my cabin," said Melton, "Granger and I have had a little upset and perhaps you can adjust matters a little. When we were at Madeira an awfully pretty girl got on board—you know her, I believe."

"Is that the girl you mean?" I asked, as Trissy came walking in our direction. "I thought so. Let me give you an introduction. Permit me to introduce you, Trissy, to a friend of mine, Mr. Melton—Miss Allen. Will you keep Miss Allen company, Melton, whilst I get a few smokes, and have a chat with Granger? Is father quite well, Trissy?"

"Oh, yes. He's in the smoking room I believe."

"Then I will tell him where he can find his little girl," I remarked, without having the least intention of doing so; and, making my way to the lower deck found Granger in his cabin with the inevitable cigarette between his lips, a heavy frown sitting on his brow and a neatly penned letter before him.

"Granger, your lover is on the promenade deck flirting. 'Pon my soul, you two boys will be the talk of the table to-morrow evening. Granger writing neatly and Melton flirting with a girl. Really, it is shocking, old man, and if you value your reputation you will take me on the upper deck at once and insist upon my introducing you to Miss Trissy Allen, that beautiful girl I pointed out to you at Madeira. You must assert your claim to Melton and take him away."

My words did not appear to amuse or even interest Granger. I felt awkward and tried to change the subject, but my conversation was arrested by Granger who swung round in his chair towards me and remarked:

"You needn't change the subject. This attachment of Melton's interests me and you will help matters I know."

"But I was joking. Are you serious? I help! You don't mean to tell me that——"

"Precisely, my dear sir. Melton has fallen madly in love with this pretty Miss Allen. I'm going to help him win the girl; you won't refuse to put in a word to help matters with her father."

"But he has not seen the girl more than a few hours and has known her scarcely ten minutes."

"That's true, but, it does not take three hours or ten minutes to fall in love with a pretty face. Melton is younger than I, and a great deal more sensible to the bargain. We have knocked about in a rough sort of way, earning our living whilst fortune hunting in almost every half-civilised part of the globe. Relatives of mine died recently and left me a comfortable income. We decided to return to dear old London and live together as benedicts. So you see how the little scheme has been upset. Melton married, and I—oh! I shall jog back to the Rand among the boys. Melton can utilise my income. He's a good sort, and top hats and kid gloves are more in his line than mine."

"My dear Granger, top hats and kid gloves suit neither of you. London's too formal; take Melton to Coloradò, Klondyke, the Cape, anywhere, only don't speak of Miss Allen and him as lovers. You seem to take everything for granted, but the whole thing is monstrous, impossible, ghastly. Don't you know that the poor girl is blind?"

"Blind! Blind! Good Heavens, man, you don't mean that the girl, Trissy Allen, is really blind? Why, her eyes—her blue eyes, man, they're not blind?"

"Sightless, my dear Granger, sightless."

"Poor old Melton," said Granger, and burying his head in his hands he remained silent for ten minutes or more. The great beads of sorrow which trickled down his hard set face moistened my eyes, and in that little cabin were the two heaviest hearts in the whole world. Men ought not to cry, but the honest tears of a strong man are worth their weight in gold.

"You have made a mistake," said Granger, crushing back a tear, "Miss Allen that was is Mrs. So-and-So now, married since you last met. Melton must never know that she is blind—you understand. Let us get him away from her at once. You must lie to him, I can't."

So said Granger, and hooking arms we betook ourselves to the promenade deck.

Poor old Melton was looking very happy and it was evident that our intrusion annoyed him. His subtle hints were lost, however, and when I suggested escorting Miss Allen to her father his looks towards me were not kindly disposed. He whispered "cad" in my ear, and I passed him my cigar case to soothe his feelings.

"I hope my friend has not bored you," I remarked to Trissy.

"That's not charitable. He's a charming fellow, so considerate and entertaining. Tell me, does he know about my eyes?"

"Yes, I think. Your father was telling his wife at dinner."

"His wife! You said wife, didn't you?"

"Yes. Would you like to know her?"

"Oh! no, thanks!"

* * * * *

I rejoined Melton and Granger in their cabin. When Melton had finished abusing me for interfering with his tête-à-tête in such an indecent manner, I broke the "news" as gently as I could. I talked about the pity of young and pretty girls being swallowed up by rich old men and remarked upon how surprised I was to hear that Trissy was married up to some old buffer.

Melton looked at me very hard and said: "I thought you introduced her to me as Miss Allen."

"I owe you an apology, Melton. Her father has just told me that she is a Mrs. Somebody or other—an old man's darling."

Melton's whole frame quailed. He chewed the butt end of his cigar, and I never felt such a cad in all my life. He looked towards Granger as if in search of the truth. Granger was stretched out on his bunk, eyes closed and tears trickling down his ashy cheek.

"What are you crying for?" said Melton.

"It's the smoke of one of your bad cigars that's got in my eyes," replied Granger, flicking the ash off his dead cheroot.

But, Granger was crying, whilst Melton's heart bled. And that's the truth.

The Three Inseparables.

A BOARDING SCHOOL STORY.

THE three "Inseparables" were sitting in the big bay window of Dorothy Rivers' room at the Misses Primrose's Seminary for Young Ladies at Brighton, and they were looking as glum as could be. And this will seem strange when I tell you that the Christmas holidays were only ten days off, and their young heads should have been full of such joyous things as visions of home comings, pantomimes and plum puddings.

The trouble was this: Both Dorothy and Edith Howard had received a note saying that their mid-year examinations in English history and geography had been so poor that unless they were prepared to take another examination in each study before they went home for Christmas the Misses Primrose would be obliged to give them holiday work to do.

Now, to have to study during the holidays was too horrible to contemplate. It would spoil half their fun, and, moreover, it was a sort of disgrace which both girls would have felt keenly.

It was rather strange that both of them should have been found deficient in the same studies, and also strange that Ada Ward, the third of the "Inseparables," should have passed everything. It was nothing but pure luck, as she was decidedly the poorest scholar of the three.

Ada had invited both Edith and Dorothy home with her for the holidays, as Edith's home was in Scotland, and Dorothy's sole relative—her father—was still abroad.

"Isn't it too dreadful for anything!" exclaimed Dorothy, with tears in her eyes, as she gazed blankly at the note.

"I see nothing for us to do but to burn the midnight oil between now and breaking-up time," said Edith despondently.

"What! Study your eyes red and worry yourselves half to death just to please our dear teachers?" demanded Ada. "Why, I won't hear of it. So just put that idea out of your head at once."

Ada was a healthy, robust girl of fifteen, and, being older than her two friends, she had assumed a sort of guardianship over them which they did not dispute.

"All right, Ada," said Dorothy meekly. "I am not over anxious to work myself ill, but what do you propose to do?"

"Let me have till to-morrow morning to think out a plan, and I'll promise you to find a way out of your trouble."

The two worried ones had unbounded confidence in Ada's ability to get them out of any scrape, and now, with sighs of relief, they dismissed the matter from their minds and, going out in the school playgrounds, they had a merry romp till it was time to dress for dinner.

The next morning at breakfast a letter was handed to Ada. She opened it, frowned, and bit her lip. "So provoking!" she murmured.

"I trust there is nothing wrong at home, Miss Ada!" said Miss Tabitha Primrose, looking over her spectacles at her pupil.

"Why, my cousin Alice, who lives at Hove, wants me to spend a couple of days with her. She is not well and her husband is away on business. She says the carriage will be here for me in an hour or so," replied Ada, and she handed the missive across the table to Miss Tabitha.

"I am very sorry to have you miss any recitations at this time," said Miss Primrose. "But, under the circumstances, of course, fall in with your cousin's wishes."

"Thank you, Miss Primrose. I am quite sure Alice really needs me or she would not have sent this note," replied Ada, and hurrying through the meal, she excused herself, and went to her room to get ready for her departure. Here Edith and Dorothy found her ten minutes later.

"You're a nice one!" cried Dorothy, breathlessly, "running off in this fashion, when you promised to get us out of our scrape."

Ada burst out laughing.

"My dear girls," she began, "this visit of mine is simply part of my little scheme to help you out of your scrape."

Two long drawn eloquent "Ohs!" came from the other two.

Ada went to her little desk and picked up some slips of paper.

"Here, girls," she said, "take these papers. They contain a list of questions in English history and geography. Learn the answers perfectly. It won't take you long. Now, my dears," she went on, "don't be surprised at what may happen during the next two or three days. All I ask of you is to learn the answers to these questions, and give them when they are asked of you. And now, good-bye for a little while."

"But Ada!" cried Edith, "please tell us more. What does it all mean?"

"The less you know—now—the less danger there is of my little plan going amiss," retorted Ada, and not another word could her two friends draw out of her.

That night at dinner Miss Tabitha made the following announcement to the school:

"I have just received a letter from Miss Mary Evans, who is, so she informs me, a teacher in a large school for girls in the north of England. She says that she has heard of our excellent method of instruction and she is going to take the liberty—as she expresses it—of calling here to-morrow. She says she would like to spend a few hours attending our various classes with the idea of studying our methods.

"I need not tell you," Miss Tabitha added, "that I shall be most pleased to entertain Miss Evans, who, I am sure, must be an extremely nice person, judging from her letter. Of course, I trust all you young ladies will make it your special duty to be well prepared for to-morrow's recitations, as I shall naturally feel a pride in your making a good impression before a strange teacher."

Dorothy looked at Edith and Edith looked at Dorothy. Then they grew red in the face. Presently they both stole from the table and went straight for Dorothy's room.

"What can it mean?" burst out Dorothy. "You don't think that—that——"

"Oh, no! It's just a coincidence; that's all," replied Edith. "All the same, we had better study the questions Ada told us to, and to-night."

And they did, working till long past their usual bedtime. Miss Tabitha, seeing a chink of light under Dorothy's door, walked in.

"Under ordinary circumstances I should not approve of such late hours," she announced to the two girls, "but owing to the fact that you are both deficient and that we are expecting a visiting teacher I regard this studiousness as most commendable." And so saying she bestowed a faint smile on Edith and Dorothy and left them.

Miss Evans did not come the next day, much to the disappointment of the school, which had carefully prepared itself in its studies. The second day, however the lady arrived shortly after morning prayers. The maid came in and told Miss Tabitha, whereupon that excellent lady hurried down from the rostrum and went to greet her distinguished visitor.

She was gone about three minutes, when she returned, ushering in a lady of medium height, in a sober gown, and whose eyes were rather weak evidently, as she wore blue goggles. Her hair was neatly plastered down and parted in the middle in the old-fashioned way, and a very plain bonnet adorned her head. Altogether she was an intensely respectable lady, of apparently middle age. She had a wonderfully clear, ruddy skin for her years, and not a wrinkle was to be seen.

Miss Tabitha introduced her to her sister, and then Miss Primrose came forward to the edge of the rostrum, and said in impressive tones:

"Young ladies, I have the great pleasure and honour to introduce to you my esteemed fellow teacher, Miss Mary Evans, of York." A loud clapping of hands greeted Miss Evans as she stepped forward, with a smile.

"Girls," said the visitor, "it is a great pleasure to be standing here addressing you to-day." How great a pleasure it was none of her hearers knew then or ever did know except Dorothy and Edith. "I have heard a great deal about you and this excellent establishment." Here the speaker turned and smiled graciously at the two principals, who bobbed their heads and fairly beamed with gratified pride. "And I hope to-day to learn with my own ears that the good reports of your high standard of studiousness have not been exaggerated."

At that a perfect buzz went round the room, and each girl wondered with a good deal of trepidation if she would be the one to be called upon.

"I should inform you," Miss Evans went on, "that English history and geography are the branches which I am most interested in," which was perfectly true at that particular time, "and I trust the Misses Primrose will permit me to put a few questions to you at random."

Here Miss Evans turned to the two sisters. Immediately Miss Tabitha jumped up and got a couple of books, which she placed in Miss Evans's hand.

"You will find to-day's lesson marked in each book," said Miss Tabitha.

"Oh! Thank you," said Miss Evans. "But with your permission I should prefer to ask the girls some questions of the work they have gone over instead of to-day's lesson. It is so much better as a test of what they know."

There was a doleful silence at that, and the Misses Primrose looked glumly at one another, for none knew better than they how quickly their pupils forgot, and Miss Tabitha was afraid the result would not be flattering to her pride. She could not very well refuse Miss Evans's request, however, and so, rather ungraciously, she gave her consent to her scholars being examined on their past work.

Miss Evans asked a couple of questions, one of which was answered correctly, but the second floored two or three. Then Miss Evans looked at Dorothy.

"Can you give me the answer?" she asked.

Of course Dorothy could, for it was one of the questions which Ada had told them to study. Miss Tabitha beamed upon Dorothy. It was a very searching question, and she had not expected such cleverness from her. Miss Evans went on picking out difficult questions in both history and geography, and somehow it was Dorothy or Edith who answered most of them.

At length Miss Evans said she must take her departure, at which the Misses Primrose expressed their great regret. They went with her to the door to see her off, and on the way Miss Evans inquired very particularly about those two girls who were so quick with the correct answers.

"Dorothy Rivers and Edith Howard are the young ladies to whom you refer," replied Miss Primrose.

"My dear Miss Primrose," cried Miss Evans impressively, "I must congratulate you on having two such clever, intelligent girls. Quite out of the ordinary, my dear madam, quite out of the ordinary. Now, good-bye, and let me thank you for the kindness which you have shown in giving me this opportunity to study your very excellent system which has such splendid results. I have enjoyed myself immensely. In fact, I don't know when I have enjoyed myself more!"

And then Miss Evans left with considerable haste. If the Misses Primrose could have seen her after she turned the corner they would have been astonished. For the stately Miss Evans was leaning up against a fence in a fit of hysterics. When she had recovered sufficiently to proceed she picked up her skirts and ran—yes, actually ran! till finally she came to a waiting carriage. She climbed in and fell into the arms of a bright, cheery looking little woman who was evidently expecting her.

"Well," said this person. "Did it work all right?"

"Oh, Alice dear!" cried Miss Evans. "Not a soul suspected. It worked like a charm!"

And then Ada, for of course it was she, went into another spasm of laughter. It was fully half an hour before her young married cousin who had helped her to carry out her daring trick could get six words from her as to how the thing went off.

The Misses Primrose were so delighted with the credit which Dorothy and Edith had brought upon the school by reason of their excellent conduct before Miss Evans, that they excused the girls from taking the extra examination.

Needless to say, both Dorothy and Edith learnt the truth about Miss Evans. But to this day the story has gone no farther.

Princess Zenda's Eyes.

"Don't look at me like that, Zenda," a soft, sweet voice cried. "You give me the horrors! I can't tell you how I dislike it."

The speaker was Norah FitzGerald, an Irish child of twelve, whose auburn hair, blue eyes and fair round face were in curious contrast to the lovely oval face framed in soft waves of dusky hair of the little Roman Princess Zenda, her large dreamy brown eyes fringed with dark lashes which cast a shadow on the curve of a cheek rich as a pomegranate in its colouring.

"If her life's summer fulfils the promise of her life's spring, she will be the most beautiful woman in Rome," had been said of her by an old connoisseur in feminine charms, a friend of Prince di Lonza, Zenda's father.

"Look at you! Like what?" Zenda asked in a wondering voice. "You are the third person to-day who has said to me: 'Do not look at me like that!' First it was Lucia, the woman who brings the milk. She called out when she saw me, 'Don't look at me like that, Principessa!' and straightway dropped her big earthenware jar full of milk, which broke into a thousand pieces. She went away crying to get some more, grumbling the while that it was all my fault!

"Then a while after I saw Beppo, the gardener, who was going along, laden with flowers and fruit. He stopped short and cried out in just the same way, then limped off, declaring that he had sprained his ankle, and that it was all my fault!

"I ask of you now, Norah, how could either mishap be my fault? They were both accidents such as might happen to anybody. And as to my eyes, again I say, why am I not to look? And look like what? Are my eyes different from other people's eyes? Dio mio! Then in what way? Mine are brown and yours are blue, but with our eyes we both see the same things, don't we? Look, there in that chair is the Padre Bruno, our chaplain. Good, I see a white-haired old priest with the face of a saint; what do you see?"

"I see the same," said Norah, "but it's no good talking, Zenda, I don't mean seeing, I mean looking, and if that's an Irishism, I can't help it, for you have an uncanny expression in your eyes sometimes, which makes me wish to run away."

Upon which Zenda abruptly turned her back upon her; her big brown eyes—eyes which everybody seemed to object to—full of tears; then she crossed the balcony impulsively to where the old priest sat conning his breviary, oblivious to everything outside its covers, and knelt down beside him.

"Padre mio!" she said beseechingly.

The Padre laid down his book and looked at the lovely pleading face from over the top of his spectacles.

"Well, my child?" he said, and paused.

"Can you see anything the matter with my eyes?" she asked.

"The matter with your eyes?" he repeated. "Why, are they paining you?"

"No, no!" poor Zenda cried, and then told him the little story of her woes as she had told it to Norah.

The old priest waited patiently until she had finished; then he shook his head.

"The Devil's antics are strange sometimes," he said, "but your eyes——"

He looked at her again, and Zenda, all her soul in her face returned his gaze with frank simplicity.

"Child! Don't look at me like that!" he cried sharply. "It is as though the Devil himself had got inside you and looked forth from your eyes—the windows of your soul!"

Zenda clasped her hands on her knees.

"Not you too, padre mio!" she said despairingly. "What have I done to be the fit abode of evil?"

"My child," the Padre answered gravely, "it is God's most beautiful temples which Satan would fain enter and desecrate. See here—I will bless you—then go. I must finish my prayers, for presently I have to go and confess the nuns in the Convent of Santa Maria yonder."

He raised his hand and blessed her with a sweet solemnity, and Zenda rose from her knees feeling in a measure comforted, and afterwards, for many a long day she was not met with the strange entreaty:

"Princess! Do not look at me like that!"

* * * * *

The years sped by all too swiftly. Norah FitzGerald, from a little Irish girl, became a piquant beauty of eighteen, made her début in London, and in her first season, married a man who was considered the great parti of that year.

And so, she passed through the portals which lead to wifehood, motherhood, and passes also from this story, her wreath of orange blossoms still resting sweet and fresh upon her pretty Irish head.

And Zenda?

Zenda had lost her mother when she was just thirteen, and for months after that her life would have been a blank, but that at first it was full of Requiems.

By-and-bye, when the first keenness of her sorrow had worn off, she dreamt away the hours in her father's stately palace amongst her flowers and birds, except the time she spent in study with the white-haired priest, their chaplain. He was the one friend to whom she seemed to cling.

Her father, busy with many things because of the official position he held at the Vatican had little time to give his child. He hardly noticed her, until one day, her existence was very practically brought before him by Donna Lesbia.

Donna Lesbia was an old relation who lived with the Di Longas, to do the house-keeping and to keep an eye on Zenda, the motherless young girl.

She sent one day a formal message to the Prince—she wished, she said to see him immediately on business.

The Prince happened to have a spare half hour, and was in an unusually good temper owing to the success of one of his speculations.

"Tell Donna Lesbia that I shall be with her on the instant," he told the servant, and throwing away his half-smoked cigarette, he went along the passage leading to the wing occupied by Donna Lesbia and the Princess Zenda. It faced the oratory and the Padre's room and study.

Donna Lesbia was sitting near the window in a great elbow-chair of carved wood, high-backed and cushioned with green and gold brocade.

Her dignified mien and austere face frightened Zenda rather, and she ran away from her whenever she could to take refuge with Padre Bruno.

But the Donna Lesbia had a kind heart under the snow-white kerchief she wore so primly crossed over her bosom; and she also possessed a large share of common sense and a seasoning of worldly wisdom hardly guessed at by those who saw her wrapped up in her devotions, engaged in work amongst the poor, or stitching for hours exquisite things on satin with lavish use of golden thread, chiefly vestments destined for some poor parish church.

"Buono giorno, my aunt, come sta?" was her kinsman's greeting.

"I am well, thank you—and you?"

"Better than I have ever felt in my life," he told her. "And now what may the business be, my dear lady? I am ready to give you my best attention."

"That is well," said Donna Lesbia quietly, "for it is no less a matter than the marriage of your daughter."

"The marriage of my daughter! But—donna mia! You are surely joking? Zenda's marriage—that child? What nonsense!"

"She is not a child," said Donna Lesbia firmly: "You forget how time passes, Francesco; Zenda is already eighteen.

"Every morning at eight o'clock, Zenda goes to hear a mass at the church of Santa Maria there, opposite our gates, attended by her old nurse Anunziata; and every morning—so I am told by the faithful servant—the young Duke of Spolento attends the same mass.

"I should have thought that this was a mere coincidence but yesterday I received a visit of ceremony from his mother, the Duchess, who asked for your daughter's hand in the name of her son."

"The Duke of Spolento," repeated the Prince. "Good—if the child must marry, I could not wish for a better alliance. He is young, rich, handsome, distinguished—but Zenda asked already in marriage! I can't grasp the idea at all. But then, I have not seen the child for ages; send for her quickly, I want to look at her."

Donna Lesbia took up an antique silver bell which stood on a table near her and rang it. An old servant with a face like a wrinkled apple appeared.

"Anunziata, ask the Princess Zenda to be so good as to come to me here."

The old woman courtesied and withdrew, after giving a sharp glance out of her shrewd black eyes, first at her mistress then at the Prince.

"There is something in the wind," she muttered as she hobbled away to fetch Zenda, who, all unsuspecting, ran lightly along the corridor to her aunt's room still holding in her hands her favourite pet, a snow-white dove.

She paused on the threshold, holding back the heavy crimson curtain with one hand, when she saw that Donna Lesbia was not alone; then she came forward and kissed her father's hand with a cold dutifulness which vexed him.

"But I am a stranger to her," he thought. "How could it be otherwise? Goodness! How the child has grown, and what a beauty! She looks like a Madonna, too, in that plain white woollen dress with its long straight folds and jewelled girdle! Why, Aunt Lesbia," he said aloud, "she will turn half the heads in Rome—we won't speak about the hearts."

"Hush!" said Donna Lesbia softly, "the child is as simple about her beauty as is that dove she carries. Don't spoil her, I beseech you!"

"Well, well, as you will. Are you going to leave all the pretty things to be said by the husband-elect—eh?"

Donna Lesbia smiled a little and shook her head.

"What do you think of getting married, child?" the Prince asked Zenda.

"Married!—I?" said Zenda wonderingly.

"Yes, you, Zenda, my little daughter—but no, you are tall, though so slender—and—what an air! Child—how like you are to your mother!"

The Prince paused and turned aside.

If his mind was shallow in parts, it held one sacred depth—his love for his dead wife, and Zenda noticed and marvelled to see that there were tears in his eyes.

"Your hand has been asked in marriage by the young Duke of Spolento," the Prince continued. "I understand that he attends the same mass as you, my daughter—a strange coincidence truly; I am glad to hear that he is so devout!"

Zenda's lovely face flushed until the crimson wave had reached her soft dark hair.

"The Duke of Spolento!" she repeated.

"Yes—he and no other. Will you marry him?"

"Yes," said Zenda quietly and clearly, "I have seen him often and I love him."

Her father laughed.

"Good," he said. "Then it seems that though no words have passed between you, your hearts have spoken. 'Tis for all the world like some old play—only—I won't come in and ruin all things by any ill-advised tyranny, for in this case I am very willing to say:

"'Bless you, my children.' Silly child, don't look so shy, but kiss me and get back to your flowers and studies."

* * * * *

A glorious sunny day has dawned on Rome.

In a large chamber all hung with tapestry, representing in a series of pictures the Assumption and Coronation of the Virgin, Zenda stood bathed in the sunshine which poured in at her window.

Anunziata was helping her to dress.

"A plain white dress for the moment, nurse, and my prayer-book, the big black velvet one. I must go to mass as usual at Santa Maria's."

Digitized by Google

"For the last time from your father's house, Princess," murmured the old woman sadly.

"But not the last time you will attend me there," said Zenda quickly, "for Filippo—I mean the Duke—has said that I might bring you with me as my maid instead of that Margherita you know of."

"I should hope so, indeed," grumbled Anunziata, "a little flighty thing like that! But, Princess, there goes the bell. We must hasten," and mistress and maid left the palace together.

As they crossed the square to the church, a little page ran up to them with a great basket of roses.

"For the Princess Zenda," he said, "from the Duke of Spolento."

Zenda stooped to take the roses and thanked the pretty child.

"Tell your master it shall deck the altar of Our Lady," she said, and passed on into the church.

Once more, a few hours later, she stood in her big tapestry-hung chamber, a tall figure, dressed in sheeny white and pearls, her trailing draperies standing out in relief against the dark and dingy colours of the wall.

Anunziata fastened the wreath of orange blossoms about her head with a diamond clasp, adjusted the snowy veil, and murmured:

"No fairer bride has ever yet been seen in Rome."

But Zenda stood silent.

It was a joyous day for her, but she stood on the threshold of a new existence, and the knowledge added a touch of gravity to the brilliant beauty of her face, which made it even more beautiful.

At the church, the Cardinal and many other priests were in the Sanctuary, and a gathering of the fashionable world of Rome.

And the bride?

The bride walked to the altar over a pathway of crimson rose-leaves, and many people murmured like old Anunziata:

"Never has been seen a fairer bride in Rome."

The bells rang, the censers gave out their cloud of sweet incense, and presently the Princess Zenda came down the isle—a wife.

Then back to the palace swept the train of wedding guests, where the breakfast was served with all the magnificence the Prince thought fitting on such an occasion as the marriage of his only daughter.

Zenda left the table before her guests, and passing the oratory on her way to her room she went in.

Father Bruno was sitting there as usual conning his breviary.

Zenda went quickly towards him and knelt down.

"Padre mio," she said, "give me one more blessing before I take off my bride's dress! How I shall miss you—your daily blessing, your kind words."

The old priest rose and solemnly laying his hands on her head, he blessed her. Zenda stood up and paused a moment to take a last look at the saintly ascetic face.

"Child! Don't look at me like that!" the Padre cried and fell back suddenly in his chair.

"He has fainted," Zenda thought, and ran for help.

The servants came, and after one look at the Padre's face, they hurried their young mistress away, assuring her all would be well—and presently she left her home, the air ringing with "vivas," little dreaming that her old friend was dead.

When she heard, she wrung her hands and said:

"Surely I have a curse upon me."

But, by-and-bye, in her married happiness, and in the birth of her son, she found forgetfulness and peace.

Five years passed by, five years of perfect bliss to Zenda.

Her husband worshipped her and her child, a boy with sunny curls and dimples, and full of fun and laughter, was a daily source of joy.

No shadow fell on her life's pathway; all was sunshine, until one day when the Duchess Zenda was standing on a balcony watching her husband cantering up and down the great courtyard below.

He held their little son upon the saddle before him, carefully encircled with one arm.

The child was laughing gleefully, and as he passed the balcony cried out to his mother:

"On a horse, mama mia, come and see!"

Zenda went down the steps leading from the balcony to the court, her white dress trailing behind her, a bunch of roses in her hand—a gracious, beautiful woman, more lovely than ever since her motherhood.

"I come!" she cried, and the Duke reined in his horse.

"How sweet the boy looks," said she; "but be careful, Filippo, he is so small and young!"

"Careful!" he said, "of your child, Zenda—our child!"

He looked down tenderly at his wife, thinking what a picture of loveliness she made standing against the old moss-grown wall in her white dress.

"Do you know how much I love you?" he asked her.

"I am inclined to think—a great deal," she answered. "If I measure your love by mine!" and she looked up at him, all her soul in her face.

"Wife! Don't look at me like that!" he cried.

His voice, so suddenly raised, startled the horse just fresh from the stables; it plunged, reared, then reared again and fell backwards—on Filippo and the child.

* * * * *

In a stately Roman palace lives the widowed Duchess Zenda, save for her servants, all alone. She divides the time between the poor, her books, and her devotions, but never will she hear of any suitor for her hand.

She has the same words to say to one and all:

"Nay, marriage is not for me, or love, or even friendship. Men say I have the Evil Eye, and they make the 'sign' with their hands as I pass them. I do not know what truth there may be in their words, but this I know, that Satan loves to find a lodging in God's fairest temples. They tell me that I am fair! Perchance the Evil One has found a home in my eyes. Those whom I have loved, these eyes have killed—then must I no more love lest I should do more harm. It is a mystery, but God in whom I trust will set all right at last, and when the film of death o'erspreads my eyes, then they will seek and find their dear ones by the light of Heaven."

And one by one her suitors went away.

Some said: "'Tis a sad case." Others: "She is mad."

But old Anunziata stays faithfully beside her, murmuring "Aves" for her mistress all the live-long day.

The stranger passing her palace who asks:

"Tell me, who lives there?" is answered always:

"The Duchess Zenda di Spolento, beautiful to behold, good as an angel, but—your ear, Signor—she has the Evil Eye!"

And the driver crosses himself devoutly and drives on to show the visitor (with much profit to himself) the sights of Rome.

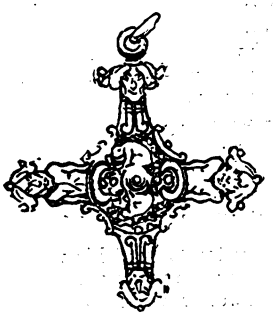
THE DEVIL'S HEIRLOOM



STANDING by the Temple of Victory on the Acropolis of Athens, just as the first glimpse of day was chasing away the blackness of night, were two young men with clean shaven faces, and that general air of breeziness which attaches itself to men who "go down to the sea in ships."

They had stumbled up the grand flight of steps—which still remain fast, although nearly nineteen hundred years have rolled away since human hands built them—to see the sun rise. They were rewarded for their early awakening, for nowhere in the world is there a more gorgeous or awe-inspiring sight.

As the globe of fire slowly lifts itself from the East, the temples and monuments of past greatness become tinged with lurid flame which softens their ruins and accentuates their beauty. Whilst one watches they go through all the changes of the rainbow until at last a pitiless wave of orange light exposes the full devastation wrought by the vandalising hands of Ancient Persians, Turks and Venetians.

The two men had started to come down when their course was arrested by an old woman who lightly touched the arm of the younger.

With the instinctive courtesy and gentleness which was part of his nature he turned to her at once.

"Come along, Ogilvie," said the other, "I don't know how you feel but the thought of breakfast appeals to me at the present moment. The lady is only desirous of selling you a portion of the Temple of Theseus made from the paving stone of modern Athens."

"All right, Wilmot, you go on; I'll catch you up."

Then, as his friend continued the descent Lieutenant Reginald Ogilvie turned to the woman and asked kindly:

"Well, mother, what is it you want?"

First casting a malignant glance at the descending figure, she faced round to the young officer, and said, in good English:

"Your friend was right; your friend was wrong. I have something to sell and something to give. To him who buys, my gift is given."

"Very well, let me see what you have," Ogilvie remarked, his curiosity piqued.

From her pocket the woman produced a good-sized emerald whose green lustre sparkled in the sun and placed it unhesitatingly in Ogilvie's hand.

"Well, is this the article for sale, or the gift?" he queried quizzingly.

"That is for sale, one shilling buys it.'

"Why so cheap?"

"It is part of the price which the last recipient paid for the gift."

"Part! May I ask what the other portion was?"

"Her life."

Ogilvie edged away a little from the woman, beginning to doubt her sanity.

"You think I am mad,' she observed in a quieter tone, "but my mind is as clear as yours. Let me show you the gift."

From another pocket the woman produced a small jewel case, and pressing the spring of the lid disclosed to view a carved cross of different shades of amber. Exquisite and patient workmanship was shown in every detail, the blending of the different shades was perfect: the ornament was unique.

Ogilvie stretched out his hand for it. But the woman drew it back jealously as she said:

"None can touch until they know its power and accept the responsibility its possession demands. Let me tell you part of its history.

"From its maker's hands it passed to Maurice Renault, a French painter of great repute. He wore it as a charm and exactly a month from the day he received it, he was seized by some mysterious malady which baffled the doctors and finally left him a mental and physical wreck. He has never painted since, and never will again. It next passed to Bella Dyson, a countrywoman of your own, who was an actress. Her principal—perhaps only—qualification for her position was her beauty. Three days after she placed it on her beautiful white bosom, a virulent attack of small-pox laid her low. She recovered, but her beauty had gone for ever.

"A father bought it for his only child, the one being in the world that he lived for. She pressed it to her lips and died of lockjaw. In her agony she hurled it from a window of the room she was in, on to the lawn. A tramp, coming up to the house to beg, found it, and considering it treasure-trove conveyed it to the wretched slum he called home. Within a week the inhabitants of that court were struggling in the fearful tortures of typhoid fever. The doctors and scientists said it was the filthy surroundings. Perhaps they aided in the general devastation, but the real cause was the 'Devil's Heirloom.'

"None can possess it without suffering misfortune. Rich and poor, it affects alike. Whatever is of most value to its holder it steals from him. Beauty, talent, wealth, love, position are the tributes it exacts. If you are possessed of none of these or possessing them, value them not, then it is content to accept your life. But it never takes life when the retention of it can be made a greater curse."

Ogilvie had been listening to the old woman's wild outburst with incredulity written on every line of his face. When she had finished he inquired why she had chosen him as a likely person to whom to pass on the doubtful present.

"Because you are an English sailor, and they are always brave," she answered. "You do not fear its malign influence, do you?" she continued eagerly. "All that I have told you is the myth of a disordered brain, is it not?" and her voice took a wheedling, coaxing tone. "Ask them down there in the town if the old English woman is not mad. They will tell you 'Yes, quite mad. She raves, she wanders in her talk, but she is harmless, quite harmless.' See the pretty bauble," and she waved the cross in front of his eyes. "You will take it and scoff at the wild talk of the madwoman like the brave officer that you are. Will you not? See, it has a pretty ribbon attached. You can slip it round your neck and wear it on your chest always, until you meet the lady you love, then you can give it to her, and she will prize the gift the more because you have worn it. Eh?"

As Reginald sat down to join him, Wilmot commenced to chaff him about the morning adventure. Quite unconcerned at the attack, the victim gave a true and particular account of what had taken place.

"I am afraid, mother, that you are calculating upon arousing the superstition which is generally ascribed to the sailor," answered Ogilvie. "That is old navy—quite obsolete. Nowadays we delight to get under way on a Friday and are positively glad to see rats deserting the ship. When steam took the place of canvas, it also chased away the old beliefs. If you care to sell your cross I will buy it. Not that I believe in the marvellous qualities for good and evil that you may ascribe to it, but because it is beautiful. Now will you take a sovereign for it?"

"Yes! yes!" she answered eagerly. "Give me the money."

"Ah, that was what you wanted," Ogilvie said, as he produced the necessary coin.

"Of course," she answered eagerly as she clutched the money. "Nothing but that. Good morning, brave English officer," and she hobbled down the Great Stair a few steps in front of him, turning at every one to look back with a hideous chuckle of joy breaking from her lips.

As she reached the bottom she waited for him, and once more adopting the wheedling tone begged him to let her place the cross round his neck.

"Oh yes, anything," he answered good-naturedly, anxious to get rid of her. So with wizened hands trembling with excitement, she fastened the ribbon and slipped the cross down behind his collar.

"There was a time when a man would have been delirious with joy if I had offered to do this," she observed as the operation was finished. "I was once known as Bella Dyson, the second victim of the cross that I told you of." Then she hobbled away, this time for good.

"What a wicked old yarn-pitcher," thought Ogilvie. "Of course it was only the money she wanted."

Perhaps he would have changed his mind on that point if he could have seen her contemptuously fling the coin he had given her to the first beggar with whom she came into contact.

When Ogilvie returned to the hotel which he and Wilmot had made their headquarters whilst on leave, he found the latter gentleman doing ample justice to the breakfast. As Reginald sat down to join him, Wilmot commenced to chaff him about the morning adventure. Quite unconcerned at the attack, the victim gave a true and particular account of what had taken place, which had the effect of sending Wilmot into a still greater explosion of mirth.

"My dear Reg," he managed to ejaculate between his outbursts, "your ingenuous 'phiz' makes you the victim of every lying guide and relic-seller who infests the ports at which H.M.S. Beetle makes a call."

"Maybe," retorted Ogilvie in a rather aggrieved tone, "but you must admit that on this occasion I have not done so badly. An emerald and a specimen of workmanship such as that cross are not dear at a guinea—are they?"

"No, I suppose not," agreed his comrade and there the matter ended.

Within six hours after their breakfast was finished they were watching the fast receding shores of Greece from the quarter deck of the Beetle as she steamed away with the remainder of the Fleet en route for Malta.

The first division of the Mediterranean Fleet had been on their usual cruise previous to settling down in Malta for a general over-haul and re-fitting, and England's principal naval base in the Mediterranean was full of excitement at the prospect of once more welcoming back that branch of the service which represents a goodly percentage of the necessary funds whereby the Maltese supply their simple wants.

But it was not only the ancient owners of the soil who were overjoyed. There were several English ladies who had willingly shared their husbands' exile from England, content to see them for the few months in the year which their ships spent in Malta. Amongst these was Mrs. Wilmot, the wife of Commander Wilmot of H. M. S. Beetle and with her, was Miss Wilmot, her husband's sister.

For two years Gertrude Wilmot had been engaged to Reginald Ogilvie and it was whispered that as soon as the Beetle's commission was finished the lady would change her name. Be that as it might we need hardly say that her face was perceptibly brighter when she remembered that within a few more hours she would be clasped in the arms of her lover.

At last from the signal station on the cliffs the Fleet was sighted. The news ran through the town like wild-fire and when the ships steamed majestically into the vast harbour to their respective moorings half the population of the Island were gathered on the quays to greet them, and the other half were dotted about on the water in "disos," as the Maltese boats are called, for a like purpose.

It was a pretty sight, quite apart from the commercial and love interests involved.

With the scarlet and blue-coated guard drawn up on the quarter-deck, and the hands not actually engaged in the mooring operations mustered at their respective quarters, ship after ship passed through the entrance to the accompaniment of cheers from the populace and booming of the guns firing the requisite salutes.

Now and then a too venturesome "diso" would get in the way of one of the warships and then an unearthly whoop from the leviathan's siren would rend the air as a warning and the offending boat promptly got to a safe distance, the sightseers in it no doubt heaving a sigh of contentment as the vast ship safely passed them.

As soon as their duties would admit Wilmot and Ogilvie hurried ashore to the ladies who were anxiously awaiting them.

Only four months had passed since they met, but to those who have dear ones exposed to the dangers of the sea the months seemed years, the days weeks.

However, when the Fleet is at Malta the ladies contrive to see a lot of their menfolk. There are afternoon receptions on the ships, official and social gatherings ashore, drives to Cettia Vecchia, an inland town, or the Roman Villa.

It was about a week after Reginald's return that the first discordant note was struck in the lover's perfect happiness.

They had been for a drive together, and on the way home Reggie had complained of a bad headache. When they arrived home Gertrude insisted upon his lying down whilst she bathed his forehead with eau de Cologne. In spite of this he gradually got worse, and at last they got him to bed and sent for a doctor.

A brief examination satisfied the medical man, and then the verdict went forth—Lieutenant Reginald Ogilvie was down with a bad attack of typhoid fever.

Contrary to the advice of everybody Gertrude insisted upon nursing him. She was a girl of strong individuality, and maintained that her place was by the sick bedside of the man who was to be her husband.

Then followed days of anxiety whilst the fell disease got to its height, and Reggie's life trembled on the border line between life and death.

But at last his splendid constitution triumphed and it was known that in all probability he would recover.

It was just after the crucial point had been passed that one of Mrs. Wilmot's servants was stopped in the street by an old woman who questioned her closely upon the condition of the young officer.

After hearing the good news the questioner pressed some coins in the girl's hand and said, eagerly,

"Is he rich, this Lieutenant Ogilvie?"

"No," answered the girl. "I believe he has very little besides his pay, but he is to marry Miss Wilmot who has a large fortune of her own."

"Not rich and not to die," muttered the old woman. "Can it have lost its efficacy at last. Impossible! And yet this man does not die, and has no fortune to lose. Tell me," she said out aloud. "Have you nursed him? Have you seen him? Does he wear on his breast an amber cross?"

The girl rather alarmed at the woman's vehemence began to move off. The woman moved after her and clutched her arm and again put her questions in a somewhat quieter tone, at the same time pressing a sovereign into the girl's hands.

"He has a blue ribbon round his neck. I saw it the other day when I made his bed. Perhaps the cross is attached to that," answered the girl.

"He wears it still and yet recovers. What does it mean?" muttered the woman as she hobbled away.

The servant on her return to the house did not mention her encounter with the woman as her conscience rather pricked her for the way she had talked of the affairs of her master's guest.

That night the mysterious cross again changed its owner.

Gertrude had of course seen it during the time she had been at the bedside of the sick man and wondered why he should wear it. She questioned him gently about it, half thinking that it might have some tender associations.

With the scarlet and blue-coated guard drawn up on the quarter-deck, and the hands not actually engaged in the mooring operations mustered at their respective quarters, ship after ship passed through the entrance to the accompaniment of cheers from the populace, and booming of the guns firing the requisite salutes.

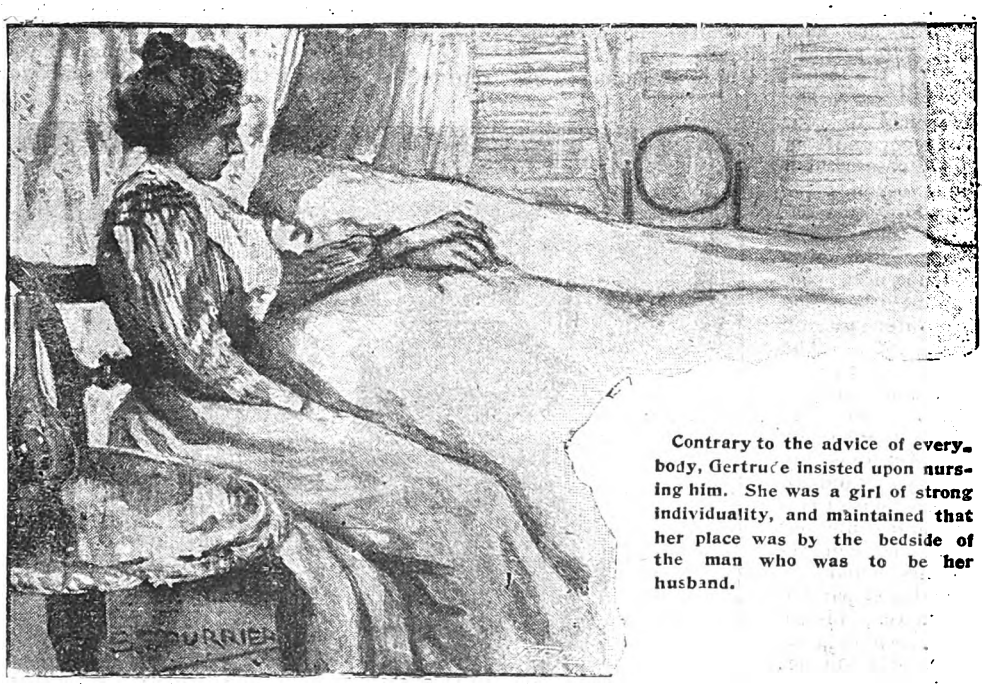
He had nearly forgotten the circumstances under which he had obtained it. The vendor's behaviour at the time had made some slight impression upon him, but the moment after he had dismissed her wild talk as the ravings of a madwoman. He had worn the yellow cross purely from motives of the utmost contempt for the old woman's jargon. The superstition that surrounded the ornament, had only excited the latent controversy in his nature at the time, and needless to say he did not attribute his late illness in the slightest degree to the charm. Consequently he saw no reason why he should not give it to Gertrude as she admired it, and accordingly he did so.



Contrary to the advice of everybody, Gertrude insisted upon nursing him. She was a girl of strong individuality, and maintained that her place was by the bedside of the man who was to be her husband.

After the transfer of the cross Ogilvie made rapid strides towards convalescence and within two months had quite regained his health and strength and was able to resume his duties on the ship.

The Fleet was by now in full preparation for the forthcoming cruise and the officers and crew of the Beetle were in high fettle because this would be the last one before they returned to England to "pay off."

Two days before they were to leave Mrs. and Miss Wilmot took passage in a P. and O. liner for England, so that they would be there to greet Wilmot and Ogilvie when they arrived.

The two men went to see the ladies off and almost the last words that Gertrude Wilmot said were to the effect that she should wear the cross Reggie had given her next to her heart till they met again.

The two men stood watching the liner until she was hull-down, then turned to go. Wilmot had to proceed on board at once but Ogilvie was free to stay ashore for a few hours.

He decided to utilise the time for a walk.

After he had strolled round Valetta for a time he made his way to the San Antonio Gardens and reaching them sat down on a seat to rest. He had been there a few minutes when a shadow crossed him, and looking up he saw that an old woman was standing in front of him. There was something familiar about her, and he tried to remember where he had seen her before.

Then there suddenly flashed across his memory that scene on the Acropolis of Athens, and a vague feeling of uneasiness took possession of him.

"I have come again, brave officer," said the woman at last, in a mocking tone.

"That fact is rather obvious," he replied in a jocular tone which belied his feelings.

"You have been ill?" she said, narrowly examining his face.

"Yes, but am quite strong again now, thank you." And he rose and stretched himself as though to corroborate his words.

"You are fortunate. The cross is not usually content with a few weeks' illness."

"Stop that nonsense," he cried angrily, remembering in whose hands the cross at present was.

"It is not nonsense. But that is not the point. I have come to buy it back. I will give you treble what you gave me."

"Even if I were willing to sell it to you I could not. It has left my hands. I have given it to the lady who is to be my wife."

"You have given it to her," the woman repeated slowly. "Then I do not want it back. At least not yet."

"What do you mean?" he said hoarsely.

"I mean that the cross will yet exact its penalty," she replied enigmatically.

A great wave of doubt swept across his mind, and he seized her roughly by the shoulders and shook her.

"Don't talk in riddles, woman, tell me outright what you mean," he almost screamed.

"I mean," she said calmly, releasing herself from his grip, "that she will die."

Then her voice lost its calmness and she seemed to tower above the stricken man like some evil genius as she reiterated in triumphant tones. "She will die! She will die! The cross always takes what is loved best. It spared your life because there was something nearer and dearer to you that it wanted. At one fell swoop you will lose her and her fortune. It never fails. It never fails. You cannot get it back for she has gone to England. She is on the sea now, perhaps wearing the cross on her white neck."

"You are mad, woman!" he exclaimed with an attempt to reassure himself.

"Do I speak like a madwoman?" she retorted. "Think of what happened to you. You recovered from an illness which came to you, after your life was despaired of. Why? Because the cross did not need you, it wanted her. She is dearer to you than life. The mere fact of living is worthless to you without her. It did not take my life, but took my beauty. It did not take Maurice Renault's life, but took the cunning of his hand—remember he painted no more. Listen, and accept your fate. She will die! She will die!"

With the triumphant words of the woman ringing in his ears the wretched man tore through the gardens like a madman.

At the gate he hired a conveyance and drove down to the quay. On the way down he tried to compose his thoughts. No doubt remained in his mind that some danger unknown, unseen, but all the more terrible on that account, lurked in the cross, and the woman he loved would, in a few hours, be placing it next to her tender body; and he was powerless to save her.

The only thing that could possibly overtake the liner was one of the swift torpedo destroyers attached to the Fleet. If only he could obtain one of these he might yet overtake the liner in time. As he reached the quay he saw one with steam up, and a wild desire to go aboard, set her engines going, and dash out of the harbour seized him, but he cast it aside as folly. As he stepped into the Beetle's boat which was waiting, he asked the coxswain if he knew where the torpedo catcher was off to.

Gertrude Wilmot was waiting in the gangway to receive him, and he pushed past the passengers and officers to her side. "The cross—you are not wearing it, darling?" he whispered.

"To Gib, with dispatches, I believe, sir," answered the man as he saluted.

To Gibraltar, the first port at which the liner would touch. It was maddening. Just a little extra pressure on her engines would enable her to catch up, and pass the liner, and he was powerless.

"The Captain was asking for you, sir, just before we left, and the Commander said would you get aboard as soon as possible," said the cox, interrupting his painful thoughts.

"Very well. Shove off at once," said Ogilvie.

When they reached the Beetle Wilmot met him at the gangway, and said:

"The Captain wants to see you at once, Ogilvie. Belson of No. 36 is ill, and she is to go to Gib with dispatches. The Admiral made a signal that we are to supply an officer to take charge in his place, and you are the one the Captain has chosen. I have told your servant to get your chest packed."

Ogilvie's heart gave a bound. No. 36 was the torpedo-destroyer which the cox of the boat had spoken of. Providence had intervened in his behalf. There was yet a chance of his being able to reach Gertrude before the cross could effect the fell work which the old woman claimed it would.

It did not take him long to interview the Captain. He was to proceed at once to the flagship to receive his instructions from the Admiral.

His servant, thanks to Wilmot's instructions, had already got his uniform out, and his chest stood ready packed in the gangway.

A few minutes more and he was being rowed to the flag-ship.

The Admiral's instructions were brief and to the point. Ogilvie was to proceed with the utmost dispatch to Gibraltar, and hand over the documents to the officer in charge of the dockyard.

"It is very necessary that the dispatch should be in his hands as soon as possible, so do not hesitate to use the coal," was the Admiral's last order. And Ogilvie, as he saluted, mentally resolved that Torpedo Destroyer No 36 should not belie her reputation as a "Flier." Within the half-hour, the torpedo destroyer was steaming out of the harbour. Once clear she was let go at full speed, and the island began to sink astern.

To Ogilvie it was a race, with life or death as the goal.

At the rate of thirty knots she tore through the sea, cutting a path for herself in the water, and tossing spray and waves over her steel deck.

Every man of her small crew knew that something extraordinary was happening, and every nerve and sinew was strained to get the best out of the slender vessel.

Down below in the stoke hole the stokers piled on coals beneath the throbbing boilers, their nerves strung up and the thumping of their hearts keeping time with the pulsating machinery. Never before had the boat moved as it was doing now.

For twenty-four hours the wild race was kept up and then at last the liner loomed up before them.

Rapidly they overhauled her, signalling her to stop.

Time is money on a liner, but her captain knew that it must be a matter of vital importance so he slowed down and Ogilvie went aboard, the liner and torpedo destroyer continuing their voyage in company, so that no time was wasted.

Gertrude Wilmot was waiting in the gangway to receive him and he pushed past the passengers and officers to her side.

"The cross—you are not wearing it, darling?" he whispered.

"Yes," she answered reproachfully. "Did I not promise that I would?"

"Yes, I know, dearest, and will explain later. But for God's sake take it off and bring it to me!"

While she had gone to her cabin Ogilvie made his way to the fore-bridge, there to apologise and explain to the liner's captain.

That gentleman was inclined to be sceptical as to the power of the cross, but suggested that the ship's doctor should examine it.

When the worthy medico received it, his first action was to chip a small portion off and place it under a powerful microscope. He had scarcely applied his eye to the glass when he sprang back with a cry of horrow.

"Good Heavens, man, you were right," he exclaimed. "There is enough typhoid bacilli in this tiny fragment to kill a dozen men."

With every precaution other fragments were chipped off and examined, and bacilli of every known contagious disease were discovered. Some fiend incarnate with an intense hatred against his fellow human beings had introduced the deadly microbes into the innocent-looking ornament. The warmth of a person's body would excite them to do their deadly work.

When this had been explained to Ogilvie he had an objection to raise to it.

"But I thought amber was a petrified gum which would not be susceptible to the comparatively small amount of heat which would emanate from a person's body," he said.

"This material is not amber," answered the doctor, "but a resinous gum which might easily be mistaken for it by the uninitiated."

"But the woman from whom I got it. How was it that she was not stricken down?"

"She was once, according to her own account, and no doubt she took particular care that it did not touch her flesh after. I should not imagine that she really knew the secret of its composition, but looked upon it as having some supernatural powers."

"Do you think Miss Wilmot will suffer any evil effects?"

"That is impossible to say; but it will be my especial care to closely watch for any signs, and rest assured we shall nip them in the bud."

Thanks to the precautions taken by the doctor and also probably to the fact that the cross had only rested on her neck for such a comparatively short time, no evil effects resulted to Gertrude. But Ogilvie had a most anxious time during the remainder of the torpedo-destroyer's journey to Gibraltar; and indeed until a cable reached him from Gertrude, to the effect that she had arrived in England, in good health.

The real maker of the "Devil's Heirloom" was never discovered; for the old woman when found was in a dying condition, and she went to her grave with the secret, if she ever knew it, wrapped in her own breast. In spite of her assertion to the contrary she was no doubt partially insane, driven so, by the terrible disaster brought on by the cross. Her mania had taken the awful form of passing on the cross to innocent people; and when its fatal work was done, regaining possession of it. She had ample means so that she was enabled to travel about, with this object in view.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of W. Pett Ridge's "Three Women and Mr. Cardwell," to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. A. Hutton, of 3 Lapage Street, Bradford. Attempts for this week's prize may deal with any subject, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 15th. Post-cards only, please.

The Paper Wouldn't Work.

A DETACHMENT of the men of the Ordnance Survey were at work in a certain district. One man had got into a field, and, on seeing the intruder climb the wall, the farmer went up to him, and the following dialogue ensued:

Farmer: "Hey, lad, out of this!"

Surveyor: "Oh, no; I have a right to go anywhere, and if you will not believe me I will show you my Government paper."

"You'll 'ave to go," persisted the farmer.

"No, I shan't!" was the reply.

The farmer went round to his sheds, which opened upon the field, and let out a vicious bovine of the masculine gender.

The bull went for the official, and he in turn did his level best to beat the record in a race to the wall, whilst the farmer, mounting a gate, yelled out to him as he fled: "Show it the Government paper, you silly!"

A Reasonable Request.

"Go to bed, sir, in the cupboard there," said an enraged Scotch father to his son, who had given him just cause of offence. "Were it not that these gentlemen are present I would give you a sound whipping, but you shall have it before breakfast to-morrow, certain."

The little rebel went to his crib with a heavy heart, and the enjoyments of the party continued until a late hour.

Just when the party was about to break up, the cupboard door was quietly pulled back, and the young offender put out his head, requesting that the sentence might be put into execution.

"Father, would ye just gie me my liks this night, for I canna sleep without them?"

"W.H.S.B."

AN inspector in one of the schools under the West Ham School Board, during an inspection, had been very pleased with the answers of the scholars in a certain class. Thinking to put a poser, he asked what the four letters "W.H.S.B." stood for, after printing them on a blackboard.

No answer for some time. At last, a sharp scholar put up a hand to reply.

"Well?" said the inspector.

"What Ho! She Bumps!" was the unexpected solution, to the great amusement of everybody.

Following Instructions.

THE boy hung back when the visitor spoke to him, and his mother was, naturally, annoyed.

"Won't you go to Mrs. Brown, Willie?" she said.

"No," replied the boy shortly.

"Don't you like me?" asked Mrs. Brown good-naturedly.

"No, I don't," answered the boy.

"Why, Willie?" exclaimed his mother reproachfully.

"Well, I got beaten for not telling the truth yesterday, and I don't mean to be to-day," protested the boy.

Very Rough.

AN Irishman had the misfortune to be commandeered by the Boers, and compelled to fight against the British, much to his disgust.

His first experience of the campaign was anything but cheerful. He was marched for hours in a pouring rain over an extremely desolate tract of country. Sometimes he was up to his knees in water and mire, sometimes barking his shins against rocks and stones, or stumbling into some hole.

Presently, he deliberately turned his back and began a retrogade movement.

"Here, where are you going?" cried a field cornet to him.

"Home!" scornfully retorted Pat. "Bedad, a country like this ain't worth fightin' for."

And home he went.

Common Sense.

RECENTLY, while travelling in Germany, an Englishman was observed to be constantly putting his head out of the window. The train was going fast, and a sudden gust of wind blew off his hat.

With an exclamation he took down his hat-box, and hurled it after his hat. Then he sat down and smiled on his fellow-passengers, but did not speak.

The Germans roared with laughter, and one of them exclaimed:

"You don't expect your hat-box to bring your hat, do you?"

"I do," said the Englishman. "No name on the hat, full name and hotel address on the box. They will be found together, and I shall get both. Do you see now?"

Then those Germans subsided, and said they always had considered the English a great and practical nation.

The Countess was her Father.

AT a certain party a young man was introduced to a lady, whom he understood to be the daughter of the Countess of Ayr.

By-and-bye he ventured to ask after her mother, the Countess.

"My father, you mean," said the lady (her mother being dead).

"No—no—no," said the bewildered youth, "I was asking after your mother, the Countess of Ayr."

"Yes," was the reply, "but that's my father."

Whereupon the young man rushed off and told his hostess that the young lady must be quite mad, as she told him the Countess of Ayr was her father.

"So he is," answered the hostess, "let me introduce you to him. He is Mr. Smith, the county surveyor."

Perfectly Correct.

A YOUNG minister, in the course of an eloquent sermon on the pomps and vanities of the world, staggered his congregation by exclaiming:

"Here am I standing preaching to you with only half a shirt on my back, while you sit there covered with gewgaws and other baubles."

The next day a parcel containing several brand new shirts was left at his house by one of his hearers, a kind-hearted old lady. Meeting the donor a few days afterwards, he thanked her exceedingly, but expressed much surprise at receiving such an unexpected gift.

"Oh!" said the lady, "you mentioned in your sermon that you had only half a shirt on your back."

"Quite true," added his reverence, "but you seem to forget that the other half was in front."

One to the Plumber.

A PLUMBER was sent to the house of a wealthy merchant to make repairs. He was taken by the butler into the dining-room, and was beginning his work, when the lady of the house entered.

'John," said she, with a suspicious glance towards the plumber, "remove the silver from the sideboard, and lock it up at once."

But the man of lead was in no wise disconcerted.

"Tom,' said he to his apprentice, who accompanied him, "take my watch and chain and these coppers home to my missus at once; there seem to be shady people about this house."

A Complete Vengeance.

AT a certain theatre, not long ago, a gentleman who gets murdered in the first act, and who subsequently turns up as foreman of the jury, was dissatisfied at the rate of stipendiary emolument wherewith his efforts were rewarded. Being unable to obtain redress, he vowed vengeance.

So the next night, when in the course of the trial in Act IV. the man who had done the deed denied all knowledge of it in the stirring words allotted to him by the collaborators, the foreman of the jury upset the calculations of everybody in the theatre by rising solemnly, and saying:

"I tell you, Simpson, you did do it. I ought to know, for I'm the very man you killed; and it's the last time you'll do it, sir, at the price I'm paid at present." Curtain.

He Didn't Pay.

AN old Scotsman, not feeling well, called upon a doctor. The doctor gave him some verbal instructions as to how to regulate his diet, advising him, among other things, to drink no spirits for a time.

The Scotsman rose to leave, when the doctor said:

"I am in the way of charging for my advice. I will trouble you for half-a-crown."

"Oh, maybe," said the patient, "but I'm no gaun to tak' yer advice!"

Why the Goods were Broken.

PAT MALONY was nailing a box which he intended sending by rail. It was essential that the box should not be inverted during the passage, and a friend ventured to suggest to Pat to write conspicuously on the case:

"This side up, with care."

A few days afterwards seeing Pat, he asked:

"Heard any more about your goods? Did they get there safely?"

"Every one of them broke," said Pat.

"The whole lot? Did you label it 'this side up,' as I told you?"

"Yes, I did. And for fear they shouldn't see it on the cover, I put it on the bottom."

After the Opera.

EXCITED AUDITOR: "I declare, I never saw such wretchedly bad taste—such a scandalous violation of the dramatic unities—such an outrage on all sense of propriety!"

Friend: "What's the matter, old man? Some of 'em been gagging again?"

Excited Auditor: "Gagging isn't a circumstance to it. The opera was William Tell—a grand thing, you know — and just as the curtain rose on the scene displaying the hat of the tyrant Gesler on a pole, to which the hero refuses to bow, what does that wretched orchestra do but strike up 'Where did you get that hat?' Destroyed all the romantic illusion of the piece. Soulless brutes!"

The King and the Seidlitz Powders.

ON the first consignment of seidlitz powders reaching the capital of Delhi the monarch was deeply interested in the accounts of their refreshing qualities. A box was brought to the King in full Court, and the interpreter explained how they should be used.

Into a goblet he put the contents of twelve blue papers, and having added water the King drank it off. This was the alkali, and the royal countenance expressed no sign of satisfaction.

It was then explained that in the combination of the two powders lay the luxury; so the twelve white powders were quickly dissolved in water, and as eagerly swallowed by his Majesty with a shriek that will be remembered while Delhi exists.

The monarch rose, staggered, exploded, and in his full agonies screamed, "Hold me down!" then rushing from the throne, fell prostrate on the floor. There he lay during the long-continued effervescence of the compound, spurting like ten thousand pennyworths of Imperial pop, and believing himself in the agonies of death—a melancholy and humiliating proof that kings are mortal.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH

CHAPTER LVI.

The Coming of the Bride.

The isolated building near which the Ithuriel had come to rest was used ostensibly as a shooting and hunting-box by Michael Roburoff and a couple of his friends, and in reality as a meeting-place for the Inner Circle or Executive Council of the American Section of the Brotherhood. This Section was, numerically speaking, the most important of the four branches into which the Outer Circle of the Brotherhood was divided—that is to say, the British, Continental, American, and Colonial Sections.

All told, the Terrorists had rather more than five million adherents in America and Canada, of whom more than four millions were men in the prime of life and nearly all of Anglo-Saxon blood and English speech. All these men were not only armed but trained in the use of fire-arms to a high degree of skill. Their organisation, which had gradually grown up with the Brotherhood for twenty years, was known to the world only under the guise of the different forms of industrial unionism, but behind these there was a perfect system of discipline and command which the outer world had never even suspected.

The Section was divided first into squads of ten under the command of an eleventh who alone knew the leaders of the other squads in his neighbourhood. Ten of these squads made a company commanded by one man who was only known to the squad-captains, and who alone knew the captains of the regiment, which was composed of ten companies.

The next step in the organisation was the brigade, consisting of ten regiments, the captains of which alone knew the commander of the brigade, while the commanders of the brigades, were alone acquainted with the members of the Inner Circle or Executive Council which managed the affairs of the whole Section, and whose Chief was the only man in the Section who could hold any communication with the Inner Circle of the Brotherhood itself, which, under the immediate command of Natas, governed the whole organisation throughout the world.

This description will serve for all the Sections, as all were modelled upon exactly the same plan. The advantages of such an organisation will at once be obvious. In the first place, no member of the rank and file could possibly betray more than ten of his fellows, including his captain, while his treachery could, if necessary, be made known in a few hours to ten thousand others, not one of whom he knew, and thus it would be impossible for him to escape the invariable death penalty. The same is, of course, equally true of the captains and the commanders.

On the other hand, the system was equally convenient for the transmission of orders from head-quarters. An order given to ten commanders of brigades could, in a single night, be transmitted individually to the whole of the Section, and yet those in command of the various divisions would not know whence the orders came, save as regards their immediate superiors.

It will be necessary for the reader to bear these few particulars in mind in order to understand future developments which, without them, might seem to border on the impossible. It is only necessary to add that the full fighting strength of the four Sections of the Brotherhood amounted to about twelve millions of men, a considerable proportion of whom were serving as soldiers in the armies of the League and the Alliance, and that in its cosmopolitan aspect it was known to the rank and file as the Red International, whose members knew each other only by the possession of a little knot of red ribbon tied into the button-hole in a peculiar fashion on occasions of meetings for instruction or drill.

The three lights burning in the form of a triangle in the window of the house were a pre-arranged signal to avoid mistake on the part of those on board the air-ship. When they reached the earth Arnold, acting under the instructions of Tremayne, who was his superior on land though his voluntary subordinate when afloat, left the Ithuriel and her crew in charge of Lieutenant Marston and Andrew Smith, the coxswain.

The remainder disembarked, and then the air-ship rose from the ground and ascended out of sight through a layer of clouds that hung some eight hundred feet above the high ground of the hills. Lieutenant Marston's orders were to remain out of sight for an hour and then return.

Arnold had not seen Natasha for several hours previous to the landing, and he noticed with wonder, by no means unmixed with something very like anger, that she looked a great deal more cheerful than she had done during the voyage. She had preserved her composure all through, but the effort of restraint had been visible. Now this had vanished, although the supreme hour of the sacrifice that her father had commanded her to make was actually at hand. When her feet touched the earth she looked round with a smile on her lips and a flush on her cheeks, and said, in a voice in which there was no perceptible trace of anxiety or suffering:

"So this is the place of my bridal, is it? Well, I must say that a more cheerful one might have been selected, yet perhaps, after all, such a gloomy spot is more suitable to the ceremony. Come along, I suppose the bridegroom will be anxiously waiting the coming of the bride. I wonder what sort of a reception I shall have. Come, my Lord of Alanmere, your arm, and you, Captain Arnold, bring the Princess. We have a good deal to do before it gets light."

These were strange words to be uttered by a girl who but a few hours before had voluntarily confessed her love for one man and was on the eve of compulsorily giving herself up to another one. Had it been anyone else but Natasha Arnold could have felt only disgust, but his love made it impossible for him to believe her guilty of such unworthy lightness as her words bespoke, even on the plain evidence before him, so he simply choked back his anger as best he might, and followed towards the house speechless with astonishment at the marvellous change that had come over the daughter of Natas.

Tremayne knocked in a peculiar fashion on the window, and then repeated the knock on the door, which was opened almost immediately.

"Who stands there?" asked a voice in French.

"Those who bring the expected bride," replied Tremayne in German.

"And by whose authority?" This time the question was in Spanish.

"In the Master's name," said Tremayne in English.

"Enter! you are welcome."

A second door was now opened inside the house, and through it a light shone into the passage. The four visitors entered, and, passing through the second door, found themselves in a plainly-furnished room, down the centre of which ran a long table, flanked by five chairs on each side, in each of which, save one, sat a masked and shrouded figure exactly similar to those which Arnold had seen when he was first introduced to the Council Chamber in the house on Clapham Common. In a chair at one end of the table sat another figure similarly draped.

The door was closed as they entered, and the member of the Circle who had let them in returned to his seat. No word was spoken until this was done. Then Natasha, leaving her three companions by the door, advanced alone to the lower end of the table.

As she did so Arnold for the first time noticed that she carried her magazine pistol in a sheath at her belt. He and Tremayne were, as a matter of course, armed with a brace of these weapons, but this was the first time that he had ever seen Natasha carry her pistol openly. Wondering greatly what this strange sign might mean, he waited with breathless anxiety for the drama to begin.

As Natasha took her stand at the opposite end of the table, the figure in the chair at the top rose and unmasked, disclosing the pallid countenance of the Chief of the American Section. He looked to Arnold anything but a bridegroom awaiting his bride and the ceremony which was to unite him to her for ever. His cheeks and lips were bloodless, and his eyes wandered restlessly from Natasha to Tremayne and back again. He glanced to and fro in silence for several moments, and when he at last found his voice he said, in half-choked, broken accents:

"What is this? Why am I honoured by the presence of the Chief and the Admiral of the Air? I asked only that if the Master consented to grant my humble petition in reward for my services, the daughter of Natas should come attended simply by a sister of the Brotherhood and the messenger that I sent."

They let him finish, although it was with manifest difficulty that he stammered to the end of his speech. Arnold, still wondering at the strange turn events had taken, saw Tremayne's lips tighten and his brows contract in the effort to repress a smile. The other masked figures at the table moved restlessly in their seats, and glanced from one to another. Seeing this, Tremayne stepped quickly forward to Natasha's side, and said in a stern, commanding tone:

"I am the Chief of the Central Council, and I command everyone here to keep his seat and remain silent until the daughter of Natas has spoken."

The ten masked and hooded heads instantly bowed consent. Then Tremayne stepped back again, and Natasha spoke. There was a keen, angry light in her eyes, and a bright flush upon her cheek, but her voice was smooth and silvery and in strange contrast to the words that she used, almost to the end.

Did you think, Michael Roburoff, that the Master of the Terror would send his daughter to her bridal so poorly escorted as you say? Surely that would have been almost as much a slight as you put upon me when, instead of coming to woo me as a true lover should have done, you contented yourself with sending a messenger as though you were some Eastern potentate despatching an envoy to demand the hand of the daughter of a vassal.

"It would seem that this sudden love which you do me the honour to profess for me has destroyed your manners as well as your reason. But since you have assumed so high a dignity it is not seemly that you should stand to hear what I have to say; sit down, for it looks as though standing were a trouble to you."

Michael Roburoff, who by this time could scarcely support himself on his trembling limbs, sank suddenly back into his chair and covered his face with his hands.

"That is not very lover-like to cover your eyes when the bride that you have asked for is standing in front of you, but as long as you don't cover your ears as well I will forgive you the slight. Now listen.

"I have come, as you see, and I have brought with me the answer of the Master to your request. Until an hour ago I did not know what it was myself, for, like the rest of the faithful members of the Brotherhood, I obey the word of the Master blindly.

"You, as it would appear, maddened by what you are pleased to call your love for me, have dared to attempt to make terms where you swore to obey blindly to the death. You have dared to place me, the daughter of Natas, in the balance against the allegiance of the American Section on the eve of the supreme crisis of its work, thus imperilling the results of twenty years of labour.

"If you had not been mad you would have foreseen the results of such treachery. As it is you must learn them now. What I have said has been proved by your own hand, and the proof is here in the hand of the Chief. This is the answer of Natas to the servant who would have betrayed him in the hour of trial.'

She took a folded paper from her belt as she spoke, and, unfolding it, read in clear, deliberate tones:

> "Michael Roburoff, late chief of the American Section of the Brotherhood. When you joined the Order, you took an oath to obey the directions of its chiefs to the death, and you acknowledged that death would be the just penalty of perjury. My orders to you were to complete the arrangements for bringing the American Section into action when you received the signal to do so. Instead of doing that, you have sought to bargain with me for the price of its allegiance. That is treachery, and the penalty of treachery is death.
> "NATAS."

"Those are the words of the Master," continued Natasha, throwing the paper down upon the table with one hand, and drawing her pistol with the other. "It rests with the Chief to say when and where the sentence of the Master shall be carried out."

"Let it be carried out here and now," said Tremayne, "and let him who has anything to say against it speak now or for ever hold his peace."

The ten heads bowed once more in silence, and Natasha went on, still addressing the trembling wretch who sat huddled in the chair in front of her.

"You have asked for a bride, Michael Roburoff, and she has come to you, and I can promise you that you shall sleep soundly in her embrace. Your bride is Death, and I have chosen to bring her to you with my own hand that all here may see how the daughter of Natas can avenge an insult to her womanhood.

"You have been guilty of treachery to the Brotherhood and for that you might have been punished by any hand, but you would also have condemned me to the infamy of a loveless marriage, and that is an insult that no one shall punish but myself. Look up, and, if you can, die like a man."

Roburoff took his hands from his face, and with an inarticulate cry started to his feet. The same instant Natasha's hand went up, her pistol flashed, and he dropped back again into his chair with a bullet in his brain. Then she replaced the pistol in her belt, and going up to Arnold held out both her hands and said as he clasped them in his own:

"If the Master's reply had been different that bullet would by this time have been in my own heart."

CHAPTER LVII.

THE CAPTURE OF A CONTINENT.

WITHIN an hour after the execution of Michael Roburoff the Ithuriel was winging her way back to Aeria, and at least two of her company were anticipating their return to the valley with feelings very different from those with which they had contemplated their departure.

When the last farewells and congratulations had been spoken, and the air-ship rose from the earth, Tremayne returned to the house to commence forthwith the great task which now devolved upon him, for in addition to being Chief of the Central Executive, he now assumed the direct command of the American Section, which, after long consideration, had been selected as the nucleus of the Federation of the English-speaking peoples of the world.

For a fortnight he worked almost night and day, attending to every detail with the utmost care, and bringing into play all those rare powers of mind which in the first instance had led Natas to select him as the visible head of the Executive. In this way the chief consequence of the love-madness of Roburoff had been to place at the head of affairs in America the one man of all others most fitted by descent and ability to carry out such a work, and to this fact its complete success must in a great measure be attributed.

So perfectly were his plans laid and executed, that right up to the moment when the signal was given and the plans became actions, American society went about its daily business without the remotest suspicion that it was living on the slope of a slumbering volcano whose fires were so soon to burst forth and finally consume the social fabric which, despite its splendid exterior, was inwardly as rotten as were those of Rome and Byzantium on the eve of their fall.

On the 1st of October the cables brought the news of the fall of the Quadrilateral, the storming of Hamburg, and the retreat of the British forces on Antwerp. Four days later came the tidings of a great battle under the walls of Antwerp, in which the British and German forces, outnumbered ten to one by the innumerable hosts of the League, had suffered a decisive defeat which rendered it imperative for them to fall back upon the Allied Fleets in the Scheldt, and to leave the Netherlands to the mercy of the Czar and his allies, who were thus undisputed masters of the continent of Europe.

This last and crowning victory had been achieved by exactly the same means which had accomplished all the other triumphs of the campaign, and therefore there will be no need to enter into any detailed description of it. Indeed, the fall of the Quadrilateral and the defeat of the last army of the Alliance round Antwerp would have been accomplished much more easily and speedily than it had been but for the fact that the weather, which had been fine up to the end of July, had suddenly broken, and a succession of violent storms and gales from the north and north-west had made it impossible for the war-balloons to be brought into action with any degree of effectiveness.

During the last week of September the storms had ceased and then the work of destruction began. Not even the hitherto impregnable fortresses of Tournay, Mons, Namur, and Liege, had been able to withstand the assault from the air any better than the forts of Berlin, or the walls of Constantinople. A day's bombardment had sufficed to reduce them to ruins, and, the chain once broken, the armies of the League swept in wave after wave across the plains which they had guarded.

The loss of life had been unparalleled even in this, the greatest of all wars, for the British and Germans had fought with a dogged resolution which, but for the vastly superior numbers and the irresistible means of destruction employed against them, must have infallibly triumphed. As it was it was only when valour had achieved its last sacrifice, and further resistance became rather madness than devotion, that the retreat was finally sounded in time to embark the remnants of the armies of the Alliance on board the war-ships. Happily at the very hour when this was being done the weather broke again, and the ships of the allied fleets were therefore able to make their way to sea through storm and darkness unmolested by the war-balloons.

On the night of the fifth of September the five words: "The hour and the man," went flying over the wires from Washington throughout the length and breadth of the North American Continent. The next morning half the industries of the United States were paralysed; all the lines of communication by telegraph and rail between the east and west were severed, the shore ends of the Atlantic cables were cut, no newspapers appeared, and every dockyard on the eastern coast was in the hands of the Terrorists.

To complete the stupor produced by this swift succession of astounding events, when the sun rose an air-ship was seen floating high in the air over the ten arsenals of the United States—that is to say, over Portsmouth, Charlestown, Brooklyn, League Island, New London, Washington, Norfolk, Pensacola, Mare Island, and Port Royal, while two others held Chicago and St. Louis, the great railway centres for the west and south, at their mercy, and the Ithuriel, with a broad red flag flying from her stern, swept like a meteor along the eastern coast from Maine to Florida.

To attempt to describe the condition of frenzied panic into which the inhabitants of the threatened cities, and even the whole of the Eastern States were thrown by the events of that ever-memorable morning, would be to essay an utterly hopeless task. From the millionaire in his palace to the outcasts who swarmed in the slums, not a man or a woman kept a cool head save those who were in the councils of the Terrorists. The blow had fallen with such stupefying suddenness that, as far as America was concerned, the Revolution was practically accomplished before anyone very well knew what had happened.

Out of the midst of an apparently peaceful and industrious population five millions of armed men had sprung in a single night. Factories and workshops had opened their doors, but none entered them; ships lay idle by the wharves; offices were deserted; and the great reels of paper hung motionless beside the paralysed machines which should have converted them into newspapers.

It was not a strike, for no mere trade organisation could have accomplished such a miracle. It was the force born of the accumulation of twenty years of untiring labour striking one mighty blow which shattered the commercial organism of a Continent in a single instant. Those who had been clerks or labourers yesterday, patient, peaceful, and law-abiding, were to-day soldiers, armed and disciplined, and obeying with automatic regularity the unheard command of some unknown chief.

This of itself would have been enough to throw the United States into a panic, but, worse than all, the presence of the air-ships holding at their mercy the arsenals and the richest cities in the Eastern States proved that, tremendous and all as it was, this was only a phase of some vast and mysterious cataclysm which might as easily involve the whole civilised world as it could overwhelm the United States of America.

By noon, almost without striking a blow, every dynamite cruiser and war-ship on the eastern coast had been seized and manned by the Terrorists. To the dismay of the authorities, it was found that more than half the army and navy, officers and men alike, had obeyed the mysterious summons that had gone throughout the land the night before, and matters reached a climax when, as the clocks of Washington were striking twelve, the President himself was arrested in the White House.

All the streets of Washington were in the hands of the Terrorists, and at one o'clock Tremayne, after posting guards at all the approaches, entered the Senate, and in the name of Natas proclaimed the constitution of the United States null and void and the existing Government dissolved.

Then with a copy of the Constitution in his hand he proceeded to the steps of the Capitol, and, in the presence of a vast throng of the armed members of the American Section, he proclaimed the Federation of the English-speaking races of the world, in virtue of their bonds of kindred blood and speech and common interests; and amidst a scene of the wildest enthusiasm called upon all who owned those bonds to forget the artificial divisions that had separated them into hostile nations and communities, and to follow the leadership of the Brotherhood to the conquest of the civilised world.

Then in a few strong and simple phrases he exposed the subservience of the Government to the capitalist Ring and, described the inhuman compact that it had entered into with the arch-enemies of national freedom and personal liberty to crush the mother-land of the Anglo-Saxon nations, and for the sake of sordid gain to rivet the fetters of oppression upon the limbs of the race which for a thousand years had stood in the forefront of the battle for freedom.

As he concluded his appeal, one mighty shout of wrath and execration rose up to Heaven from a million throats. He waited until this died away into silence, then, raising the copy of the Constitution above his head, he cried in clear ringing tones:

"For a hundred and fifty years this has been boasted as the bulwark of liberty and used as the instrument of social and commercial oppression. The Republic of America has been governed, not by patriots and statesmen, but by millionaires and their hired political puppets. It is therefore a fraud and a sham, and deserves no longer to exist!"

So saying, he tore the paper into fragments and cast them into the air amidst a storm of cheers and volley after volley of musketry. While the enthusiasm was at its height the Ithuriel suddenly swept downwards from the sky in full view of the mighty assemblage that swarmed round the Capitol. She was greeted with a roar of wondering welcome, for her appearance was the fulfilment of a promise upon which the success of the Revolution in America had largely depended.

This was the promise, issued by Tremayne several days previously through the commanders of the various divisions of the Section, that as soon as the Anglo-Saxon Federation was proclaimed and accepted in America, the whole Brotherhood throughout the world would fall into line with it and place its aerial navy at the disposal of its leaders. Practically this was giving the empire of the world in exchange for a money-despotism of which everyone save the millionaires and their servants had become heartily sick.

There were few who in their hearts did not believe the Republic to be a colossal fraud, and therefore there were few who regretted it.

The Ithuriel passed slowly over the heads of the wondering crowd and came to a standstill alongside the steps on which Tremayne was standing. The crowd saw a man on the deck shake hands with Tremayne and give him a folded paper. Then the air-ship swept gracefully upwards again in a spiral curve until she hung motionless over the dome of the Capitol.

Amidst a silence born of breathless interest to know the import of this message from the sky, Tremayne opened the paper, glanced at its contents, and handed it to the senior officer in command of the brigades, who stood beside him.

This man, a veteran who had grown grey in the service of the Brotherhood, advanced with the open paper in his hand and read out in a loud voice:

"Natas sends greeting to the Brotherhood in America. The work has been well done, and the reward of patient labour is at hand. This is to name Alan Tremayne, Chief of the Central Executive, first President of the Anglo-Saxon Federation throughout the world, and to invest him with the supreme authority for the ordering of its affairs. The aerial navy of the Brotherhood is placed at his disposal to co-operate with the armies and fleets of the Federation.

"NATAS."

When the mightly shout of acclamation which greeted the reading of this commission had died away, Tremayne stepped foward again and spoke the few words that now remained to be said:

"I accept the office and all that it implies. The fate of the world lies in our hands, and as we decide it so will the future lot of humanity be good or evil. The armies of the Franco-Slavonian League are now masters of the continent of Europe, and are preparing for the invasion of Britain. The first use that I shall make of the authority now vested in me will be to summon the Czar in the name of the Federation to sheath the sword at once and relinquish his designs on Britain. The moment that one of his soldiers sets foot on the sacred soil of our mother-land I shall declare war upon him, and it shall be a war not of conquest, but of extermination, and we will make an end of tyranny on earth for ever.

"Now let those who are not on guard-duty go to their homes, and remember that they are now citizens of a greater realm than the United States and endowed with more than national duties and responsibilities. Let every man's person and property be respected, and let the penalty of all violence be death. Those who have plotted against the public welfare will be dealt with in due course, and yonder air-ship will be despatched with our message to the Czar at sundown. Long live the Federation!"

Millions of throats took up the cry as the last words left his lips until it rolled away from the Capitol in mighty waves of sound, flowing along the crowded streets and overrunning the utmost confines of the capital.

Thus, without the loss of a hundred lives and in a space of less than twelve hours, was the Revolution in America accomplished. The triumph of the Terrorists was as complete as it had been unexpected. Menaced by air and sea and land, the great centres of population made no resistance, and, when they learnt the true object of the Revolution, wanted to make none. No one really believed in the late Government, and everyone in his soul hated and despised the millionaires.

There was no bond between them and their fellow-men but money, and the moment that was snapped they were looked upon in their true nature as criminals and outcasts from the pale of humanity. By sundown, when the Ithuriel left for the seat of war, the members of the Ring and those of the late Government who refused to acknowledge the Federation were lodged in prison, and news had been received from Montreal that the simultaneous rising of the Canadian Section had been completely successful, and that all the railways and arsenals and ships of war were in the hands of the Terrorists, so completing the capture of the North American Continent.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE DAY OF RECKONING.

THE President of the Federation and his faithful subordinates went to work without losing an hour to reorganise as far as was necessary, the internal affairs of the Continent of which they had so suddenly become the undisputed masters. There was some trouble with the British authorities in Canada, who, from mistaken motives of duty to the mother country, at first refused to recognise the Federation.

The consequence of this was that Tremayne went north the next day and had an interview with the Governor-General at Montreal. At the same time he ordered six air-ships and twenty-five dynamite cruisers to blockade the St. Lawrence and the eastern ports. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the telegraph lines to the west were already in the hands of the Terrorists, and a million men were under arms waiting his commands.

A very brief explanation, therefore, sufficed to show the Governor that forcible resistance would not only be the purest madness, but that it would also seriously interfere with the working of the great scheme of the Federation, the object of which was, not merely to keep Britain in the first place among the nations, but to make the Anglo-Saxon race the one dominant power in the whole world.

To all the Governor's objections on the score of loyalty to the British Crown, Tremayne, who heard him to the end without interruption, simply replied in a tone that precluded all further argument:

"The day of states and empires, and therefore of loyalty to sovereigns, has gone by. The history of nations is the history of intrigue, quarrelling, and bloodshed, and we are determined to put a stop to warfare for good and all. We hold in our hands the only power that can thwart the designs of the League and avert an era of tyranny and retrogression. That power we intend to use whether the British Government likes it or not.

"We shall save Britain, if necessary, in spite of her rulers. If they stand in the way, so much the worse for them. They will be called upon to resign in favour of the Federation and its executive within the next seven days. If they consent, the forces of the League will never cross the Straits of Dover. If they refuse we shall allow Britain to taste the results of their choice and then settle the matter in our own way."

The next day the Governor dissolved the Canadian Legislatures "under protest," and retired into private life for the present. He felt that it was no time to argue with a man who had millions of men behind him, to say nothing of an aerial fleet which alone could reduce Montreal to ruins in twelve hours.

After arranging matters in Canada the President returned to Washington in the Ariel, which he had taken into his personal service for the present, and set about disposing of the Ring and those members of the late Government who were most deeply implicated in the secret alliance with the leaders of the League. When the facts of this scheme were made public they raised such a storm of popular indignation that if those responsible for it had been turned loose in the streets of Washington they would have been torn to pieces like vermin.

As it was, however, they were placed upon their trial before a Commission of seven members of the Inner Circle of the American Section presided over by the President. Their guilt was speedily proved beyond the shadow of a doubt. Documents, memoranda, and telegrams were produced by men who had seemed their most trusted servants, but who in reality, had been members of the Brotherhood told off to unearth their schemes.

Cyphers were translated which showed that they had practically sold the resources of the country in advance to the Czar and his allies, and that they were only waiting the signal to declare war without warning and without cause upon Britain, blockade her ports, and starve her into surrender and acceptance of any terms that the victors might choose to impose. Last of all the terms of the bargain between the League and the Ring were produced, signed by the late President and the Secretary of

SOLVING THE LAND PROBLEM.

Twenty-five years ago an attempt was made in the village of Histon, near Cambridge, to solve the problem, how to make land pay in the face of foreign competition? The country was then at one of its educational epochs. We were being taught the vast food and health value of fruit. Incidentally, also, we were slowly gaining the knowledge that pure sugar, properly treated, was one of the greatest nutrients, in a small compass, with which man has been blessed. Further, that sugar and fruit in combination—when the latter is fresh, ripe and luscious—makes a most valuable addition to our daily dietary, especially to that of children. So that at the time above referred to, the importance of growing fruit for jam and fruit flavouring was then attracting attention. The firm gradually expanded until they are now the largest fruit-cultivating jam and jelly makers in Great Britain. The watchwords have been, pure and fresh material, with the most positive cleanliness in the manufacturing processes. And as Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are prepared from the best obtainable materials, and as their delicious flavours are real fruit juices expressed by the firm themselves from fruit grown under their own care, we cannot wonder that Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies have the largest sale and greatest popularity. Dr. Andrew Wilson writes: "Chivers' Jellies cannot be surpassed," Great Thoughts observes: "The flavour and purity cannot be excelled." Irish Society says: "These Jellies far supersede other makes."

Sold by Grocers and Stores in packets, Half-pints 2½d., Pints 4½d., Quarts, 8d. A free sample will be sent on receipt of Post-card. S. Chivers & Sons, Histon, Cambridge. Please mention this paper.

State, and countersigned by the Russian Minister at Washington.

The Court sat for three days, and re-assembled on the fourth to deliver its verdict and sentence. Fifteen members of the late Government, including the President, the Vice-President, and the Secretary of State, and twenty-four great capitalists composing the Ring, were found guilty of giving and receiving bribes, directly and indirectly, and of betraying and conspiring to betray the confidence of the American people in its elected representatives, and also of conspiring to make war without due cause on a friendly Power for purely commercial reasons.

At eleven o'clock on the morning of the 9th of October the President of the Federation rose in the Senate House, amidst breathless silence, to pronounce the sentence of the Court.

"All the accused," he said, speaking in slow, deliberate tones, "have been proved guilty of such treason against their own race and the welfare of humanity as no men ever were guilty of before in all the disreputable history of statecraft.

"In view of the suffering and misery to millions of their fellow men, and the irreparable injury to the cause of civilisation that would have resulted from the success of their schemes, it would be impossible for human wit to devise any punishment which in itself would be adequate. The sentence of the Court is the extreme penalty known to human justice—Death!"

A shudder passed through the vast assembly as he pronounced the ominous word, and the accused, who but a few days before had looked upon the world as their footstool, gazed with blanched faces and terror-stricken eyes upon each other. He paused for a moment, and looked sternly upon them. Then he went on:

"But the Federation does not seek a punishment of revenge but of justice, nor shall its first act of government be the shedding of blood, however guilty. Therefore as President I override the sentence of death, and instead condemn you, who have been proved guilty of this unspeakable crime, to confiscation of the wealth that you have acquired so unscrupulously and used so mercilessly, and to perpetual banishment with your wives and families, who have shared the profits of your infamous traffic.

"You will be at once conveyed to Kodiak Island, off the coast of Alaska, and landed there. Once every six months you will be visited by a steamer, which will supply you with the necessaries of life, and the original penalty of death will be the immediate punishment of any one of you who attempts to return to a world of which you from this moment cease to be citizens."

The sentence was carried out without an hour's delay. The exiles, with their wives and families, were placed under a strong guard in a special train, which conveyed them from Washington *vi*á St. Louis, to San Francisco, where they were transferred to a steamer which took them to the lonely and desolate island in the frozen North which was to be their home for the rest of their lives. They were followed by the execrations of a whole people and the regrets of none save the money-worshippers who had respected them, not as men, but as incarnations of the purchasing power of wealth.

The huge fortunes which they had amassed, amounting in the aggregate to more than three hundred millions in English money, were placed in the public treasury for the immediate purposes of the war which the Federation was about to wage for the empire of the world. All their real estate property was transferred to the various municipalities in which it was situated, and their rents devoted to the relief of taxation, while the railways and other enterprises which they had controlled were declared public property and placed in the hands of boards of management composed of their own officials.

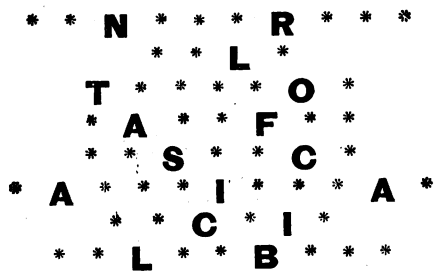
The Brain Gymnasium.

ON this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," will appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set will be comparatively easy of solution, while others will be designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In each of the competitions a prize of ten shillings will be awarded to the sender of the first correct solution dealt with, and to the sender of the next five correct ones will be presented, in the case of the odd number competitions, one of our silver pencil cases, and, in the case of the even number competitions, a copy of a popular six-shilling novel.

All solutions must be written on separate postcards, and must reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, January 22nd, 1900. Mark the postcards "Brain Gymnasium, No. 12," "Brain Gymnasium, No. 13," etc., according to the number of the competition of which the solution is sent.

No. 12.

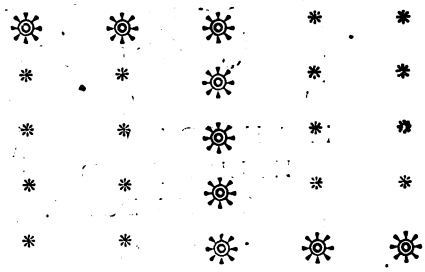


Replace the asterisks with letters so that each horizontal line will give the name of an English town. The initials will then form a word.

No. 13.

I AM what a cyclist often does on the track; cross out my third and sixth letters, and I am what a cyclist often does on the road; now cut off my initial and final, and I name a part of the cycle. What am I?

No. 14.



IN place of the above asterisks, insert the following letters, so that each horizontal line forms a word. The letters represented by the dark asterisks will then give, in three words, the name of something which all SHORT STORIES readers know how to use:

A D D D E E E E E E I I K L N N N N P R R S T T T Y

No. 15.

THE first and third letters of words signifying "a retreat," "a vessel," "condition," "a fern," "clatter," "pride," "ignominious," "a division of India," "a metal," and "charity," will form the names of a well-known football club and its home district.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1899.

'Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 6lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver nr Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

SHORT STORIES

No. 577.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 20th, 1900.

A Fiery Engagement.

"Are you enjoying yourself, Kitty?"

"Not in the least," said Kitty disdainfully.

"Then, my dear, forgive me for saying so—but you are a very stupid girl."

After which conclusive remark Colonel Lambourne jerked the off rein of his mule impatiently, and subsequently avoided a precipice with some difficulty, which effectually chilled his ardent annoyance.

Colonel Lambourne and his daughter were ascending Etna from the little village of Nicolosi below the volcano. He was commanding a regiment in Malta, and she had been brought to Sicily at immense inconvenience, so her father said, to throw off the effects of a love affair.

It was a little late for making the grand ascent, and Salvator, the guide, had been at first a little unwilling to escort them; but he had in the end yielded to pressure.

Below them lay the wide panorama of the Bay of Messina, blue as lapis lazuli, the shadowed mountains of Calabria, and the stretch of chestnut woods through which they had passed. Before them was the Valley of Desolation, that reach of black lava that corresponds to one of Dante's circles of the Inferno. The mules, jerking in their ungainly fashion from boulder to boulder, had almost struggled through the last vestige of vegetation, the bracken and broom, already changing to another and more autumnal tint. High up, below the last thousand feet of the crater, lay the little Casa Inglese, the hut of refuge where the travellers sleep, and where the Italian professor of astronomy keeps watch and ward for an appointed time in the year, coming out with the bats at night in the dead stillness where there is no sound save the creak of the great telescope as it gyrates from star to star.

It was reddening with the last sunset glow, and about half a mile before them the black figure of a solitary traveller was plodding his way across the plain.

"It's a relief to see someone," said Colonel Lambourne testily. "The confounded loneliness of the place would make a cat fret."

"I like it, it suits my mood," said Kitty tersely.

"Then your mood must be a confoundedly queer one," snapped her father, and silence fell between them.

The mood of neither father nor daughter was in touch with the majesty of the great ascent, as the Sicilians call it—but the shadow of Douglas Grant lay between them, and the thought of that impecunicus captain of a marching regiment was not soothing to the mind of Colonel Lambourne.

Suddenly, without the least warning, the guide started back and caught the head of Kitty's mule, jabbering something in excited Sicilian that neither understood.

"What the dickens is the fellow about? What is it, Kitty? What was the use of keeping you at an expensive school? Good Heavens!"

The last ejaculation was wrung from him in genuine terror, as the ground apparently heaved up under his feet, and the mule collapsed into a frightened heap in a clump of bracken.

"What is it, Kitty?"

But Salvator had dragged Miss Lambourne from her mule, and was pulling her down behind a rock boulder with a gesture of frightened determination.

The last ejaculation was wrung from him in genuine terror, as the ground apparently heaved up under his feet, and the mule collapsed into a frightened heap in a clump of bracken.

Colonel Lambourne said no more—there was no need for words, since in another moment he became absolutely certain that they were in the midst of one of those convulsions of nature so horrible to contemplate—a volcanic eruption.

The darkness fell with a blinding suddenness that was like a pall, relieved now and again by a flash of lightning, and a roll of thunder that echoed among the lonely, silent hills, scaring the very wild beasts from their lair.

Looking up over the edge of his shelter, Colonel Lambourne saw that his daughter was close at hand, and that she had instinctively thrown her arms round a jutting ledge of rock, while Salvator was endeavouring to tether the frightened mules. Above them the crater suddenly flared into living lurid flame, and he shivered as he saw burning lumps of lava, belching out from the black mouth, hurled down the slope towards them in a rain of fire.

"Kitty," he cried.

"Yes, papa," she answered.

"I don't think we shall ever come out of this alive."

"God knows," said Kitty. And he took sudden comfort from her steady voice.

He only spoke once again in the course of the next half-hour.

"Kitty—Kitty, I wish that you had married Grant—and that we had never attempted to ascend this dreadful mountain."

"It is a little late to think of that, father dear."

And the Colonel groaned dismally.

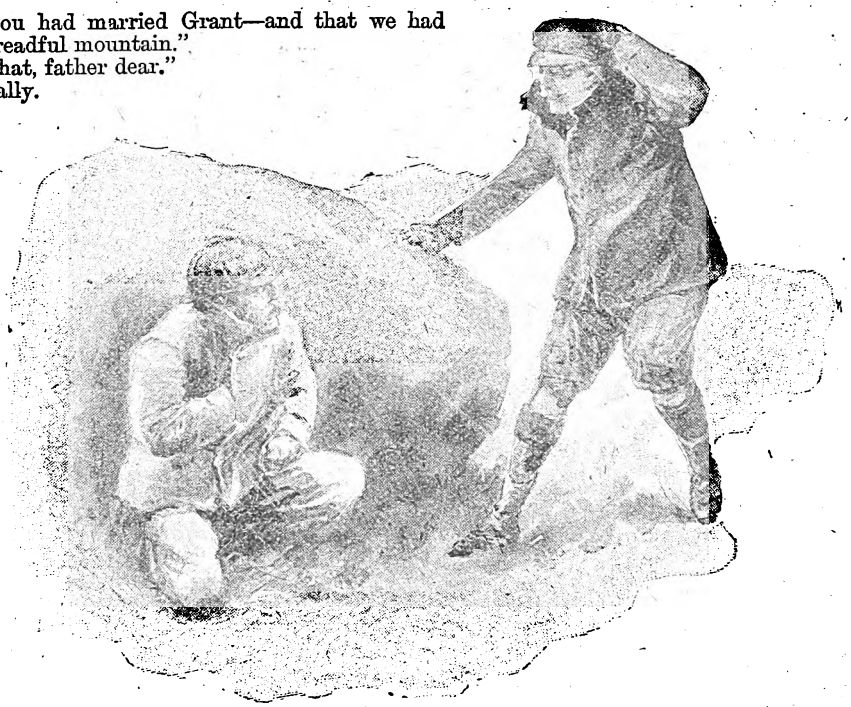
It seemed to him that they had crouched there for many hours in that horrible suspense when there was a cry from Salvator.

The wind had risen, and it was all that they could do to sustain their foothold upon the boulders, although Kitty was the more sheltered of the two.

The guide had taken up his position near the mules, and at some distance from the Lambournes, and his situation being somewhat exposed, he had been struck by a falling mass of rock—a huge block which was whirling by, with considerable force.

"Oh, Santa Maria!"

To the Colonel's horror, he saw his daughter move from her secure shelter at the cry, and make her way over to the Sicilian with a Divine impulse of pity. Her change of position took her completely out of sight into the darkness, and the Colonel remained clinging to his rock spur in a pitifully broken condition of despair and terror.



"Colonel Lambourne, if I go after your daughter it will be at the risk of my own life, and I shall demand a certain quid pro quo. I do not see why I should risk my life to save yours, to put the matter on a strictly business footing."

The sound of a voice behind him was like that of an angel from Heaven.

"Colonel Lambourne, is it you in reality? I have been all this time making my way down here—I had to cross the plain on my hands and knees. I saw that there was a lady in the party, and I thought I might be of some use."

"Grant! Oh, thank Heaven," said the elder man with a sob. "This is horrible. Kitty has gone—the guide was hurt, and she went after him into the darkness. If she is killed, I shall never dare to go home and face her mother."

There was something so supremely selfish in the attitude of the whole man that Douglas Grant may be forgiven if the thought flashed across his mind of turning the situation to his own advantage. He had struggled after the party at the risk of his life, over the exposed plain.

Being a man of no small resource, he had timed his ascent of Etna well, and though out of sight had kept in touch with the Lambournes' movements since they had left Malta. Now he stood disdainfully peering down through the darkness at the white face below him.

He was a man to whom fear was an unknown quality, and it seemed comtemptible to him that where Kitty's safety was concerned anyone should dare to know a qualm of selfish terror.

He steadied himself against the hurly-burly of the wind, and spoke clearly.

"Colonel Lambourne, if I go after your daughter, it will be at the risk of my own life and I shall demand a certain quid pro quo; I do not see why I should risk my life to save yours, to put the matter on a strictly business footing."

He hated himself for the horrible attitude he had assumed. His golden-haired Kitty was in danger of her life, and he dared to barter and hesitate even for a moment. She was wandering on the mountain side, her foot perhaps on the brink of one of those precipitous crevices that are formed from the treacherous lava streams. A slip might mean destruction, and he was still hesitating—but this was his chance in life, and in spite of himself he took it.

"I suppose you want Kitty?" said the Colonel, dully. "That is the only quid pro quo possible."

"Yes, I want Kitty."

"Look here, Grant, have you such a thing as a flask about you?"

Grant nodded, but made no further movement towards his pocket.

"You shall have Kitty," said Lambourne jerkily, as though the words were torn from him against his will. "Give me the flask."

And Grant, tossing the silver and crystal flagon, full of brandy, into his lap, leaped the boulder, and disappeared into the darkness.

It seemed to Colonel Lambourne that some hours must have passed since he drank that life-giving, courage-reviving draught, and felt comforted to the bottom of his soul.

When he woke at last from an agreeable doze, he found that the eruption had ceased as suddenly as it had begun, and that above him, in a clear heaven, the stars were shining. The crater was not entirely inactive, but the awful heaving of the ground had ceased; the lava eruption was intermittent, and the stones thrown up fell back harmlessly into the abyss, instead of bombarding the slopes.

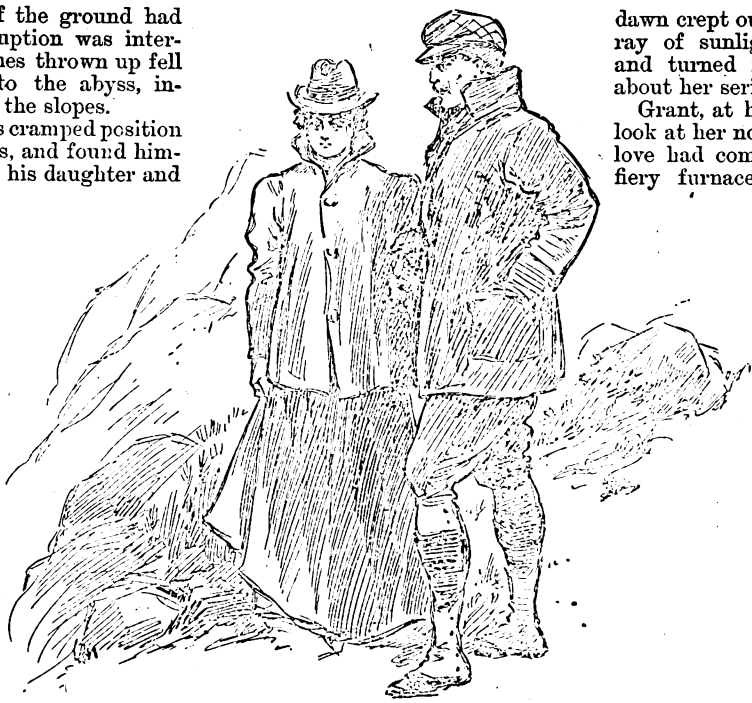
He moved from his cramped position at the sound of voices, and found himself face to face with his daughter and Grant, who were coming over the rocks towards him hand in hand.

One glance at Kitty's face told him that her night upon the mountain side had not been one entirely of terror for her, and coming up to her father, she took his hand.

"Poor father," she said gently, "I am so sorry that you were frightened. Douglas says that it is quite safe to move up to the Casa Inglese now. Salvator is better, he was only stunned; and we can get him some food up there before going back to Nicolosi."



Kitty and her lover stood looking down at the sunlit valley with a prayer of thanksgiving in their hearts.

Grant cast one look at the flask with an eye to the prostrate guide.

"There is a drop or two in the bottom, I think," said the Colonel feebly, holding it out towards him. "I wonder what your mother will say, Kitty?"

But Kitty had no thought for any trouble to come, as she mounted her mule again, and turned her face towards the sun-rising. The first faint flush of the dawn crept out of the East, and a ray of sunlight caught her hair and turned it to glittering gold about her serious face.

Grant, at her bridle-rein, cast a look at her now and again. Their love had come to them out of a fiery furnace indeed, and might perchance be all the more steadfast in the memory of that night face to face with death.

When they reached the little house, the Italian Professor, grey and dishevelled after his night of anxiety, looked out of the window to wish them good morning. "My faith," he said, "it is always the unexpected that happens, and the Barometer gave very short warning—I gave you up for lost long ago."

"I should have thought the world well lost for love," whispered Grant, as he lifted Kitty from her mule, while Colonel Lambourne went inside the hut to boast to the professor, in execrable Italian, of the courage and fortitude he had displayed under superhuman difficulties.

But Kitty and her lover stood looking down at the sunlit valley with a prayer of thanksgiving in their hearts.

SCOGGS: "Where is your better half?"

BOGGS: "Got the sulks and wouldn't come. In fact, just at present, she's my bitter half."

"I SHALL not go out of that door, sir," said the angry subscriber, "until I have had an explanation."

"Oh, all right," responded the editor. "The window is just as handy."

MRS. KNERVZ rang the bell for the domestic. "Norah," she said when the kitchen lady appeared, "I'll feed the canary myself after this. The doctor says I must take more exercise."

LITTLE JOHNNY: "Mamma, let's play I am your mother and you are my little boy."

Mamma: "Very well, dear; how shall we play it?"

Little Johnny: "I'll tell you; you start to do something and I'll tell you not to."

SHE: "Why does a woman take a man's name when she gets married?"

He: "Why does she take everything else he has?"

"How absurd to say that all the world loves a lover!"

"Isn't it true?"

"Certainly not. How can it be true so long as the lover usually has rivals?"

MOTHER: "What are you doing with papa's hair-restorer?"

Ethel: "Willie and I are going to make your moth-eaten muff as good as new."

"How did those two delightful young people happen to drift apart?"

"Most natural thing in the world. He was after a heart, and she after a bank account. Time developed the fact that neither of them had what the other wanted."

"You cannot tell my fortune. May I ask why?" he demanded.

The gipsy shook her head.

"But I have entered this tent for that special purpose," said Captain Murray, and he laid his hands upon the table with their palms uppermost.

"I cannot do it," came in something like a gasp from the draped figure.

"You mean that you won't do it?"

No answer.

A look of annoyance passed over his face, followed by one of something approaching alarm, but it was momentary. He looked at his hands and then at the gipsy.

"Look here," he ventured again, "I am not a fool. It is plain to me that you see something in my hand which you prefer not to speak about—which you think it better that I should not know?"

The veiled figure bowed in affirmation.

Captain Murray glanced round the tent somewhat cautiously, as if afraid of listeners. "Madame," he began earnestly, "I insist upon you telling me. I come from a superstitious race—a clan that in days gone by placed great faith in the warnings of people like yourself. I am not exactly a believer in your art, but there are traditions in my family of such predictions as, I fancy, you would keep from me. I may say I am ordered abroad. If your prediction has to do with my career as a soldier——"

"You leave next Tuesday," she interrupted.

"Yes, a week to-day; but you seek to change the topic of conversation. At the same time, I am puzzled to know how you should have become acquainted with my affairs."

"Am I not a fortune-teller?"

"By profession, yes. But whether you have the powers you claim is another question."

"Test me," she answered somewhat defiantly.

"That is what I am anxious to do, but you refuse. Perhaps you can tell me where I am going?"

"Certainly I can; such questions are easy. You are going to South Africa, and you got the news last week. What is more you are going in the place of another man who has met with a bicycle accident."

"Of course, you may have learnt all this in the town," he said. "But we are getting away on a side issue. Tell me what you were afraid to disclose a minute ago. I do not believe in your art, but I am curious."

"For an unbeliever you appear to be very much in earnest."

"If your prediction proves true you may make a disciple."

"But I am not anxious to make disciples. Please do not press me. I would rather you did not ask me to tell your fortune."

"Well, I fear I must insist upon it." There was just a little hardness in his voice. "I have bought this ticket against my will, but, having invested in it, I am determined to have my money's worth. You see I am Scotch."

The gipsy remained silent.

"You mean it well, no doubt, and possibly think I am afraid to hear bad news," he continued.

No answer.

"Very well. I do not leave this tent until you carry out the terms of the contract, so your lucrative trade must come to a stop until my fortune is told. I will not budge from here, and if you leave I follow you." He folded his arms with the resolute air of a man who has put his foot down.

There was a silence, and he amused himself by examining various articles in the tent, until a clamour arose outside.

"Hurry up! Hurry up! Are you going to stay all day?" shouted a masculine voice. "You must have had your half-guinea's worth by now."

Captain Murray got up and walked to the entrance of the tent.

"My fortune is not told yet," he called out. "In fact, the fortune-teller is at present on strike—or rather we are engaged in a game of patience."

Without paying further heed to their murmurs of disapproval he came back to his seat opposite the mutinous gipsy.

"I believe gipsies do not object to smoking," he said, "but if you would rather that I did not— No? Very well, then," as the figure shook itself. "I will light up. Can I offer you one?"

An indignant shake of a cloak was the only reply. There followed another interval of silence.

"Palm or cards?" she demanded suddenly, as her patience gave out.

"Both," was his brief reply, and he spread out his palms, which she examined through a glass.

"Shuffle!" she said, passing him the cards. "Now cut into three. Wealth, happiness, and an engagement," she began. "Really your fortune opens better than I expected from your hand. Let me see, we will make you clubs—club king."

Then she began to spread out the cards on the table, pausing every now and then as she carefully placed each card. She drew her cloak tightly around her.

"Why do you place them so?" he asked. "I thought the cards had to be spread out in the order they come after cutting."

"I will tell your fortune, sir, but allow me to retain the secrets of our craft. Be good enough to show me your palms again," she demanded with an air of pretty authority.

"You have chosen the right profession—that of soldier—but you are pessimistic. Try and get out of the habit of taking a dark view of things, for this may some day interfere with what ought to be a well-developed judgment. Keep a guard upon your temper, which is hasty and inclined to lead you into trouble."

Then she turned to the cards again.

"There is some present trouble or annoyance. Spades seem to hound you. It has to do with a fair woman."

He leaned forward and listened eagerly.

"The fault seems to rest with you. I see what it is. You look dark towards another man, who, in turn, looks at the fair lady; but she turns her back upon him. You are jealous. Three of clubs between you and a blonde man. Spade—spade, club again. Your attachment to the fair lady has not ended happily; in fact, the engagement looks as if it were broken off."

"Yes, yes, go on," he said somewhat impatiently, as she paused.

"You have misjudged this fair lady, for you fancy she is in love with the blonde man."

"So she is!" he jerked out.

"Sir!"

"Oh! I beg pardon. Please go on. This is very foolish, I know, but interesting."

"You can see by the cards that she is not in love with him, for there are no love cards between them."

"Are you sure?" he asked gravely.

"Quite. See here," and she laid her hand on the king of hearts, which stood for his rival. "Only light cards are between her and the fair man. The breaking of the engagement causes her sorrow—spades again, you see."

"By Heaven, is that so?" he asked earnestly.

He put his finger down on the king of clubs. "Isn't that I?"

"Yes," said the gipsy, "and as you see the love cards still cling to you and the fair lady."

"And that means that she loves me?" he asked excitedly.

"She loves you," repeated the gipsy. "There is no doubt about that."

Captain Murray thought a moment. "I wish I knew for certain—it would mean a great difference to me," he said. "Look here. I am afraid I am a bit superstitious. It is in the blood, for I am a Highlander. Your sex—your race is very clever. Give me your advice. I am, or was, engaged to the dearest girl in all the world. A month ago a cousin of her's came to stay with them. He is rather a lady's man, and I fancied that Marjory—I mean the young lady to whom I was engaged—was just a little too free with him. Three nights ago my stupid jealousy got the better of me, and I said what I had no business to say. My little girl was very independent and handed me back my ring. Now I have to go away, and I am feeling wretched. I would go and apologise, but to be repulsed would drive me mad. Yet I have been a ruffian, if what the cards say be true."

"Especially as she still loves you," said the gipsy softly.

"If I were only sure of that—but there are only the cards for it, and it's all very foolish to trust to them. No, I am done for, unless you can suggest something."

"I can only tell you that she loves you dearly."

"But you have only the cards to show that." He was pacing up and down the tent now.

"I have another proof that what I say is true."

"You have?" he stopped shortly. "Speak woman. Speak!" he cried excitedly.

"Hurry up! Hurry up!" shouted those outside.

"Come nearer to me," she said softly. "You know Marjory was just a little to blame."

"No, she wasn't," he jerked out with a snap.

"Don't contradict me."

The veiled figure arose and placed her hand upon his arm.

"You must not reveal a word of this to anyone, but within the next five minutes or less you will kiss Marjory."

He glanced at the mysterious hooded figure.

"I would make a handsome donation to this bazaar, if I thought she would kiss me within the next year," he said gloomily.

Then her hold upon his wrist lightened, she stood upon her tip toes and whispered one word in his ear. In a second her disguise was torn off, his arms were about her, and her head nestled on his shoulder.

"Marjory, darling, I came to this bazaar purposely to get a glimpse of you. I wondered why you were not here, and I dared not ask anyone."

At this moment the clamorous crowd outside, unable to restrain their impatience longer, broke into the tent, but the fortune telling was over for that day.

Lunch for Two, at the Reindeer.

One pleasant morning in May, the housekeeper's bell at 13 Grafton Place, Piccadilly, was rung by a man, whose manner, despite the absence of uniform, had a suggestion of "peeler" about it. He was Inspector Barton, of New Scotland Yard; and his companion was Sergeant Fleming.

"There's a gentleman lives here, name of Wilson, isn't there?"

"Yes; there is."

Wilson's real name was Nosovich, and he was wanted by the police. His extradition had been demanded by the Russian Government, on the ground of having defrauded an Odessa bank of the sum of 80,000 roubles. Barton, however, didn't tell the housekeeper this.

"Not lived here long, has he?"

"Not long. Two months only."

"H'm, just corresponds. Is he anything like that?"

He handed the housekeeper a photograph, which she inspected.

"Well, he—yes, he is like this. But he's got no moustache."

The Inspector was prepared for a trifling discrepancy of that kind.

"No moustache, eh! What rooms does he occupy?"

The housekeeper explained—a suite on the first floor.

"Mr. Wilson in now, do you know?"

"I fancy so. He generally is about this time." It was then half-past ten.

Inspector Barton and his companion went upstairs, but there were told a different tale. Mr. Wilson was out—had gone out just before ten. Tovey, his man, proved rather uncommunicative.

"How's he gone—driving, riding, or how?"

"I couldn't say, sir. I was at the back when he started."

"And you don't know where he's gone to?"

Tovey shook his head. "I don't."

"When will he be back, then—did he say?"

Tovey made a sly scrutiny of the inspector before replying. "I don't think he'll be long, sir. He'd have told me in that case."

The valet was a different kind of subject from Mrs. Luck; being as foxey as the latter was ingenuous. Inspector Barton concluded promptly that Tovey was not telling the truth—or not the whole truth; and, further, that his own character and mission were suspected by the man.

"The fellow's in league with his master," he whispered to Fleming. "Wonder if they've had a hint of our visit?"

"It's quite possible."

"In that case Nosovich has decamped, and the soone we get on his track the better."

Nosovich had been "wanted" since February, and had been hunted for in vain in half the capitals of Europe. It was an anonymous letter, received at New Scotland Yard that morning, which put the English authorities on his track.

Accomplice or no, it was clear Tovey was right: Wilson was not in. Where had he gone—that was the question?

Tovey knew, but wouldn't tell—so Barton concluded. Mrs. Luck, when appealed to again, said she hadn't noticed Mr. Wilson's departure. It seemed as if the detectives had lost the scent.

At the corner of the first turning was a fishmonger's. Inspector Barton stopped here a moment, to pick up information.

"Know anything of a Mr. Wilson, at No. 13?"

"Oh, yes. Serve him with fish."

"Don't happen to have seen him this morning—do you?"

Spragg didn't; but an assistant, who was by, could give some information. Mr. Wilson had driven off in a dog-cart about ten o'clock.

"In a dog-cart, eh?"

"Yes, one of Scroggie's. Scroggie's man brought it to the door."

Scroggie was a livery-stable keeper, well-known in that region. The assistant further stated that the vehicle went off by way of Piccadilly, but of course he couldn't supply the destination. Barton made his way to Scroggie's yard, to prosecute inquiries there.

"Where to, sir? He's gone to Whittenham—Whittenham-on-Thames, close by Hampton Court."

"So he said, I s'pose."

"Well, yes—so he said; and I'm inclined to think it's right. If you were to look in at the 'Reindeer' about half-past one; I guess you'd find him having lunch."

Scroggie went on to explain. Whittenham was a newly-discovered haunt, just then the fashion with a certain class—theatrical people, and their hangers-on. He was constantly letting out vehicles to go there.

It was a pleasant drive from London—about sixteen miles; had a comfortable, old-fashioned inn—the one he'd mentioned; and to suit people who were fond of trees it boasted a clump of beeches which hadn't their equal in England.

Gradually, as Scroggie spoke, the Inspector came to the conclusion he was right. Wilson probably had gone there; and gone on pleasure bent. In which case it followed the embezzler must be still in ignorance of the fact that Scotland Yard was looking him up.

Sergeant Fleming had been left behind at No. 13 to carry out a search. Returning there for a moment, Barton made a discovery. Tovey, the valet, had taken himself off.

"Said he was going to the corner for a drink," volunteered Fleming. "I'm pretty sure, though, he's vamoosed. He had the look of it."

There! Tovey was a confederate. Suspected before, the fact was now clear. Vamoosed—in order to warn his master!

It was a case for prompt action; the very promptest. Barton telegraphed to Whittenham, asking that the Reindeer might be watched, and followed his wire by the first train; which deposited him at Whittenham Station shortly after one o'clock.

* * * * *

No one was more surprised than William Poppleton, landlord, when his house suddenly became a resort for visitors. He was not a pushing man, hadn't advertised himself in any way, and knew next to nothing of theatres. It was luck—pure luck—which brought it about.

Poppleton tried gallantly to rise to the occasion. When parties came, he took pains to give them just what they wanted. And in order to be able to exchange remarks, and know who was who, he began to study the theatrical news in the papers.

He was deep in the Daily Twaddler on this particular morning, shortly after 11 a.m. An ambitious piece, The Planter's Daughter, had been produced the night before, and Mr. Bernard Clement Archer (the Twaddler's critic) had let himself out on it to the extent of a column and a half. Mr. B. C. A's conclusions were that the piece might succeed—if the public took to it; and that, anyhow, Mark Murdock's acting, in the part of Gomez, was the finest thing the stage had seen for half a generation.

"Must go to see Murdock," Poppleton murmured. "New name to me—don't think I've heard it before."

There was a slight commotion at the front. A gentleman had driven up in a dog-cart; being the first to arrive that morning, Poppleton hastened to the door.

"This way, sir. What would you like? Glass of sherry, sir—yes, sir."

Poppleton himself served the guest. The dog-cart was taken round to the stable-yard, and the horse, a chestnut, was attended to. The gentleman remarked that he would like some lunch—about half-past one.

Poppleton scrutinised him with interest. The gentleman had a slightly commanding manner, as if he felt conscious of being somebody. His smooth face and a certain mobility of expression suggested he might be an actor. He was new, however, to the Reindeer, and Poppleton speculated in vain as to his indentity.

"Here's a paper, sir, if you'd like to see it. Long account of The Planter's Daughter, at the St. Martin's. Piece seems hardly to have been a success."

Poppleton's tone was genial. There could be no doubt he intended to please. Nevertheless, the gentleman didn't seem quite to catch on.

"Oh, thanks. I've read it already."

He was an actor—must be. Poppleton wondered all the more what he might be called.

Coming back into the room after an absence, he found the gentleman—despite this surly response—deep in the critique in question. He was studying closely, intently; but on noticing Poppleton's return, threw the sheet aside with an impatient snort.

"I want a couple of miles walk somewhere," the guest remarked. "Can you recommend a pleasant round—quiet lanes or field-paths, for preference?"

"Oh, yes." Poppleton suggested a route. "That'll bring you back through the Beeches, on your way home."

"Beeches?" The gentleman seemed not to understand. "Ah, I remember. You have some fine trees here, haven't you?"

Poppleton felt hurt. That one should refer to the famous clump in that casual fashion! The speaker must be a foreigner, surely—no Englishman could be so ignorant.

He drank up his sherry, callously, ungraciously—and started out. There was something about him Poppleton didn't like. He seemed moody, oppressed, preoccupied—like one who waits his doom; waits, and has to wait, and can't avert it. The landlord ceased to feel quite so confident that the gentleman was a man of note.

Other guests came in, the next being a lady and gentleman; lady played Yoshi-san in "Japan Up-to-Date"; gentleman was a friend. Both were gay and chatty. Being kept busy welcoming arrivals, and attending to the wants of customers, Poppleton soon dropped all thought of the first comer.

A few minutes after twelve, however, he was called apart by P. C. Welch, who looked after the morals of Whittenham. Welch and Poppleton knew each other well, so there was no need for beating about the bush.

"I'm after a gentleman called Wilson," said the constable. "He started from London about ten o'clock, in a dog-cart, chestnut horse. Has he turned up here?"

"Wilson!" The worthy host knew no one of that name; but—well, it might be that stranger who came along first.

"Calls himself Wilson, I should say. His right name's Nosovich—he's a Russian. Wanted for a big job of embezzling money."

Russian—foreigner! Why, of course! That first arrival was the man.

"Come this way, has he?" queried Poppleton in a non-committal tone. "What's he like—have you a description?"

P. C. Welch repeated such particulars as he knew. Tall, dark, clean-shaven, muscular build. Whew! Every particular corresponded.

"Came in a dog-cart, I think you said?" Poppleton was almost convinced.

"Well, he started from London in a dog-cart. Chestnut horse, white stocking on off hind leg."

Chestnut, with white stocking! There was no further room for doubt. Poppleton, a judge of horses, a keen observer of equine peculiarities, had noticed this very circumstance.

"He is here?"

Poppleton gave an affirmative jerk. "Dropped in about half-past eleven."

The situation was discussed at large. It was clear Wilson had no suspicion he was being followed. His lunch had been ordered for half-past one, by or before which time he might be expected back; and by or before that time, Inspector Barton would himself come on the scene. In the circumstances, Welch felt justified in adopting a policy of masterly inactivity.

They turned up almost together, Wilson and the Inspector, shortly after one. Poppleton performed his part by taking Wilson aside. "Party to see you, sir. This way, please." And having conducted Wilson to the chamber where Barton awaited him, mine host retreated to the dining-room.

There he found Miss Yoshi-san seated disconsolately alone.

"My friend has gone back to London," she pouted. "Called away on urgent business. Isn't it a shame?"

"And left you to return by yourself?"

"Oh, he's gone by train. His man is here, and will drive me back to town."

Curious occurrences never come singly. It was distinctly unusual to have a Scotland Yard Inspector on the premises; and it was equally out of the common for a gentleman who came to lunch at the Reindeer to be called away on business just before the meal was ready.

Inspector Barton, in the private room, didn't find it all plain sailing. The suspect showed surprise at being tackled, and burst into a decisive laugh:

"My name isn't Wilson—nor Nosovich either. You're on the wrong tack. I don't know how the mistake's arisen, but you're wrong."

Barton was prepared for a denial, and took it equably. He manœuvred so as to get between his captive and the door, and producing the photograph studied the man's features.

The result was satisfactory. Plus moustache—which altered the facial aspect—he felt sure the man before him would look just like the one in the photo.

"Oh, indeed! And what do you call yourself?"

The Inspector's tone was provoking, and the captive began to get angry. "I call myself Murdock—Mark Murdock. Perhaps you've heard of me?" He finished up quite sarcastically.

The sarcasm was lost on Barton, who was not theatrical. Irving he knew, and Toole—also Penley and Arthur Roberts; but Murdock. He shook his head.

"Can't say I have. No—I think I shall have to trouble you to return to town with me."

The suspect argued, expostulated, and threatened; but as he couldn't produce any conclusive evidence of his identity, the Inspector treated it all as bluff. Barton would make no further concession than that, as lunch had been ordered, it might be partaken of, before starting.

Meanwhile, a complication was brewing in a different quarter. The ostler had been quietly told that the chestnut with the white stocking on the off hind leg was under an embargo. He now came in to whisper to Poppleton that the gentleman's man-servant had arrived and wanted it prepared for going back.

Poppleton went down to the stable. The newcomer was Tovey, and he was unaware of the doings within the hotel. Poppleton sharply demanded on whose behalf he was acting.

"I belong to Mr. Wilson. He came down here with a lady. I'm to drive her back to town."

"Wilson! Why, why——"

"He's been called away, on urgent business. Lady's inside, having lunch."

Tovey was clear-headed enough, and told a straight tale. The landlord felt obfuscated, bewildered.

Chestnut horse, white stocking etc; the animal corresponded exactly with the police description. But—eh? what about the horse driven by that first arrival: by the man who was now in Inspector Barton's charge?

Poppleton turned sharply on the ostler. "Isn't this the horse that first gentleman brought? Where's that? Where've you put that?"

It was not the first arrival's property. The ostler pointed that out. It also was a chestnut, and it also had a white stocking—but on the near hind leg. Oh, oh! the two markings had been confused. Poppleton, by the way, had been engaged when the second comer drove up, and missed seeing his turn-out. It was news to him that the "gees" were so much alike.

A flash of insight lit up Poppleton's mind. The man wanted was the second who arrived—the one with Miss Yoshi-san. Horse and vehicle corresponded, and—yes, the face corresponded, too—yes, undoubtedly. He had picked up the lady on his way; her presence had shielded him from suspicion; and now he had flown.

Once started on this tack, Poppleton tumbled to the position without difficulty. That call on urgent business meant that Wilson had been warned. Why of course! The real criminal had got away, and the gentleman under detention was—somebody else.

Poppleton hastened to the dining-room, where he found the Inspector and his captive in close proximity. The latter was angrily disposing of lunch. Miss Yoshi-san, who sat opposite, seemed by her glances to recognise him.

"There's a mistake on," whispered Poppleton. "Just come over here."

Barton obeyed—warily; and the landlord led him to the side of the actress.

"Would you mind telling us who it was, you came with! We want to know particularly."

Yoshi-san gave a good-humoured laugh.

"Why, of course; he's Mr. Wilson."

The Inspector opened his eyes. "Of 13, Grafton Place, Piccadilly?"

"Yes, that's it."

Jerusalem! The mistake was evident.

"You've got the wrong chap, Inspector. Wilson is off—back to London, or somewhere."

Barton was promptly put in possession of the facts. Wilson had received a message; and his man now down in the stable-yard was apparently the person who'd brought it.

His man—Tovey! It was Tovey who'd warned him. Barton saw it all in a glimpse.

Who, then, was this gentleman he'd got. He took out the photograph again; the features didn't seem, now, quite to correspond.

Yoshi-san heard their whisperings, and volunteered a statement. "Don't you know him? I can tell you who he is."

"Can you? Who?"

"He's Mark Murdock, the actor. He made a great hit at the 'St. Martin's,' last night."

There was nothing more to be said. It was a case for backing out—and looking pleasant. Inspector Barton made profuse apologies, which Murdock accepted grimly; and the latter's detention came to an end.

Wilson, for the time, had got clear; and being warned, it might not be easy to capture him. Barton however, promptly addressed himself to the task; as a preliminary measure laying hands on the Russian's accomplice—the crafty, long-headed—Tovey. It was not, though, till some three weeks later that the principal culprit was laid by the heels.

Mr. Mark Murdock finished his lunch in peace, and good-naturedly endeavoured to restore Poppleton to an easy frame of mind. That he didn't bear malice or take his arrest to heart was shown by the fact of his offering to convoy Miss Yoshi-san back to "Babylon"; an offer she smilingly accepted.

The Intervention of Pomp.

THE war in South Africa was over at last, and Philip Heaton was unfeignedly glad to see London again. Heaton's regiment, the — Hussars had acquitted themselves in a manner creditable to the traditions of the corps, and he himself had performed a conspicuous act of reckless bravery.

This latter had brought him his V.C. and something else as well, in the shape of a two months' sojourn in hospital, and afterwards a long convalescence.

He was still in the latter stage as, slowly and rather painfully, he strolled along one of the paths in the neighbourhood of Rotten Row. Presently the weariness increased, and, selecting a chair, he sat down with a sigh of relief and began to watch the gay crowds and whirling carriages thronging London's playground.

But the brilliant pageant failed to arouse any interest in Heaton's breast, and after a few moments of fruitless effort he closed his eyes and amused himself with self-analysation.

"I suppose I ought to feel grateful," he thought; "other men would. A company and the V.C. at twenty-six is something to be thankful for, but I'm not. I wonder—— It's that I suppose," he muttered rather wearily.

"I thought South Africa would have erased that episode from the slate, but it hasn't, quite. After all, was I in the wrong? I should have made allowances, been a bit gentler, perhaps. Women are never logical when they're excited, and I oughtn't to have flared up as I did; but it's all over now, and regret is of no consequence—no consequence whatever—except—to me."

Heaton restlessly shifted his position and lit a cigarette. He sought once more to interest himself in the people around him, but the result was merely wasted energy—no effort could claim his thoughts to immediate objects; they invariably and irresistibly went back to other scenes and other days, now almost a year old.

Those other scenes were always bright, lovingly idealised by the touch of memory and tinged with vague regret. He had lived every hour over many times as he lay on the veldt at night, with the stars above, and death in the shape of Boer rifles lurking in the darkness around him.

And afterwards, when the shadow had come up close to him and he lay in hospital, bruised and broken, with all the life and energy well-nigh crushed out of him, the same days, and the same scenes, and the same woman mingled with the phantom shadows flitting across an imagination quickened with the heat of delirium.

And now, as he sat in a corner of Hyde Park, with the soft June breeze ruffling the longish hair, picked out with grey near the temples, and the drowsy hum of the city mellowed by distance, lulling the bodily weakness, one particular scene stood out with a vividness mentally painful.

The scene that suggested itself was not a pleasant one for Heaton's contemplation—the surroundings that witness the rupture of a man's happiness are rarely attractive, afterwards; but the man's strength of will, weakened by physical illness, could not repress the picture so persistently forcing itself before him.

It was a large room, but warm and cosy, and its details evinced the hand and refined taste of a lady. A big, brown spaniel lay stretched on a rug in front of the fire, sleeping comfortably.

The woman, whose face had haunted Heaton during those long hours of physical anguish in the hospital, stood erect and haughty, in the centre of the room, her eyes suffused with haughty pride and anger. He himself stood equally erect, the passion within him finding vent in his set teeth, and the convulsive grip on the handle of the door.

That was the picture that impressed itself, with photographic distinctness, on Heaton's brain as he wearily reclined on the uncomfortable Park chair, four months after he had won the Victoria Cross.

The picture was not an original one—many hands had painted it, many times before, and the story had been worn threadbare by repetition; but still it will be told and retold as long as the earth with its sin and virtue moves in space, and love and distrust sway the hearts of men and women.

Some fancied slight on the man's part, followed by amazed repudiation on that of the woman. Angry insistence, answered with haughty vituperation, mutual pride—and the story is finished!

Sometimes the broken threads are joined together again and merge in a single end, but now and then, what the claws of pride have rent asunder gets wound on the spool of Fate in ways divergent.

And pride had entered strongly into Heaton's romance—the unbending mutual pride of two finely-tempered natures.

For each, convinced of the other's error, looked longingly, though unyieldingly, for mutual concession, but the concession never came, and shortly after the quarrel Heaton had sailed for South Africa.

Such was the outline of the story Heaton sat reviewing, with half-closed eyes, from the vantage of a Hyde Park chair.

"Glenville said there was talk of an engagement," he muttered, absently, "between her and Mason of the Blues. I cut him out once," smiling bitterly, "but he's having his innings now, and she—well, she has forgotten the episode of twelve months ago, pretty quickly. It's the way women——"

Suddenly Heaton was summarily interrupted in the middle of his cogitations by a joyous bark, and something with big, brown dusty paws jumped against him in a transport of delighted recognition.

"Why, Pomp, old chap," exclaimed Heaton, as he at length succeeded in identifying the pirouetting mixed-up mass of canine limbs and silky brown hair. The dog stayed his contortions for a moment as Heaton spoke, then resting his forepaws on the latter's knees, gazed into his face with big soft eyes and wide-open mouth.

"Thank you, old boy," said Heaton, patting the dog's head, "you have given me the very warmest and most spontaneous welcome home I have had yet. A year's absence hasn't weakened your memory, has it? Think of it, old dog, it's exactly a year since that day when you lay on the hearthrug, snoring beatifically, and I—I——"

Suddenly the dog barked, and then wagged his tail vigorously, as a lady approached.

Heaton glanced up to discover the dog's disquietude and a faint flush showed behind his pale skin, as he recognised the woman with whom he had quarrelled twelve months before.

She had been advancing rapidly, inwardly wondering at the dog's unusual partiality for strangers, but involuntarily stopped as their glances met.

For one moment a strange softness swept round the rather hard corners of her mouth, and her face whitened slightly, but, with an effort, she threw her head back and continued on her way haughtily.

"Pomp!" she cried, "come along, this instant, sir! You must not intrude on—strangers."

Heaton had meanwhile bent his head slightly, and his mouth contracted a little at the word "stranger"; then a strange keen realisation of his physical debility came home to him with the rush of a sudden revelation, and the attenuated fingers that stroked the glossy head of the dog grew slightly cold.

"You must get along, old chap," he said gently, putting the dog down from his knee; "your mistress says you're not to intrude on——strangers."

But Pomp had no intention of obeying the mandate; his deposition from Heaton's knees was suffered in meekness, but the accompanying order carried no weight evidently, as he lay down on the gravel imperturably, and gazed up at Heaton with lazy indifference.

Presently his mistress, who had meanwhile walked on some considerable distance, noticed his continued absence, and wheeled round in deep annoyance.

"Pomp! Pomp!" she called out angrily.

The cause of her wrath lazily glanced round the leg of Heaton's trousers at his chagrined mistress, then aggravatingly wagged his tail twice, and glanced up at Heaton as if to seek commendation of his disobedience; and, miserable as the latter felt, he could not restrain a faint smile at the whimsical gravity of the dog.

"Now, really, old chap," he said, trying to lift the fat, sleek body of the rebellious spaniel from the ground, "you must go. Glad as I am to see you, I don't wish to make your mistress hate me more than she does already, by compounding your disobedience; so run off, old man."

Pomp suffered himself to be lifted, but on regaining his legs, evinced no disposition to move, but glanced alternately from the distant figure of his mistress to the face of the man beside him, as if in amazed wonderment at the unusual amount of space separating the objects of his interest.

Presently the angry incisive tones of his mistress were repeated. "Pomp! Pomp! come along this instant, sir!"

"Off you go," said Heaton, determinedly, as he gently pushed the spaniel away from him, with the point of his stick. The latter looked at him reproachfully, but refused to budge, and Heaton began to feel himself in rather an uncomfortable if not slightly ridiculous position.

Again the angry voice of the lady came towards him, but the only response evoked was a complacent wag of the tail; otherwise the object of her solicitude remained impassive.

Meanwhile Heaton was alternately flushing and paling with annoyance. Probably she would think he sought to detain the dog out of childish spite for the purpose of placing her in a ridiculously awkward position. The thought was not pleasant, and he twisted in his chair uncomfortably, but the troublesome thought refused to evaporate, and at length Heaton in exasperation rose, and shortly calling to the dog, walked towardsthe lady.

An expression of surprise, followed by a slight flush of anger, flitted across her features for a moment, as she saw him rise from his chair, and come towards her, then the anger fled before some other feeling, strangely soft and tender, as she observed the almost pathetic slowness of his movements.

"I beg your pardon," he said, raising his hat, "for appearing to force myself on you, but the dog wouldn't leave me, so I thought it would save you some annoyance if I brought him to you."

"Thank you," she said, "he is very disobedient to-day, he doesn't usually——"

"Intrude on strangers," supplemented Heaton with a bitter smile.

"I am sorry I said that, now," she corrected quietly, "it was despicable of me to have ever made such a remark. You have been very ill, I he—I read all about your heroism in the papers, and I am truly sorry for hurting you gratuitously. Won't you believe me?" she continued almost wistfully, "when I repeat that I am thoroughly ashamed, and very deeply grieved for having hurt you so?"

"Yes," said Heaton gently, "I do believe you."

He did not look up as he made the remark but remained with his eyes fixed on the holes in the gravel, which his stick was engaged in manufacturing.

"You have not quite recovered yet," she continued, after a surreptitious glance at Heaton's rather grey looking face.

"No," he answered, raising his eyes to hers, "on some days I imagine I am nearly well, on others the uncomfortable demon of pessimism tries to persuade me that I shall never be quite right again. But, on the whole, I can safely say I feel better, much better, than I did six months ago."

"Six months ago," she repeated slowly, "if my memory serves me correctly, your life was being despaired of, so your answer is equivalent to a negative; you—why, what is the matter?" she broke off suddenly, as Heaton leaned heavily on his stick, and covered his face with the palm of his hand for a moment.

When he removed it, she thought his eyes looked almost black amidst the ashy whiteness of his face.

"Oh! it's nothing, really," he answered, with a ghostly smile of deprecation, "it's awfully stupid, but I got up from that seat rather suddenly, and the doctors, you see, have been counselling moderation in speed and method in movement and one cannot with impunity, smash their counsels—I am sorry I——"

"Please don't," she interrupted quickly, "take this instead," and she handed him a tiny bottle of smelling salts.

Heaton accepted the restorative gratefully.

"Would you mind my sitting down for a moment on one of these chairs?" he said, "I get tired very easily," he added apologetically.

"Of course not," she said anxiously, "please don't mention foolish scruples in a case like this, it is ridiculous. Are you better now?" she inquired anxiously as they sat down with the redoubtable Pomp occupying the intervening space between the two chairs.

"Yes, I'm all right now, thank you," said Heaton gratefully, as he turned towards her. "You are very good to me," he continued, "after what I——Will you forgive me," he broke off, "if I speak to you about the—about twelve months ago? It cannot matter much now, of course, but I should like you to know that I have been punished for my distrust and obstinate pig-headedness by one deep unavailing regret. As I lay in the hospital, staring up all day long at the whitewashed ceiling, the pride and obstinacy all died out of me, and only the pain for any trouble and annoyance I caused you, remained. I don't quite know why I speak to you as I am doing," he went on apologetically, "only when one is very weak one is apt to become garrulous, and if by any chance I should never get quite right again, I want you to know that no one could wish you more happiness than I do, in your new life——"

"My new life," she repeated amazedly, "what do you mean?"

"Your engagement to——"

"Engagement! I don't quite understand!"

"Aren't you going to marry Mason? I heard——"

"No," she said quietly but decisively, "at present I have no intention of marrying Mr. Mason. I shall never——"

Her voice wavered slightly, as she broke off in the middle of the sentence and stooping over the dog commenced to stroke his big brown head.

Heaton's eyes were rivetted on her hat and a tumultuous sense of gladness surged through him. With a flush on his face he stooped and laid his hand on the dog's head also. The latter accepted the attention complacently.

Presently the girl looked up as Heaton's fingers closed round hers, and the eyes which met his glance were suffused with tears.

"Vera," he said gently, "shall we go back to where we left off, twelve months ago?"

"Yes," she whispered, "we will go back!"

After a few moments of such silence as only comes from utter content, the girl with an impulsive movement stooped down and kissed the dog's head.

"You darling!" she cried. "We owe all our happiness to you!"

"Yes," said Heaton with a long breath, "neither of us will ever forget 'The Intervention of Pomp.'"

The Poet's Awakening.

YES, I will see him.

The editor rose from his desk, glancing at the card in his hand with a pleasant smile of anticipation. A moment later he made a step forward with outstretched hand as his visitor entered.

"Are you Mr. Sparling?" he asked, a shade, half surprise, half doubt, making itself apparent in voice and look.

"Yes, but, out it's Mr. Vernon, the editor, I want to see."

"I am Mr. Vernon, and very pleased to make your acquaintance, Mr. Sparling. I count you as the most interesting of all my contributors. Pray sit down; though a busy man I can spare a quarter of an hour for so famous a personage as you are becoming."

Mr. Sparling sat down as commanded but remained silent. He felt very shy and to add to his confusion this man to whom he had decided to make a confidential communication was not elderly as he had imagined, but in appearance little older than himself. Could this be the editor of the Leicester Magazine, the success of the day, one of the best edited and cleverest of all the periodicals under which Smith's bookstalls groaned? However, his manner was friendly and kind.

"I feel very proud," the editor was saying, "at having discovered you. When your biography is published many years hence the fact that your first verses appeared in my magazine will be recorded."

"Indeed," stammered the poet, "I am very grateful to you. I could hardly believe my eyes when you acknowledged my first poem, and when I saw it in print."

"Good work," said the editor a trifle dogmatically, "finds its market sooner or later. The present age is critical but broad-minded. Of course the stock saying that literature is an overcrowded profession is true; on the other hand a man of talents finds his opening earlier now than in any other time. There are men who wail that they are neglected geniuses, I read their manuscripts every day—and I sincerely hope that they will remain neglected. Ever since I started the Leicester I have been looking for a new poet; not a mere manufacturer of verses, but a poet. Your first contribution pleased me immensely, it had the true touch of genius. It has been very gratifying, too, to find my own opinion endorsed by other editors. Never have poems been so extensively annexed. Why every evening paper copies them!"

Underlying the editor's compliments was a vague unexpressed doubt whether the young man sitting awkwardly on the edge of a chair, a nervous smile on his commonplace face, could in reality be the author of the exquisite verses which, under the initials H. S., had created so much stir in the literary world. They struck a note poets are prone to harp on, the awakening of love. But though the theme was hackneyed, the expression was fresh; this fine gift of song moved the most careless and cynical, so infinitely tender yet deep-seeing was the bard. Certainly H. S. was no slavish imitator of the great poets of the past. No wonder the editor was proud of having published such verses. But could this man have written them?

He was a shy looking man of about four and twenty, with dark hair and small pale features. The face was freckled, the nose ill shaped, the whole expression and appearance homely. Nor did his dress improve him. A painfully new tweed suit clung awkwardly about his figure, his tie was tawdry, his boots clumsy, he evidently came fresh from the barbers, a smell of pomade enveloping him. He looked like a provincial clerk unaccustomed to society.

And this, the editor learnt with astonishment, was the case. Only a post office clerk in Yarmouth, whose aunt and guardian let lodgings!

"And when did you begin writing poetry?"

The visitor flushed painfully. "I was coming to that," he said, and paused a moment, then gaining courage from the other's manner, pursued somewhat shamefacedly:

"I've never told anyone the story and I'm afraid you'll only laugh, but I want to ask your advice. The fact is I want to find a certain lady living in London, and I don't know how to begin."

"There are, I should say, over two million ladies in London," said the editor. "But let me hear, perhaps I can aid you."

"I'm a shy man," confessed the poet, "and I've practically no friends. I don't play cricket or football, and my only amusement is reading. I was especially fond of reading poetry, Tennyson, Longfellow, Shelley, Swinburne—I've read nearly all the poets but till last August I never tried to write a line.

"It was one evening last August, that I was inspired to write, the evening when I first met her; from that day I began a new life. I had gone for a bicycle ride, but it was so dusty and crowded on the road that at Caistor I turned off and wheeled my machine along a footpath through a field leading to the sea. I lay down. facing it on one of the sand-hills that fringe the shore. The waves were breaking very softly on the sandy beach, I could hear the twitter of birds among the belt of trees in the fields behind, and I lay enjoying it all, feeling tired and half drowsy, when a soft voice addressed me. I looked and for the moment thought I was dreaming, never had I seen so beautiful a creature as the woman who stood beside me gazing down with dark blue inquiring eyes. I stared, silent, tongue-tied.

"'Won't you answer me?' she said smiling, and then I began to stammer an apology and explain I had not heard what she said.

"'I want to get on the Yarmouth Road. I have lost my friends and the way!' she replied smiling divinely.

"'It is close by,' I answered, 'if you will allow me I will show you.'

"We walked along the footpath together, I wheeling her machine, and when we reached the gate, the road was plainly visible. She stopped me there, said she would trouble me no further, and with a bow of farewell mounted and rode swiftly off. In another two minutes she had rounded the corner and passed out of sight. I saw her vanish from my eyes five minutes after she had first appeared, but her memory has been with me ever since. Yet as I rode home later, I could remember hardly anything of what she had said as we walked, except that she was a Londoner, while I had been too shy and stupid to say anything.

"My brain was in a whirl; as I thought of her, half-unconsciously words, verses, came into my head. Late that night I sat down and wrote the poem I first sent you. Next morning when I read it I thought it good and could hardly believe I had written it, so I sent it to the Leicester.

"And that is how all my poems have been written; thinking of her, dreaming of her, worshipping her memory, the verses came, poems fit to express my love and adoration."

"Surely," thought Vernon, "the man is speaking the truth, he does not appear to have enough imagination to invent the story."

"Hitherto I have been content with only the memory, but that no longer satisfies," continued the love-lorn young man. "An infinite craving to see her again if only for a moment overwhelms me, and so now I've got my fortnight's holiday,"—"oh, bathos," murmured the editor—"I've come to London to seek her."

"To seek her? But have you no clue to her identity, nothing to guide your search?"

"Absolutely none."

"Then your search is hopeless; if you are ignorant of name, address——"

"Who is considered the most beautiful woman in London?" interrupted the poet.

"Good Heavens, how can I answer that question? Their name is legion. Stay, I can give you one practical piece of advice—look at the photographs in the shop windows."

"I will walk London," said the poet doggedly, "till I find her!"

The editor rose to intimate that the interview was at an end.

"Come and see me again when I not so busy. Have you nothing fresh for me?"

"Yes, I have just finished a new poem."

"I should like to see it, bring it yourself, come to-morrow, no, Thursday is a quiet day, come on Thursday, and we'll have another chat. Perhaps the mysterious goddess will be found."

"Ah, if I could only find her."

"Would you be happier?" said the editor. "Perhaps—perhaps the goddess has feet of clay."

"What did he mean?" mused the poet as he paced the Strand, and being at that moment only Herbert Sparling, a common-place and rather stupid young man, he did not understand. Neither did he fully realise the wonderful gift he possessed. For we all of us when young and growing into manhood at times have great thoughts. Transcendental ideas float nebulous in our brains; we seem lifted above ourselves. And sometimes when this mood is upon us, we fly to paper seeking relief by the flow of words with which we endeavour to clothe our great thought, the original piece of philosophy, the verse with its noble ring; alas, when morning comes, how often we find dross instead of gold. Where is the gold minted from our brain, the glass of sparkling champagne creaming and bubbling? Gone: the coin rings flat, it is only brass, and a bad imitation, too; the champagne is ginger beer, flat as ditch-water. But occasionally it is otherwise, and Herbert Sparling was one of the exceptions.

The poet's love was a thing apart, a secret jealously hid, and now that he was in London the fascination the great city has for provincials half swamped his dream of the fair unknown goddess for whom he was searching. As he walked he looked for her, but the interesting and novel sights that met his eyes could not be entirely banished.

He obeyed the editor's hint to look at the photographs in shop windows. There he saw pretty faces, mostly of theatrical stars. One of these young ladies was not unlike the beautiful unknown; she was dressed in a short frock, and coquettishly surveyed the world under a big straw hat, with a somewhat forced smile. There seemed profanation in the resemblance, and the poet turned away.

About six he entered a shop for tea, late dinners being unfamiliar to him; he ate and drank feeling tired and depressed. He was in the same city with his goddess, but she seemed further away than when he wandered on the beach at Yarmouth. Surely his search would be useless, yet an inward voice stronger than he bade him continue; to lose heart the first day was absurd.

As he was about to rise, a newcomer who had just taken the vacant chair opposite to him exclaimed: "Why, it's Mr. Sparling," and the poet recognised a man who had lodged the previous summer at his aunt's house, a clerk of the name of Catley.

"How's the old lady?" said Catley genially. "I haven't forgotten her, or her light dumplings and gravy.

I daresay I shall come to Yarmouth again, when I get my holidays. What are you doing here? Having your holidays, are you? On the loose, eh? Oh! I know you provincial chaps who go to church or chapel regular on Sundays and look as if butter wouldn't melt in your mouths. I know what you're up to in London when you're sight-seeing."

He emphasised his remarks with a wink and dig at Herbert's ribs.

"Look here, are you going anywhere this evening? I've got two seats for the Palatial, fauteuils, too. Dicky Embleton, the great serio-comic, gave them to me; he lives my way, and, I may say, we're pals."

Herbert was obliged to confess that he had no engagement, and, as Mr. Catley was incapable of realising anyone preferring solitude to his society, the matter was settled. Mr. Catley proceeded to eat his tea, entertaining his provincial friend with an account of a ripping fine girl whose acquaintance he had lately made, and various anecdotes concerning the great Dicky Embleton.

"I've seen him get outside ten whiskies and soda without getting squiffy. There's an 'ead for you!

"I say," proceeded Mr. Catley, "how's the pretty girl who's so mashed on you down at Yarmouth?"

"Who do you mean?" asked Herbert, trying to assert some dignity.

"Why, you know who I mean, Miss Clara Ellis. Was always coming to see your aunt. That girl's a catch, too; I should say her father's a warm man. That shop of his must be worth a pretty penny. Have you popped the question?"

"I am not engaged to Miss Ellis," said Herbert stiffly, "if that is what you mean. We are very good friends, have been all our lives, nothing more."

"Well, you are a fool," said Mr. Catley frankly. "Why, I'd marry her like a shot myself. I did try a bit of a mash but it was no good. She was so gone on you. And she an only child, the old man has got nobody else to leave it to. You don't know your luck; come along, let's be off."

The poet meekly allowed himself to be alternately chaffed and patronised and presently found himself in the red plush seats of the Palatial, while Catley told him in a loud whisper the private history of each of the artistes.

A long and dreary ballet came later and the house began to fill.

"Dolly Dorrington's next," said Catley, "she'll sing, 'Ducky, ducky.' She'd make a cat laugh, she does go near the knuckle. I reckon there'll be a row about her songs when the licences are applied for. They say the diamonds she wears are worth four thou. Lord Sherrington gave them to her, he's spent eight thou. over her this year."

A burst of music from the orchestra announced the inimitable Dolly, "exclusively engaged." Herbert raised his eyes from the programme and looked at her. His face went white, and a blank sense of horror filled him. Then as he stared, a sigh of relief broke from his lips; for the moment so close was the resemblance that he had taken the singer for the unknown goddess, but he now recognised one distinctive feature which showed him he was mistaken.

"Isn't she ripping?" whispered Catley, "and she's as fetching off the stage as on. I remember seeing her down at Yarmouth last August on the pier."

"I think you are mistaken," said Herbert; "there was a lady, I know, at Yarmouth last August very much like her, for I saw her once, but she had lovely yellow hair and this Miss Dorrington has red."

"Bless you, it was the same, I know I'm not mistaken. Dolly moves with the fashions; yellow hair was all the go last year. Now listen."

Herbert sat silent and stunned, his brain too numb to realise the full extent of his discovery. But as the song went on it came to him with pitiless force like drops of water falling from a height, each drop increasing the torture. He winced in agony as the broad inuendoes and equivocal jokes of the singer came on his ears. He felt as though he could not sit and endure it any longer, it must be a mistake; an extraordinary resemblance must have deceived Catley as well as himself, he must see her nearer so as to be certain. Unobserved by his companion, he slipped out quietly and sought the stage door.

He had not long to wait; presently the door opened and Miss Dorrington emerged, escorted by a young man in evening dress who led her to a flashey looking brougham which stood by. A liveried lad opened the door. "Home, my lord?" he queried. The young man nodded and handed the lady in. Herbert was so close he could have touched her, his eyes were riveted on her face, there was no longer any mistake, his goddess was found but she was of earth, earthy. The carriage rolled away and left him standing forlorn and miserable.

Herbert walked straight back to his lodgings; the electric light dazzled his eyes, and the busy crowded streets jarred and irritated his nerves; he wanted to be alone, to think. He sat motionless for hours on his bed that night staring before him with glassy eyes. Dawn was breaking before he roused himself and going to his portmanteau took out some sheets of paper. Folding them in squills he held them to the gas jet till there was nothing left but a little heap of ashes.

Next Thursday as the editor went home he remembered the poet had not called. He did not know his contributor's London address, but when a fortnight had gone by without his seeing or hearing from him he wrote to Yarmouth. To this letter he received no reply, nor to another he wrote subsequently. Presently in the bustle of a busy life the poet faded from his memory. Poetry is not essential, a magazine can get on very well without it, yet occasionally he wondered why the poems had ceased so suddenly.

It was three months later that Mrs. Taylor, the evening before her nephew's wedding day, said in a tone of conscious pride:

"Well, 'Erbert, all I can say is you're a very lucky man. The Sparlings 'as always kept themselves respectable, but you're the first as has ever taken a thirty-two pound semi-detached villa, rates and taxes extra, electric light laid on, with a bath-room with 'ot and cold water, and a greenhouse as well. And to marry a girl like Clara, who's quite the lady, who's 'ad lessons in singing from the sister of a barronite, and can talk French! I must say Mr. Ellis has brought her up proper, never let her look in the shop, much less serve there. And the fine furniture he's bought and furnished your house from top to bottom with. Well, you ought to be 'appy, though I can't say as you're so cheerful as you used to be when you were always scribbling, but you seem to have dropped that lately."

"Yes," answered Herbert, "I've dropped that."

He never wrote another line.

LOVE IN NIPPON.

It was a curious gathering. Looking over the deep, serene Sumida with its palace-boats, whence arose the quaint strains of samisen, now heaving and now mellowing on the waves of its eventide; looking across to the dreamy banks of Mukojima, with their ten miles of the cherry groves, now ablaze in the setting sun of an early spring, the uncertain shapes of home-bound epicureans moving slowly; here, on Hashiba side, in a lordly hall of Hosokawa mansion, there were assembled in a strange concourse some ten or twelve Englishmen and Americans and a few other Europeans, with a goodly number of the Japanese themselves sprinkled among them. It is not for me to tell how this meeting came about; I only happen to know that its object was to listen to the tale of love of many a different land.

The last speaker sat down. The storm of applause raged and subsided. The chairman called on the next, and great was the enthusiasm that followed. In its midst arose Mr. Okada Gemba, a stalwart man of fifty years, full of military airs. One would have expected anything but a gentle voice of sweet passion from a man of his type; yet you could easily trace out a forehead of beautiful shape and a mouth of ideal cut, which told of a handsome face of the early days, now buried under the grey. Let us listen:

"I rise with a nameless feeling. After having listened to the excellent stories of the preceding gentlemen, also well told, what could you expect from me? Yet I am here to-night to represent our beloved Japan. Japan shall not be outdone. No, not even in the matter of love. I will proceed:

"Thirty-five years ago I was a young man of twenty, a winsome youth. But how many of you here know the Japan of those days of three decades and five springs ago? The two centuries of peace and plenty perfected the splendour of Tokugawa dynasty, alas! at the expense of the honest and the hard-working. Outside the very walls of polish and luxury the atmosphere was thick with buzzing noises, as of bees, ready for a new life; new action and restlessness and venturesomeness became the spirit of the day among the quick. Nor was I an exception. At twenty I left the home, and went about a-mushashigio (wandering about for the championship of the martial arts). Ah! the word itself has become a relic of the past feudalism now: but in those days there was a glory of manhood in its very sound.

"I journeyed south. In Nagasaki I became acquainted with an Englishman, a survivor of a wreck. From him I acquired a little English and some knowledge of the West. It was like a peep into the grandeur of a forbidden land; and a forbidden land it was for us at the time, that home of a modern civilization. My spirit took a new turn then, and went a little ahead of the reckoning of the period. My friends, however, warned me in time that I was being suspected of high-sounding crimes, such as desertion, treason, etc., so I hurried to North and went wandering through the domains of the different daimias of those regions, whiling away the days of an unwilling exile.

"Five years elapsed; and one day I walked past the little town of Yaita and came under a bower of a cherry-tree, which outspread its branches over the road, growing itself within the row of a long winding hedge-fence encircling a large villa. The time was spring. The queen blossoms were in their glory. I looked up and saw the sister trees rivalling their magnificence over the whole length of the villa, but the one I stood under was the queen of queens. In a momentary dream of happiness I mused out:

"U-tsu-ku-shi-na
I-ma-o sa-ka-ri-ni
Sa-ku-ra-ba-na
No-chio-no Shi-ru-shi-ni
Ta-wo-ri-te-va u-kan."

"(How grand in thy glory: O blossoming cherry: That the like be mine, will I thy branch pluck now.) I reached up my hand, and was about to break the nearest one, when I heard a noise of someone else tearing down a branch within.

"A sweet voice then said: 'Your pardon,' and a hand, beauteous as pearl, held out to me a pink-clustered bough through a crevice in the hedge growth. And lo! in the little opening I beheld a face as of a flower. I heard my own blood coursing in my veins. I stretched out my hand, received the gift, and said an awkward thanks, half-apologetically. I saw a faint streak of crimson mount the face, but only for a moment; it disappeared behind where the growth was the thickest, an uncertain figure gliding away out of my sight. For the first time in my life I, leaning eagerly forward against the hedge, found myself trying to catch a glimpse of a woman. I was spell-bound, I forgot myself.

"I leaned there all absorbed, till a hand suddenly jerked me by the shoulder, and a gruff voice said:

"'A gentleman or a thief?'

"Turning round quickly, and taking up a position of defence, I said in my consternation:

"'Thy words of impertinence! I am a gentleman; what of that?' and I faced a group of five samurai smiling a smile of derision.

"The words had scarcely left my lips when one of them ejaculated:

"'Noble gentleman! we are glad to make your acquaintance,' and his well-spread palm came flashing over my cheek. But it lodged itself only in my firm grasp, which pulled my innocent saluter a little toward myself, and with a twist of my body I gave him a twist and threw him in the air—a respectable toss! Ah! you smile, my good audience; you do not believe me? Yet only thirty years ago a feat like this was a mere commonplace. Ah me! how old have I grown these days.

"The tossed man picked himself deftly up, and with his comrades withdrew. I did not, but stood glaring defiance at them with my hand on the hilt of my sword. Passers-by and curious on lookers from the vicinity gathered round us in a goodly crowd. A breathless silence sealed their mouths, and they kept a safe distance watching our next move. The odds were against me, most plainly, but my calm, collected manner seemed to have awakened an awe in my assailants, so that each was anxious to have the other start the first blow.

"Irritated at their cowardice, I relaxed my guard. Down came a sword descending over me—only to hit the air.

"For mine left its scabbard at the same moment, and striking him on the back felled my enemy to the ground. At this the other four jumped upon me. I was now in great danger, when there came rushing towards us two men from opposite directions. One of them exclaimed:

"'Cowards! away with your arms!'

"My foes dodged sulkily a few steps backward, which I let them do without pressing on them, as the fight was after all an unwilling one on my part. Then the other of the new-comers called out to me:

"'Honoured stranger, pray calm your anger, even for the sake of the flowers you stand under.'

"A sweet fancy! My heart softened, and I, too, put away my weapon, at which the first man stepped forward and with an unexpected politeness addressed me:

"'Ha! all health to you, Mr. Okada. If I am not mistaken, you are the son of my honoured master!'

"I recognised in the man Nejiro Yokone, who at the time I left my father, was one of his principal pupils in the time-honoured art of fencing. It foreboded ill that he should salute me thus with open hands.

"Some time before this I heard a rumour that the same Nejiro was expelled from my father's for a certain offence not to be mentioned here, and there was no reason whatever that he should bear me good-will. But there he was, with bows, smiles, and exclamations, the very picture of friendliness. I accepted them all with good grace. He even apologised to me on behalf of the bullies who so unwarrantably attacked me; he said he was keeping a fencing-school of his own in Yaita, and that they were his green pupils. He also introduced me to the man who bade me peace.

"The gentleman's name was Mr. Hori, and he it was who owned the cherry-bowered villa. Mr. Hori proposed that we should all adjourn to a feast, explaining to me at the same time that that day he had invited Nejiro and his pupils with some of the townspeople to a party in honour of his villa's spring, and that I should be welcome above others as an old friend of Professor Yokone's. Professor Yokone, too, added a word of persuasion; so I followed suit, and walked into Mr. Hori's.

"From the genka (entrance) through the hallway to the guests' room, glitter and lustre there were none to force upon the vulgar the idolatry of wealth; but in the midst of the subdued quietness of colours and ornaments there issued a gentle fragrance of unstained woodwork, and it was delightful to tread on the pale green matting of fresh tatami. The silken kakemono, or paintings, that hung gracefully in a fantastic niche of tokonoma, the dwarf pines and cut twigs which so picturesquely stood in pots and vases of exquisite makes, the spacious garden that opened in front like a painted scenery with its pond, rocks, and bowering trees; all bespoke superior taste and culture in the host.

"Upon these, however, I shall not dwell, but the beautiful panorama hangs before me now! I see the little sunken-eyed Yokone, bulging himself out superbly at the head of a motley row of the rustic guests. I see the karakami door behind the host slide gently open. I see a lady, the graceful wife of our host, enter the room, followed timidly by her daughter. My heart quickens—it throbs! Lo! she is the same—that fair daughter of mine host—she is the one who played coquette to me behind the fence!

"Ah! I imagine the undying fragrance of that love-inspiring branch, still lingering about me! How like the flower of flowers she sits there, haunting vision! There were there plump lasses of bonnie faces, but how each eye turned on Miyo, for such was her name. There are warring within me the passions of jealousy and even anger, the twin servants of awakened love, as Nejiro Yokone greeted her with words of familiarity—though they were merest comments on the weather! Yet, ah! I felt dizzy when Miyo bowed me a mumbling bow of acquaintance at the parental words of introduction.

"We all sat there now ready for the feast, but it did not come yet. Mr. Hori had a batch of tanzaku cards distributed among us, and demanded of us an ikku, a verse, or line of poetical sentiment on his cherries, now in their resplendent bloom. A delightful conceit! But what a cast of smiling despair over the honest country faces! Our host led in scribbling down the thirty one syllables, followed by his wife. Miyo was the next to take up the pen-brush, and then Taro, her youngest brother. Taro was the exact counterpart of his sister in looks, a handsome youth of sixteen! After him I came up in the race, and the worthy professor closed the suit. The rest, one and all, laughed a faint laughter of innocent shame, bowed and scratched their heads, and prayed us to read forth our productions.

"The all-important man, as he sat there, my friend Nejiro Yokone, was asked to read his first. He did, and no one ever heard a worse hackwork of plagiarism; I pitied the poor fellow; but when it was my turn, ha! I had to muster all my courage. Strange power—Love! Only an hour ago I defied death in the midst of flashing swords. But now a glance, a smile, a word, and I sat on a rack of judgment—almost trembling! But in those days, thirty years ago, Samurai was ashamed to know himself to be in love. I steadied myself, nevertheless, and calmly sang out:

"'Ka-ba-ka-ri-ni
A-wa-re-to Koso-wa
O-mo-ho-u-re
Ha-na-no Ko-ko-ro-zo
I-ka-ni A-ru-ru-um?

("While thus and so I love thee, O beauteous flower, I wonder where thy thoughts be?)

"The flower told me they were on me, about me, but that was years afterwards. The chokus of warmed sake now went their rounds. Tai-soup; boiled hirame; sliced katsu-o-ya; mother-of-pearl in vinegar; pigeons and snipes cut in bits, and roasted whole; but away with the inventory. The time flew fast and the sun was now low. The blossoming cherries glowed and reddened in its departing rays.

"We were in the height of our rustic revelry when Yokone took us by surprise by coolly saying:

"'I admit that poesy is a form of pleasure, but it is for those of older age and gentler sex; we have gratified them both. But we samurai glory in the martial arts; let us now have our turn.'

"And he challenged me to a fencing bout. I refused—refused till common sense and modesty were alike exhausted.

"We alighted on the ground, Nejiro and I—and fought with the shinai (bamboo swords). I easily won the first, but gave him the second round, for he was drunk. Upon his victory, however, Yokone became decidedly unpleasant, and abused not only myself, but my honoured father as well. There were there the five of his pupils, one of whom had the contour of his flat head frightfully altered by me. There were also fair Miyo and other girls and women of the vicinity, listening to him.

"Poor Nejiro must have thought it a right good opportunity to revenge himself on the son of his master, who had rightly disgraced him. Nejiro challenged me for the third time. I was not yet intoxicated, and refused it. Nejiro's pupils chuckled and said loudly among themselves that I was wise. Nejiro repeated the challenge; I accepted. My shinai whistled savagely, and, before I knew, the good professor lay in an almost unconscious heap, blood streaming from a cut on his forehead, which he got on falling against a sharp-cornered step-stone.

"You may well imagine the confusion that ensued. The banquet broke up suddenly, and Nejiro was hurriedly carried away on a litter. In sincere regret I offered to accompany the wounded professor to his house, but the poor fellow stopped me hysterically, saying: 'Avant! thou coward! Knowing me drunk, thou hast violated the courtesy of the true samurai-hood! Thou dog! none of thy hypocrisy!' I kept my peace. The situation was extremely awkward. As soon as Nejiro was carried out, I said my adieu to the host, not forgetting to add a word of gratitude as well as of deep regret. Mr. Hori would not listen to me; on the contrary, he invited me to stay with him, for the night at least, and even much longer if it did not inconvenience me much. I almost suspected the man. Somehow, however, I was loth to leave the house, so that I was easily prevailed upon.

"What next happened was that the following morning found the professor Nejiro Yokone groaningly ill, which caused a vacancy in no less a position than that of Mr. Hori's family tutorship, and I became temporarily installed in this grave office. The wheel of events was on its freak, I thought. Nevertheless, it gave me an immeasurable satisfaction, in the frame of mind I then was in. For happy were the days that followed — the flowers smiling gladsomely on the growing spring. My pupils—my Miyo and Taro—came regularly at nine in the morning, and we had our physical lesson. Taro, my great favourite, was quite an adept in kenjutsu (the long sword fencing), while his sister was wonderfully clever at kaiken (stiletto).

As I turned round she handed me a sealed note. I remember her face was death-like, and her hands shook.

"As a teacher I was to be sentimentless. But, the mischief! How pretty and contented Miyo used to look, as I stood by and took her by her hand, showing her the way. I used to wonder then if she knew that I was trembling. In the afternoons we read together the leaves of the old sages. With a long, honest face I used to expostulate on their love-forbidding tenets, while secretly my smouldering heart was in wild rebellion.

"It was probably for ten days that I stayed with Mr. Hori; but now I often look back to the time as if it were months. Ah, the visions of the past! how enlarged they appear, as time stretches out their shadows! Shadows? Nay! I see now the very path which led the way from my room's verandah to the centre of the orchard, and thence sloped upwards to the top of a little height! I used to tread on its winding course, evening after evening, and always unexpectedly meet my fair pupil tripping gently under the flowering trees. She was always with a chaperon who was her nurse. The latter would each time take it upon herself to explain to me that her young mistress had lately grown very sombre, in spite of the gaiety of the season, so that she thought an evening's stroll would do her some good. 'Come!' the woman would say, 'let us climb the hill and Mr. Okada will tell us of his travels and adventures.'

"On the top of the hill we used to sit under a large cherry-tree, and I would start squeezing about the corners of my memory bag, and, lo! the good woman would find some excuse or another to slip away for a time, and then reappear at the right moment—good soul that she was. Left alone, Miyo and I would talk on till the golden sunset gradually changed into the purple mist of distant mountains; and then, in the uncertainty of darkening twilight, our heart-strings, revealed on the flash of our glances, met and tied themselves into knots. Withal, Miyo and I were a pupil and a master distanced from each other by the rigour of an inherited spirit; our expressed love was therefore all the more intense.

"At night the good chaperon would come round to my room to lay out my bed-rig, and smilingly would whisper to me secrets—as she treasured them. The secrets, to be brief, were that when Yokone first opened his school in Yaita his fame as an accomplished master from the capital, and also as a man of courtly manners, spread far and wide, which opened his way into the Hori family. This Nejiro of rabid passions immediately burned his heart at the altar of the beautiful Miyo. But

Miyo would not have him. Neither would her parents, who soon found out the metal he was made of. But the professor insisted, and well he could do so, for a fencing master on the wing of popularity would have dared anything in those days. Things were indeed come to a very strange state when I made an appearance on the scene, and incidentally proved more or less a godsend to them. This much said, the woman would musingly add: 'You and mistress Miyo would make a beautiful couple.'

"'But, my good woman, she does not care for a homeless wanderer like me,' I would laughingly remark. To this she would excitedly reply:

"'My good sir, you do not know, indeed, you do not know! Heaven has prepared it for you, sir!'

"'How?'

"'Why, sir, the night before that unfortunate sakura festival my mistress dreamt—she confides everything to her old nurse, even her dreams, poor thing! She dreamed that she was praying to her patron deity to free her from the inordinate desires of her tutor, whom she did not and could not love. The god benignly opened his lips, and softly said:

"'"To-morrow there shall come a man from the south, journeying past thy home. He is a worthy man, though fleeing from persecution now. Thy brother shall follow him and he will love him. Even him shalt thou be, and be blessed!"'

"In days when love reasoned into mysteries—and who has not had those days?—I was deeply impressed with this bit of occult information. It was on a rainy night that the good woman told me this. I sat up late and long, after she was gone, losing myself in the land of fancies and visions! But it was a dream after all, for on the morrow I rose uncommonly early, after a disturbed sleep, and as I was looking out of my room, with sad, uneasy heart, over the shorn orchard, whose majestic robes of only the day before now lay bespattered over the muddy ground, the old nurse startled me from behind.

"As I turned round she handed me a sealed note, and was gone in a minute. I remember her face was death-like, and her hands shook. The note read: 'With an extreme regret, both my father and myself learn that you are an advocate of the foreign-intercourse policy, and also that the Professor Yokone intends denouncing you to the authorities as soon as he is well enough to come out, which may be to-morrow. I dare not believe all, but it will be for your good if you will leave here immediately on receipt of this note.' It was signed Miyo!

"I read it, and my heart throbbed wildly. I read it over and over again and tore it into shreds. As I recall the occasion, I see before me now my own face, hot-white, quivering, and twitching, and the bloodshot eyes standing on their ends! I stood there on the edge of the room rigid, but trembling—the joys of yesterday suddenly quenched, and the cherished dreams of the future cruelly crushed in the wild awaking of the present. The storm of angry despair, of thirsting revenge, of blind fury, came surging up, but went.

"For in a few moments I had said quietly to myself: 'Poor innocent girl! If she finds a devil in me, I should not blame her. Wiser than she would any moment send me up the cross if only they knew my sympathies and opinions. But the time has not yet come for me; I shall yet awhile bow to fate in ignominy.'

"But I was certain that the time was coming. I calmly made up my little portmanteau and walked out of Mr. Hori's house, without bidding a word of farewell to anybody, which I could not according to the tenour of that evictionary document. They must, I thought, have been glad to get rid of me. And I wended my way, lost in the clamour of jarring thoughts within me—hardly conscious of where I was going.

"Vigilance was severe in Yedo at that time, with its ins and outs of strangers, who daily lost their individuality in the mighty waves of its swarming population; there was more safety there than anywhere else for a person of my circumstances, though the risks were no less. It was this thought, I suppose, which led me eastward out of that little town of Yaita that gloomy morning, and found me the next eve buying a passage on the boat bound from Sekiya to Yedo. The boat took us safely down the river through the night, and about noon the next day we found ourselves at the foot of O-hashi, Yedo. The passengers were soon lost in different directions among the moving crowds of the great city.

"I was tired and wanted a rest. I started toward Bakurocho, the street of hotels. I had gone hardly ten yards when a familiar voice called to me, 'Sensei' (master), and there stood Taro on my left! I could scarcely believe my own senses. Subduing my excitement, I asked him what brought him out here, how he was, where he was bound, etc. He simply said:

"'I am going to follow you wherever you go.'

"I said that was very unreasonable. His only reply was:

"'Please master, take me to a quieter place; you are drawing a crowd round us.'

"He was right; the Yedo people, always keen-eyed for anything unusual, could not fail to see something curious in the contrast between my handsome pupil, in his north-country attire, and me, a wandering samurai with a smack of Southern air about me. This was very undesirable. I beckoned to Taro, and in silence we hurried to Bakurocho.

"Once landed in a secluded room in an hotel, he produced to me a letter. It was from Miyo again. There was a strangely forced calmness on Taro's face as he watched me run over the lines which made me see poor Miyo prostrating herself in deep grief, asking me my forgiveness for her last note, and pleading that it was a mortal sacrifice on her part to send me away, but that she thought it was for my sake. I suppressed my tears, in the presence of her brother as I was. I read on, and soon came to where it said: 'Taro wishes to see the world. He is determined. He has confided to me his whole heart, and his sister has taken all the responsibilities to his parents upon herself. He is young, but Taro is a noble youth.' She asked me to take Taro as a servant for her sake, for the sake of her pure love, which would ever be true to me!

"I read through the letter, and I was at my wit's end. I saw plainly that to try to induce Taro to go back to his parents was of no use—for a time, anyway. Yet I had my ambition, my aspiration to accomplish. My spirit of patriotism was stronger than my sentiment of love; and I could ill afford then to be hampered with the care of a country lad. It was a hard dilemma to solve. One thing was clear, and it was that if Taro was to accompany me at all he must be of one mind with me, or he would be an obstacle to every step I might take. For my course lay in what appeared diabolical to the eyes of the multitude of the day.

"I tried the truth of his heart in a hundred ways, but to my satisfaction his was like a diamond which glowed forth of its native brilliancy, as I unfolded to him gradually the secrets of my inner thoughts. Finally, I told him of the greatness of the Western civilization, and that Japan must no longer sit on the pedestal of her conceit and seclusion, like a pretty doll on its gilded stool, only to be snatched away and be made amusement of by the first rude hand that may dare do it, but that she must henceforth walk forth and seek her own way through the world. Those were profound moments when I took the veil off my heart and let him look into its very depths; and Taro responded to me with all the vigour of his youth.

"We stayed about a fortnight in the hotel, toward the end of which we sold out all our belongings and bought instead fishermen's craft and apparel. Our intention was to be on the water, and seek a chance to get on board an English steamer, which, it was rumoured, was to come up the bay at that time. I knew we would be given a passage by the Englishmen as far as they were concerned; but it was a dangerous venture, after all; if only our authorities knew of, or caught us in the attempt, we were sure to lose our heads. But to be brief, we were successful. And on the 12th day of June, 1864, we were safely landed at the port of London.

"In England we little heeded the silly rudeness of the curious, nor could we lend ourselves to the overworked kindness of the you - poor - heathen sinners style of good Christians. We considered ourselves men with a mission. We were ashamed to pledge a promise to become missionaries, for a free course of study; but we were not ashamed to become humble menials that we might work for our own independent support.

"We worked hard and suffered much. When we had mastered English fairly well we set out on a lecture tour. It was a novelty—novelty always succeeds in England—and we saved enough to enable us to enter a college. Five years sped by as a dream. All that time Taro and I were like one; we always lived together. When I was ill he nursed me by day and by night—sweet and gentle, an angel of love to me. When he was sick, I, in my turn, did for him what brotherly care and tenderness could do, for he grew to be as dear to me as my own life, and more.

"The close of the fifth year of our stay in England brought us the glad news of the mighty change which gradually overtook Japan in favour of introducing European ideas. About the same time our presence in England became known to our home government, and they sent for us; they were sorely in need of anyone who knew anything of any foreign lands. When the news reached us Taro and I said:

"'Our time is come at last!'

"But such of our friends as were good Christians said:

"'Sad! sad! The heathen government are afraid that their people should learn too much of Christianity, and are therefore calling them all back, under false pretences. Sad! sad!' Fortunately, we had not become Christians enough to swallow all this, and we were soon on board a steamer, homeward-bound, with joyous hearts.

"The winter's sea was high now and then, but all went well, and we were now within a day's distance of Yokohama. The night was approaching; darkness fell over the trackless ocean. The ship rushed onward, breaking through the foaming waves; sea-urchins glittered and flowed below, while above, the clear cold sky shone forth with its stars, like revelation! Between heaven and earth, the speckled finiteness and blazing immensity, dashing forward through darkness, I stood agitated on the deck, changing thoughts of past, present, and future, of pride, glory, meekness, and trembling hope, flitting like visions in me! I was silent for many a minute. Taro stood by me; he, too, looked deeply occupied. But his eyes were intently on me, with strange sadness in them.

"But will you forgive it if it was done for love?"

"'Why, what is the matter?' I said to him. He simply replied, 'Oh, nothing!' with a forced smile; but I saw his lips quiver as he said this. My heart became strangely alarmed, as with some unknown apprehension. I hurried him down into the cabin. He sat on the couch, and I too did so, close by him. He again looked up into my face absorbedly. It was a surprise that overtook me this time.

"Taro was no longer the Taro of yesterday, of adventures, of determined looks, of fearless manliness, of youthful vigour. His looks were now those of feminine fondness, tinged with unexpressed fear and timidity.

"He looked excited, but with maidenly coyness. This was so strange, so unfathomable, that I could not help wondering long in silence.

"But Taro broke it suddenly, though with some difficulty:

"'Do you think deceiving is right in some cases?'

"I bluntly answered 'No,' which brought on his face a look of torturing emotion.

"Then after a moment or two he again said:

"'But will you forgive it if it was done for love, and that with no base motive?'

"'I dare say yes,' I answered, 'but why do you ask me such a question?'

"Taro gave me no reply; instead, to my amazement, he laughed out merrily, and said:

"'Do you st.ll love my sister?'

"'Well—a—yes; but she must be married by this time!' I heaved a deep sigh.

"'Oh! no,' returned Taro, pleasantly, and continued, 'But do you love me still?'

"'You silly boy, what does all this mean?' I demanded. Taro only smiled and looked at me fondly.

"I was never more mystified in my life than during this conversation. All was clear to me, however, when the next day Taro, now grown to be a tall, robust fellow, greeted us in his full, hearty voice, just outside the custom-house of Yokohama—not the Taro of my romantic companionship of the five eventful years, but Taro the brother of my beloved Miyo. For my Taro was my Miyo in disguise, whom I had loved as her brother. The dream was fulfilled, and my story ends here.

"My good audience, it is needless to add that my Miyo and I were soon afterwards married; and such is the story of a Japanese love. Who dares say love, pure and simple, noble and romantic, is impossible in Japan?"

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of Mr. Harry Lander's "Lucky Bargee" to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. W. Lavers, of 31 Asylum Road, Peckham, S.E. Attempts for this week's prize may deal with any subject, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 22nd. Post-cards only, please.

"Countee Collars!"

AN Irishman arriving at New York went into a laundry where a Chinaman was employed to count out the collars. Giving him a slap on the shoulder, which made the Chinaman jump, he exclaimed:

"How are ye, Mike? Shure yours is the first Oirish face oi've seen since oi left home."

The Chinaman, who happened to be counting collars at the time, looked at him severely and went on with his work. The Irishman gave him another slap on the shoulder and said:

"Phwat part ov Oireland did ye come from?"

The Chinaman replied angrily:

"Wayway, mee mee countee collars!"

"It's a loi!" exclaimed Pat, "there's not a county in all Oireland ov that name!"

Why He Spoke the Truth.

"Now," plaintively perorated the perspiring preacher, "is there a man in this congregation who never spoke a cross word to his wife? If there is, let him rise."

Dead silence, in the midst of which a fat, red-faced man of forty solemnly rose to his feet.

"Can you truly say," said the preacher, with a warning look in his eye, "that you never spoke a single cross word to your wife?"

"I can," said the fat man emphatically, "I am a bachelor." (Sensation.)

How the Walls Ran Down.

THE Irishman who went up in the hotel lift without knowing what it was did not recover from the surprise. He relates the story in this way:

"I wint to the hotel, and says I: 'Is Misther Smith in?'

"'Yes,' says the man with the sojer cap. 'Will yez step in?'

"So I steps into the cupboard, and all of a suddint he pulls the rope, and—it's the truth I'se telling yez—the walls of the building began running down to the cellar.

"'Och, murther!' says I, 'what'll become of Bridget and the children which was left below there?'

"Says the sojer-cap man: 'Be aisy, sorr; they'll be all right when yez comes down.'

"'Come down, it is?" says I. 'And it is no cupboard at all, but a haythenish balloon that yez got me in!'

"And wid that the walls stood stock still, and he opened the door, and there I was wid the roof just over my head! And, begorra, that's what saved me from goin' up to the hevins intirely!"

Should Have Told Him.

AN ex-army surgeon, discussing recent scientific discoveries the other day, said the Röntgen rays and the location of bullets brought to mind an old story about a general officer, upon whom, having been wounded in the fleshy part of his leg, the surgeons made many incisions.

At last, growing tired and worn out with pain, he asked if they were nearly through dressing his leg.

"I am looking for the ball," said the operating surgeon.

"Why didn't you say so before?" roared the officer. "I have the ball in my pocket."

Why Women Wear Their Hats Indoors.

"EXCUSE me, sir," said the man in the row behind, "but would you mind asking your wife to remove her hat? I assure you that I cannot see a thing on the stage."

"I'd like to oblige you, sir, but it is impossible," said the man addressed. "We live out of town, and we must get home to-night."

"What has that got to do with it?"

"What has that got to do with it? Why, our train goes twenty minutes after the end of the performance, and it takes her an hour to put that hat on."

How to Clear your Stock.

AT a recent fair in Paris one of the stall-holders who, despite the good weather and the multitude of passers-by, had done very little business, had recourse to an original method of clearing out his stock. While delivering his usual speech on the excellence of his half-franc articles, a gentleman, in a state of the greatest excitement, pushed his way through the crowd, and, in a white fury, exclaimed:

"There you are, you rascal! No wonder you can sell these things at half a franc when you still owe me a franc and a half for them. But the matter shall be looked into. I am going straight away to fetch the police!"

The excited gentleman disappeared. Our salesman trembled in his shoes, and entreated the bystanders to relieve him of his wares. This they were ready enough to do, in the belief that they were about to get all sorts of nice bargains at a third of their real value.

And the trick was done, for the pretended wholesale merchant was merely an accomplice of the "Cheap Jack."

He Improved.

IN Germany, some weeks ago, a railway flagman at the crossing at a small station thought he had the influenza when all the other employés of the line were getting leave of absence for the same cause, and applied to the company's doctor to be examined.

The doctor could not spare the time to stop at such a small place, so he telegraphed to the flagman to be standing beside the track when the train went past with his tongue out, and he would examine him on "the fly."

The flagman dutifully stood with his tongue out all the time the train was slowly passing his station, and the next day the company received from passengers a dozen complaints of the impertinent conduct of one of its employés at that station.

A Strange Tongue.

SOME members of a German ship's crew had occasion to visit a shipbuilding yard in England, and in the course of their walk entered a paint-shop where two Irishmen were at work.

The visitors talked together in their own language, greatly to the mystification of the British workmen, and at last one of the painters could not restrain his curiosity.

"I say, Mike," said he to his fellow labourer, "and do you know what these fellows are saying?"

"Arrah, now, Pat," answered the second man, "don't be showing your ignorance. They're spakin' shorthand."

The Worst Kind of Bargain.

A THEATRICAL manager told a story against himself the other day. An actor came to him and applied for an engagement. There did not seem to be much need of him, but his demands in the way of salary were very modest, and the manager said to him:

"Well, you may consider yourself engaged. I fancy I can find something for you to do."

The newly-engaged man looked at the manager questioningly.

"How about a contract?" he asked.

"Oh, never mind a contract. We'll have a verbal contract."

There was a look of mild reproach in the eyes of the man as he answered sorrowfully:

"Sir, the last time I made a verbal contract I drew a verbal salary."

The Danger of Kissing.

"MR. CLINKER," said the thrillingly beautiful heroine of this tale, as she turned her head and looked straight into the eyes of the young man, who was sitting as close to her on the sofa as it was possible to get, "there are some things which even a girl of my—er—advancement will not easily brook. When you first entered this room, half-an-hour ago, you bowed formally as you shook hands. did not dream of calling me by my Christian name, and, when you sat down, you took a chair which was at a convenient distance away. You had not——"

"But, my dear Miss Spingler——"

"Don't interrupt me, sir. You had not been here ten minutes before your chair was six feet nearer where I sat. In another five minutes you called me 'Dear.' Shortly afterwards you deliberately sat down on the sofa next to me. It was then that you attempted to take my hand. You need not deny it. You know it is too true. And now, sir——"

"Hear me. I——"

"And now," said the young girl, her slight form trembling with emotion, her eyes blazing, her whole attitude expressive of the deepest concern, "I want you to distinctly understand that if you should so far forget yourself as to attempt to kiss me, you do so at your own peril!"

A Possible Dilemma.

A JUDGE of the old school, loving port wine and hating trouble, is said to have once summed up a very complicated case in the following terms: "You have all heard the evidence, you have also heard what the learned counsel have said. If you believe what the counsel for the plaintiff has told you, your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, you believe what the defendant's counsel has told you, then you will give a verdict for the defendant. But if you are like me, and don't believe what either of them has said, then I'll be blowed if I know what you will do."

A Very Severe Mother.

A VERY estimable widow has a son who is far from estimable. His poor mother is nearly broken-hearted. She was confiding her troubles one day to an old and trusted friend.

"I am afraid," said her friend, "that you are not firm enough with John; you are too easy with him."

"On the contrary, I am afraid sometimes that I am too harsh."

"Why, what have you ever done?"

"Oh, I haven't done anything, but I have talked to him a good deal."

"What have you said?"

"Why, I have said, 'John! John! John!' and other severe things."

A Courting Episode.

A YOUNG couple, evidently from the country, were walking down Regent Street one day, apparently looking for something very much in particular. At last they stopped before a large jeweller's window, in which were displayed a number of wedding-rings. They stood by the window for a few moments, discussing some urgent question, the big, clumsy-looking fellow, who measured about six feet, apparently hesitating.

"Go on, George," said the girl, who scarcely reached his elbow. "What's the use of backing out now you've got so far?"

"I don't half like to, Mary," he replied; "that slick-looking fellow in there is sure to grin at me."

"What difference does it make whether he laughs or cries?" exclaimed the girl. "If you haven't the pluck I'll go myself."

"That's it, Mary," was the response; "if you'll do the asking I'll come with you and look on."

Followed by her bashful lover, the little woman marched boldly in and chose the wedding-ring, while her swain twirled his hat, blushed, and looked on. As they left, the shopman gazed after them with a thoughtful air and remarked:

"I admire Mary's pluck, but I shouldn't care to be George ten years from now."

The Angel of the Revolution

By George Griffith

Within a week everything was working as smoothly as though no revolution had ever taken place. All officials whose honesty there was no reason to suspect, were retained in their offices, while those who were dismissed were replaced without any friction. All the affairs of government were conducted upon purely business principles, just as though the country had been a huge commercial concern, save for the fact that the chief object was efficiency and not profit-making.

Money was abundantly plentiful, and the necessaries of life were cheaper than they had ever been before. Perhaps the principal reason for this happy state of affairs was the fact that law and politics had suddenly ceased to be trades at which money could be made. People were amazed at the rapidity with which public business was transacted.

The President and his Council had at one stroke abrogated every civil and criminal law known to the old Constitution and proclaimed in their place a simple comprehensive code which was practically identical with the Decalogue. To this a final clause was added stating that those who could not exist without breaking any of these laws would not be considered as fit to live in civilised society, and would therefore be effectively removed from the companionship of their fellows.

While the internal affairs of the Federation in America were being thus set in order events had been moving rapidly in other parts of the world. The Tsar, the King of Italy, and General le Gallifet, who was now Dictator of France in all but name, were masters of the Continent of Europe. The Anglo-Teutonic Alliance was a thing of the past. Germany, Austria, and Turkey were completely crushed and the minor powers had succumbed.

Britain, crippled by the terrible cost in ships and men of the victory of the Nile, had evacuated the Mediterranean after dismantling the fortifications of Gibralter and Malta, and had concentrated the remains of her fleets in the home waters to prepare for the invasion, which was now inevitable as soon as fair winds and fine weather made it possible for the war-balloons of the League to cross the water and co-operate with the invading forces.

The Tsar, as had been expected, had not even deigned to reply to Tremayne's summons to disarm, and so the last arrangements for bringing the forces of the Federation into action at the proper time were pushed on with the utmost speed. The blockade of the American and Canadian coasts was rigidly maintained, and no vessels allowed to enter or leave any of the ports. All the war-ships of the League had been withdrawn from the Atlantic, and the great ocean highway remained unploughed by a single keel.

On the 10th of October the Ithuriel returned from her second trip to the West, with the refusal of the British Government to recognise the Federation as a duly constituted Power, or to have any dealings with its leaders. "Great Britain," the reply concluded, "will stand or fall alone, and even in the event of ultimate defeat, the King of England will prefer to make terms with the Sovereigns opposed to him rather than with those whose acts have proved them to be beyond the pale of the law of nations."

"Ah!" said Tremayne, as he read the royal words, "the policy which lost the American Colonies for the sake of an idea still rules at Westminster, it seems. But I am not going to let the old Lion be strangled in his den for all that.

"Natas was right when he said that Britain would have to pass through the fire before she would accept the Federation, and so I suppose she must, more's the pity. Still, perhaps it will be all for the best in the long run. You can't expect to root up a thousand-year-old oak as easily as a mushroom that only came up the day before yesterday."

The day after the reply of the British Government had been received, a cypher despatch came from Sydney, via San Fransisco, announcing that all was ready for the proclamation of the Federation in Australia, and adding that a large fleet of Chinese and Japanese war-ships had bombarded Brisbane, and was steaming south upon Sydney.

"We must stop those fellows at once," said the President to Arnold, who was with him when he read the despatch. "How soon can you have the Ithuriel and half a dozen of the other ships ready to start? This will be a splendid, opportunity for us. We will smash up the heathen Chinee, save Australia, and then proclaim the Federation before popular gratitude has time to cool. Nothing like striking while the iron's hot."

"Almost immediately," replied Arnold. "I have eight ships lying at the rendezvous on the Alleghanies ready to take the air at once, and I can put what fresh cylinders are wanted into the Ithuriel in half an hour after we get there. We can reach Australia in about seventy hours, and probably get to Sydney just as the fun is beginning. Are you coming with us?"

"Yes. Everything is going on perfectly here, and I can easily get away for a few days. We will go on board at once."

It was then two o'clock on the afternoon of the 11th. Two hours later the aerial squadron took the air, crossed the Pacific in three days, and arrived off Port Jackson just as the invading fleet had forced its way into the harbour.

It went to work with swift and terrible effectiveness upon the war-ships crowded into the narrow waters of the inlet. The Celestials, who had never even heard of the air-ships before their shells began rending their vessels to fragments, took them for supernatural demons of the air sent by the gods to destroy them.

Within ten minutes after the terrible cannonade began they had fallen into utter panic and completely lost control of their ships. Steaming hither and thither in wild attempts to get out into the open water, they collided and rammed and sank each other almost as fast as they were sunk by the shells rained upon them from the air. Tremayne's orders were not to spare a single craft, and they were carried out to the letter.

It was the first battle in the war between civilisation and semi-barbarism, and that was to be a war of extermination. By nightfall not a ship or torpedo-boat of the whole fleet was left that had not either been captured or run ashore. The next morning the signal of the Revolution was flashed throughout the Colonies, and within twenty-four hours the plain blood-red flag of the Federation was floating over all the Government houses in Australasia.

CHAPTER LIX.

ALONE AGAINST THE WORLD.

IT is now time to return to Britain, to the land which the course of events had so far appeared to single out as the battle-ground upon which was to be fought the Armageddon of the Western World—that conflict of the giants, the issue of which was to decide whether the Anglo-Saxon race was still to remain in the forefront of civilisation and progress, or whether it was to fall, crushed and broken, beneath the assaults of enemies descending upon the motherland of the Anglo-Saxon nations; whether the valour and personal devotion, which for a thousand years had scarcely known a defeat by flood or field, was still to pursue its course of victory, or whether it was to succumb to weight of numbers and mechanical discipline, reinforced by means of assault and destruction which so far had turned the world-war of 1904 into a succession of gigantic butcheries, such as had never been known before in the history of human strife.

When the allied fleets, bearing the remains of the British and German Armies which had been driven out of the Netherlands, reached England, and the news of the crowning disaster of the war in Europe was published in detail in the newspapers, the popular mind seemed suddenly afflicted with a paralysis of stupefaction.

Men looked back over the long series of triumphs in which British valour and British resolution had again and again proved themselves invulnerable to the assaults of overflowing numbers. They thought of the glories of the Peninsula, of the unbreakable strength of the thin red line at Waterloo, of the magnificent madness of Balaclava, and the invincible steadiness and discipline that had made Inkerman a word to be remembered with pride as long as the English name endured.

Then their thoughts reverted to the immediate past, and they heard the shock of colossal armaments, compared with which the armies of the past appeared but pigmies in strength. They saw empires defended by millions of soldiers crushed in a few weeks, and a wave of conquest sweep in one unbroken roll from end to end of a continent in less time than it would have taken Napoleon or Wellington to have fought a single campaign. Huge fortresses, rendered, as men had believed, impregnable by the employment of every resource known to the most advanced military science, had been reduced to heaps of defenceless ruins in a few hours by a bombardment, under which their magnificent artillery had lain as impotent as though they had been the culverins of three hundred years ago.

It seemed like some hideous nightmare of the nations, in which Europe had gone mad, revelling in superhuman bloodshed and destruction, a conflict in which more than earthly forces had been let loose, accomplishing a carnage so immense that the mind could only form a dim and imperfect conception of it. And now this red tide of desolation had swept up to the western verge of the Continent, and was there gathering strength and volume day by day against the hour when it should burst and oversweep the narrow strip of water which separated the inviolate fields of England from the blackened and blood-stained waste that it had left behind it from the Russian frontier to the German ocean.

It seemed impossible, and yet it was true. The first line of defence, the hitherto invincible fleet, magnificently as it had been managed, and heroically as it had been fought, had failed in the supreme hour of trial. It had failed not because the sailors of Britain had done their duty less valiantly than they had done in the days of Rodney and Nelson, but simply because the conditions of naval warfare had been entirely changed, because the personal equation had been almost eliminated from the problem of battle, and because the new warfare of the seas had been waged rather with machinery than with men.

In all the war not a single battle had been fought at close quarters; there had been plenty of instances of brilliant manœuvring, of torpedo boats running the gauntlet and hurling their deadly missiles against the sides of battle-ships and cruisers, and of ships rammed and sunk in a few instants by consummately-handled opponets, but the days of boarding and cutting out, of night surprises and fire ships, had gone by for ever.

The irresistible artillery with which modern science had armed the war-ships of all nations had made these feats impossible, and so had placed the valour which achieved them out of court. Within the last few weeks scarcely a day had passed but had witnessed some mighty ironclad or splendid cruiser, which had set out a miracle of offensive and defensive strength, return little better than a floating ruin, wrecked and shattered almost beyond recognition by the awful battle-storm through which she had passed.

The magnificent armament which had held the Atlantic route had come back represented only by a few crippled ships almost unfit for any further service. True, they and those which never returned had rendered a splendid account of themselves before the enemy, but the fact remained—they were not defeated, but they were no longer able to perform the Titanic task which had been allotted to them.

So, too, with the Mediterranean fleet, which, so far as sea-fighting was concerned, had achieved the most splendid triumph of the war. It had completely destroyed the enemy opposed to it, but the victory had been purchased at such a terrible price that, but for the squadron which had come to its aid, it would hardly have been able to reach home in safety.

In a word, the lesson of the struggle on the sea had been that modern artillery was just as effective whether fired by Englishmen, Frenchmen, or Russians, that where a torpedo struck a war-ship was crippled, no matter what the nationality or the relative valour of her crew, and that when once the ram found its mark the ship that it struck went down, no matter what flag she was flying.

And then behind and beyond all that was definitely known in England of the results of the war, there were vague rumours of calamities and catastrophes in more distant parts of the world which seemed to promise nothing less than universal anarchy and the submergence of civilisation under some all-devouring wave of barbarism.

All regular communications with the East had been stopped for several weeks; that India was lost was guessed by intuition rather than known as a certainty. Australia was as isolated from Britain as though it had been on another planet, and now every one of the Atlantic cables had suddenly ceased to respond to the stimulus of the electric current. No ships came from the East, or West, or South. The British ports were choked with fleets of useless merchantmen to which the markets of the world were no longer open.

Some few venturesome craft that had set out to explore the now silent ocean had never returned, and every way ship that could be made fit for service was imperatively needed to meet the now inevitable attack on the shores of the English Channel and the southern portions of the North Sea. Only one messenger had arrived from the outside world since the remains of Admiral Beresford's fleet had returned from the Mediterranean, and she had come not by land or sea but through the air.

On the 12th of October an air-ship had been seen flying at an incredible speed across the south of England. She had reached London and touched the ground during the night on Hampstead Heath; the next day she had descended again in the same place, taken a single man on board, and then vanished into space again. What her errand had been is well known to the reader, but outside the members of the Cabinet Council no one in England, save the Kinghimself, knew the object of her mission.

For fifteen days after that event the enemy across the water made no sign, although from the coast of Kent round about Deal and Dover, could be seen fleets of transports and war vessels hurrying along the French coast, and on clear days a thousand telescopes turned towards the French shore made visible the ominous clusters of moving black spots above the land which betokened the presence of the terrible machines which had wrought such havoc on the towns and fortresses of Europe.

It was only the calm before the final outburst of the storm. The Tsar and his allies were marshalling their hosts for the invasion and collecting transports and fleets of war-vessels to convoy them. For several days strong north-westerly gales had made the sea impassable for the war-balloons, as though to the very last the wind and waves were conspiring to defend their ancient mistress. But this could not last for ever.

Sooner or later the winds must sink or change, and then these war-hawks of the air would wing their flight across the silver streak, and Portsmouth. and Dover, and London would be as defenceless beneath their attack as Berlin, Vienna, and Hamburg had been. And after them would come the millions of the League descending like a locust swarm upon the fields of eastern England, and after that would come the deluge.

But the old Lion of the seas was not skulking in his lair, or trembling at the advent of his enemies, however numerous and mighty they might be. On sea not a day passed but some daring raid was made on the transports passing to and fro in the narrow seas, and all the while a running fight was kept up with cruisers and battle-ships that approached too near to the still inviolate shore. So surely as they did so the signals flashed along the coast; and if they escaped at all from the fierce sortie that they provoked, it was with shot-riddled sides and battered top-works, sure signs that the Lion still had claws, and could strike home with them.

On shore, from Land's End to John o' Groats, and from Holyhead to the Forelands, everything that could be done was being done to prepare for the struggle with the invader. It must, however, be confessed that, in comparison with the enormous forces of the League, the ranks of the defenders were miserably scanty. Forty years of universal military service on the Continent had borne their fruits.

Soldiers are not made in a few weeks or months; and where the League had millions in the field, Britain, even counting the remnant of her German allies, that had been brought over from Antwerp, could hardly muster hundreds of thousands. All told, there were less than a million men available for the defence of the country; and should the landing of the invaders be successfully effected, not less than six millions of men, trained to the highest efficiency, and flushed with the rapid succession of unparalleled victories, would be hurled against them.

This was the legitimate outcome of the policy to which Britain had adhered since first she had maintained a standing army instead of pursuing the ancient policy of making every man a soldier, which had won the triumphs of Crecy and Agincourt. She had trusted everything to her sea-line of defence. Now that was practically broken, and it seemed inevitable that her second line, by reason of its miserable inadequacy, should fail her in a trial which no one had ever dreamt it would have to endure.

A very grave aspect was given to the situation by the fact that the great mass of the industrial population seemed strangely indifferent to the impending catastrophe which was hanging over the land.

Vague threats of "eating the Russians alive" if they ever did dare to come were heard, but beyond this, and apart from the regular army and the volunteers, men went about their daily avocations very much as usual, grumbling at the ever-increasing price of food, and here and there breaking out into bread riots wherever it was suspected that some wealthy man was trying to corner food for his own commercial benefit, but making no serious or combined efforts to prepare for a general rising in case the threatened invasion became a fact.

Such was the general state of affairs in Britain when, on the night of the 27th of October, the north-west gales sank suddenly to a calm, and the dawn of the 28th brought the news from Dover to London that the war-balloons of the League had taken the air and were crossing the Straits.

CHAPTER LX.

THE BATTLE OF DOVER.

UNTIL the war of 1904 it had been an undisputed axiom in naval warfare that a territorial attack upon an enemy's coast by a fleet was foredoomed to failure unless that enemy's fleet had been either crippled beyond effective action, or securely blockaded in distant ports. As an axiom secondary to this, it was also held that it would be impossible for an invading force, although convoyed by a powerful fleet, to make good its footing upon any portion of a hostile coast defended by forts mounting heavy long-range guns.

These principles have held good throughout the history of naval warfare from the time when Sir Walter Raleigh first laid them down in the early portion of his "History of the World," written after the destruction of the Spanish Armada.

But now two elements had been introduced which altered the conditions of naval warfare even more radically than one of them had changed those of military warfare. Had it not been for this the attack upon the shores of England made by the commanders of the League would probably either have been a failure, or it would have stopped at a demonstration of force as did that of the great Napoleon in 1803.

The portion of the Kentish coast selected for the attack was that stretching from Folkestone to Deal, and it would perhaps have been difficult to find in the whole world any portion of sea-coast more strongly defended than this was on the morning of October 28th, 1904, and yet, as the event proved, the fortresses which lined it were as useless and impotent for defence as the old Martello towers of a hundred and fifty years before would have been.

As the war-balloons rose into the air from the heights above Boulogne good telescopes at Dover enabled their possessors to count no less than seventy-five of them. Fifty of these were quite newly constructed, and were of a much improved type, as they had been built in view of the practical experience gained by the first fleet.

This aerial fleet divided into three squadrons, one, numbering twenty-five, steered south-westward in the direction of Folkestone, twelve shaped their course towards Deal, and the remaining thirty-eight steered directly across the Straits to Dover. As they approached the English coast they continually rose until by the time they had reached the land, aided by the light south-easterly breeze which was then blowing, they floated at a height of more than five thousand feet.

All this while not a warship or a transport had put to sea. The whole fleet of the League lay along the coast of France between Calais and Dieppe, under the protection of shore batteries so powerful that it would have been madness for the British fleet to have assumed the offensive with regard to them. With the exception of two squadrons reserved for a possible attack upon Portsmouth and Harwich, all that remained from the disasters and costly victories of the war of the once mighty British naval armament was massed together for the defence of that portion of the coast which would evidently have to bear the brunt of the attack of the League.

Ranged along the coast from Folkestone to Deal was an armament consisting of forty-five battle-ships of the first, second, and third classes, supported by fifteen coast-defence ironclads, seventy armoured and thirty-two unarmoured cruisers, forty gunboats, and a hundred and fifty torpedo boats.

Such was the magnificent fleet that patrolled the waters of the narrow sea as impotent for the time being as a fleet of Thames steamboats would have been in face of the tactics employed against it by the League. Had the enemy's fleet but come out into the open, as it would have been compelled to do under the old conditions of warfare, to fight its way across the narrow strip of water, there is little doubt but that the issue of the day would have been very different, and that what had been left of the ships would have been driven back, shattered and defeated, to the shelter of the French shore batteries.

But, in accordance with the invariable tactics of the League, the first and most deadly assault was delivered from the air. The war-balloons stationed themselves above the fortifications on land, totally ignoring the presence of the fleet, and a few minutes after ten o'clock began to rain their deadly hail of explosives down upon them. Fifteen were placed over Dover Castle, and five over the fort on the Admiralty Pier, while the rest were distributed over the town and the forts on the hills above it.

In an hour everything was in a state of the most horrible confusion. The town was on fire in a hundred places, from the effects of the fire-shells. The Castle hill seemed as if it had been suddenly turned into a volcano; jets of bright flame kept leaping up from its summit and sides, followed by thunderous explosions and masses of earth and masonry hurled into the air, mingled with guns and fragments of human bodies.

The end of the Admiralty Pier, with its huge blocks of stone wrenched asunder and pulverised by incessant explosions of dynamite and emmensite, collapsed and subsided into the sea, carrying fort, guns, and magazine with it; and all along the height of the Shakespeare cliff the earthworks had been blown up and scattered into dust, and a huge portion of the cliff itself had been blasted out and hurled down on to the beach.

Meanwhile the victims of this terrible assault had, in the nature of the case, been able to do nothing but keep up a vertical fire, in the hope of piercing the gas-envelopes of the balloons, and so bringing them to the earth. For more than an hour this fusillade produced no effect; but at length the concentrated fire of several Maxim and Nordenfelt guns, projecting a hail of missiles into the sky, brought about a result which was even more disastrous to the town than it was to its assailants.

Four of the aerostats came within the zone swept by the bullets. Riddled through and through, their gas-holders collapsed, and their cars plunged downwards from a height of more than 5,000 feet. A few seconds later four frightful explosions burst forth in different parts of the town, for the four cargoes exploded simultaneously as they struck the earth.

The emmensite and dynamite tore whole streets of houses to fragments, and hurled them far and wide into the air to fall back again on other parts of the town, and at the same time the fire-shells ignited, and set the ruins blazing like so many furnaces. No more shots were fired into the air after that. There was nothing for it but for British valour to bow to the inevitable and evacuate the town and what remained of its fortifications, and so with sad and heavy hearts the remnant of the brave defenders turned their faces inland, leaving Dover to its fate. Meanwhile exactly the same havoc had been wrought upon Folkestone and Deal. Hour after hour the merciless work continued until by three o'clock in the afternoon there was not a gun left upon the whole range of coast that was capable of firing a shot.

All this time the ammunition tenders of the aerial fleet had been winging their way to and fro across the Strait, constantly renewing the shells of the war balloons.

As soon as it began to grow dusk the naval battle commenced. Numerically speaking, the attacking force was somewhat inferior to that of the defenders, but now the second element, which so completely altered the tactics of sea fighting, was for the first time in the war brought into play.

As the battle-ships of the League steamed out to engage the opponents, who were thirsting to avenge the destruction that had been wrought upon the land, a small flotilla of twenty-five insignificant-looking little craft with neither masts nor funnels, and looking more like half-submerged elongated turtles than anything else, followed in tow close under their quarters. Hardly had the furious cannonade broken out into thunder and flame along the two opposing lines than these strange craft sank gently and silently beneath the waves. They were submarine vessels belonging to the French navy, an improved type of the Zédé class which had been in existence for more than ten years.

These vessels were capable of sinking to a depth of twenty feet and remaining for four hours without returning to the surface. They were propelled by twin-screws worked by electricity at a speed of twenty knots, and were provided with an electric search-light which enabled them to find the hulls of hostile ships in the dark.

Each carried three torpedoes, which could be launched from a tube, forward, so as to strike the hull of the doomed ship from beneath. As soon as the torpedo was discharged the submarine boat spun round on her heel and headed away at full speed in an opposite direction, out of the area of the explosion.

The effects of such terrible, and, indeed, irresistible engines of naval warfare were soon made manifest upon the ships of the British fleet. In the heat of the battle, with every gun in action, and raining a hail of shot and shell upon her adversary, a great battle-ship would receive an unseen blow, struck in the dark upon her most vulnerable part, a huge column of water would rise up from under her side, and a few minutes later the splendid fabric would heel over and go down like a floating volcano, to be quenched by the waves that closed over her.

But as if it were not enough that the defending fleet should be attacked from the surface of the water and the depths of the sea, the war-balloons, winging their way out from the scene of ruin that they had wrought on shore, soon began to take their part in the work of death and destruction.

Each of them was provided with a mirror set a little in front of the bow of the car, at an angle which could be varied according to the elevation. A little forward of the centre of the car was a tube fixed on a level with the centre of the mirror. The ship selected for destruction was brought under the car, and the speed of the balloon was regulated so that the ship was relatively stationary to it.

As soon as the glare from one of the funnels could be seen through the tube reflected in the centre of the mirror a trap was sprung in the floor of the car, and a shell charged with dynamite, which, it will be remembered, explodes vertically downwards, was released, and, where the calculations were accurately made, passed down the funnel and exploded in the interior of the vessel, bursting her boilers and reducing her to a helpless wreck at a single stroke.*

Every time this horribly ingenious contrivance was successfully brought into play a battleship or a cruiser was either sunk or reduced to impotence. In order to make their aim the surer the aerostats descended to within three hundred yards of their prey, and where the missile failed to pass through the tunnel it invariably struck the deck close to it, tearing up the armour sheathing and wrecking the funnel itself so completely that the steaming-power of the vessel was very seriously reduced.

All night long the battle raged incessantly along a semicircle some twelve miles long, the centre of which was Dover. Crowds of anxious watchers on the shore watched the continuous flashes of the guns through the darkness, varied ever and anon by some tremendous explosion which told the fate of a warship that had fired her last shot.

All night long the incessant thunder of the battle rolled to and fro along the echoing coast, and when morning broke the light dawned upon a scene of desolation and destruction on sea and shore such as had never been witnessed before in the history of warfare. On land were the smoking ruins of houses, still smouldering in the remains of the fires which had consumed them; forts which twenty-four hours before had grinned defiance at the enemy were shapeless heaps of earth and stone and armour-plating torn into great jagged fragments; and on sea were a few half-crippled wrecks, the remains of the British fleet, with their flags still flying and such guns as were not disabled firing their last rounds at the victorious foe.

To the eastward of these about half the fleet of the League, in but little better condition, was advancing in now overwhelming force upon them, and behind these again a swarm of troop-ships and transports were heading out from the French shore. About an hour after dawn the Centurion, the last of the British battle-ships, was struck by one of the submarine torpedoes, broke in two, and went down with her flag flying and her guns blazing away to the last moment. So ended the battle of Dover, the most disastrous sea-fight in the history of the world, and the death-struggle of the Mistress of the Seas.

The last news of the tremendous tragedy reached the now panic-stricken capital half an hour before the receipt of similar tidings from Harwich, announcing the destruction of the defending fleet and forts, and the capture of the town by exactly the same means as those employed against Dover. Nothing now lay between London and the invading forces but the utterly inadequate army and the lines of fortifications which could not be expected to offer any more effective resistance to the assault of the war-balloons, than had those of the three towns on the Kentish coast.

CHAPTER LXI.

Beleaguered London.

A month had passed since the battle of Dover. It had been a month of incessant fighting, of battles by day and night, heroic defences and dearly-bought victories, but still of constant triumphs and irresistible progress for the ever-increasing legions of the League. From sunrise to sunrise the roar of artillery, the rattle of musketry, and the clash of steel had never ceased to sound to the north and south of London as, over battlefield after battlefield, the two hosts which had poured in constant streams through Harwich and Dover had fought their way, literally mile by mile, towards the capital of the modern world.

Day and night the fighting never stopped. As soon as two hostile divisions had fought each other to a standstill, and from sheer weariness of the flesh the battle died down in one part of the huge arena, the flame sprang up in another, and raged on with ever-renewed fury. Outnumbered four and five to one in every engagement, and with the terrible war-balloons raining death on them from the clouds, the British armies had eclipsed all the triumphs of the long array of their victories by the magnificent devotion that they showed in the hour of the death-struggle of the Empire.

The glories of Inkermann and Balaclava, of Albuera and Waterloo, paled before the achievements of the whole-souled heroism displayed by the British soldiery standing, as it were, with its back to the wall, and fighting, not so much with any hope of victory, for that was soon seen to be a physical impossibility, but with the invincible determination not to permit the invader to advance on London save over the dead bodies of its defenders.

Such a gallant defence had never been made before in the face of such irresistible odds. When the soldiers of the League first set foot on British soil the defending armies of the North and South had, with the greatest exertions, been brought up to a fighting strength of about twelve hundred thousand men. So stubborn had been the heroism with which they had disputed the progress of their enemies that by the time that the guns of the League were planted on the heights that commanded the Metropolis, more than a million and a half of men had gone down under the hail of British bullets and the rush of British bayonets.

Of all the battle-fields of this the bloodiest war in the history of human strife none had been so deeply dyed with blood as had been the fair and fertile English gardens and meadows over which the hosts of the League had fought their way to the confines of London. Only the weight of overwhelming numbers, reinforced by engines of destruction which could strike without the possibility of effective retaliation, had made their progress possible.

Had they met their heroic foes as they had met them in the days of the old warfare, their superiority of numbers would have availed them but little. They would have been hurled back and driven into the sea, and not a man of them all would have left British soil alive had it been but a question of military attack and defence.

But this was not a war of men. It was a war of machines, and those who wielded the most effective machinery for the destruction of life won battle after battle as a matter of course, just as a man armed with a repeating rifle would overcome a better man armed with a bow and arrow.

Natas had formed an entirely accurate estimate of the policy of the leaders of the League when he told Tremayne in the library at Alanmere, that they would concentrate all their efforts on the reduction of London. The rest of the kingdom had been for the present entirely ignored.

London was the heart of the British Empire and of the English-speaking world, for the matter of that, and therefore it had been determined to strike one deadly blow at the vital centre of the whole huge organism. That paralysed, the rest must fall to pieces of necessity. The fleet was destroyed, and every soldier that Britain could put into the field had been mustered for the defence of London. Therefore the fall of London meant the conquest of Britain.

The Brain Gymnasium.

ON this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," will appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set will be comparatively easy of solution, while others will be designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In each of the competitions a prize of ten shillings will be awarded to the sender of the first correct solution dealt with, and to the sender of the next five c rrect ones will be presented, in the case of the odd number competitions, one of our silver pencil cases, and, in the case of the even number competitions, a copy of a popular six-shilling novel.

Solutions must be written on separate postcards, and must reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, January 29th, 1900. Mark the postcards "Brain Gymnasium, No. 16," "Brain Gymnasium, No. 17," etc., according to the number of the competition of which the solution is sent.

FOR the above cryptogram, the alphabet has been numbered according to a certain rule. If in place of the above letters their cryptogram be inserted, it will be found that in each case the second row is exactly twice the value of the first. Add the two lines together, and put the corresponding ordinary alphabet letter represented by the figure. A word signifying "a prank" will then be found.

THE NEW MULTIPHONE

The most wonderful Musical Instrument ever invented. It is practically a Violin, Violoncello, Guitar, Banjo, Mandoline, Zither, and Harp all combined, for it can be easily played by anyone so as to exactly imitate any of these delightful instruments. It sounds splendid with pianoforte accompaniment, and when several are played together has the same effect as a string duet, trio, or quartet.

Besides being a most charming Musical Instrument, the MULTIPHONE also imitates cows, hens, chickens, the neighing of a horse, the braying of a donkey, the barking and howling of dogs, the screeching of the owl, and all the various noises of the farmyard, &c., &c. It also produces a thousand other weird and marvellous effects, and can be made to give forth a sound only equalled by the delightful and soul-inspiring warbling of 10,000 CATS.

NOTICE.—The MULTIPHONE is not a worthless toy, but a genuine, well-made Monochord Musical Instrument. It is equally beautiful either for Sacred, Secular, Classical, Operatic, or Dance Music, and when played as a Guitar or Harp makes a lovely accompaniment to the voice.

Full direction for all the above are given gratis with each instrument.

N.B.—The MULTIPHONE is so simple that anyone can thoroughly master it in a few hours, without any previous knowledge of Music.

Price FOUR SHILLINGS. Will be sent per Parcels Post to any address on receipt of Postal Order. Foreign and Colonial postage, 1/6 extra.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The MULTIPHONE cannot be purchased at any shop, and can only be obtained PER PARCEL POST direct from the

No. 578.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 27th, 1900.

The King and the Picture.

The king wanted a picture; not that he had not many fine paintings in his miles of galleries, paintings ancient and paintings modern, paintings allegorical, paintings historical, paintings sacred, paintings profane, paintings patriotic, paintings poetic, paintings of people, and paintings of things, paintings of peasants and paintings of kings. But this was to be a very special picture; it must represent the honour of the country by depicting her in the act of winning one of her most famous battles, it must pay a tribute to her army and to her generals by representing the enemy in the very moment of defeat and the conquerors in the grandeur of a glorious victory, thus appealing to and inspiring the patriotism of all future generations.

And, above all, it must represent the King himself—his honour and his courage. His must be the central figure, he must be shewn as leading those gallant legions to victory, his must be the individuality which should impress itself on all beholders.

But who should paint this masterpiece? It must be done by skilled hands—very skilful, for although many of the leading officers, and men, too, for that matter, might sit for their portraits, this could not apply to the enemy, and then the whole scene must be drawn from description, and the right position must be accorded to the author and designer of it all so that the right impression should not fail to be given.

Courtiers, artists, military experts, critics, favourites, were all consulted. All had their pet painter, all had their own theories about the picture, all hoped to gain something out of the transaction, and a most overpowering and perplexing list of candidates was submitted to the Royal choice.

At last a selection was made, M. Blanc, a celebrated painter of historic scenes being the favoured artist. Then followed the question of price, and this was necessarily large, for, apart from the market value of the painter's own skill, much expense must be incurred. Journeys to the battlefield for scenery, models, interviews with celebrated men who figured in the war so as to secure their accounts and their likenesses—all these things would cost money, so finally the price was agreed at the respectable figure of 20,000 francs (£800).

The painter set to work with alacrity and earnestness. He was to produce a masterpiece, and one which from its position should be constantly before the eyes of Europe. He felt that his country's honour was to some extent intrusted to his keeping, while he had to contend with the personal jealousy of many, who, just as the actors in a piece all want the best parts, each desired to have a position of the greatest honour and dignity.

Patiently and conscientiously M. Blanc executed his task, hours both early and late were spent in the studio, and the time of so-called recreation was generally passed in the company of those who by their brilliant descriptions and spirited anecdotes seemed to bring the whole scene before his very eyes with vivid portraiture.

The huge canvas began to teem with life and to grow into unity. Friends and acquaintances, admirers and even opponents sang its praises, it would be the picture of the year—the age—the century—M. Blanc would never need to paint again except for pleasure

But meanwhile all was not smooth in the life of the honoured artist. Royalty knows nothing of time or engagements, and the king kept pressing for the delivery of the picture at the earliest possible moment: so under pressure poor M. Blanc worked early and late, spent money almost recklessly on journeys and on models, and had to allow two unwelcome guests to take up their permanent abode in his house, their names being sleeplessness and care.

Only too soon health began to fail, and ways and means became matters of increasing difficulty. But then the honour of painting a picture for the King! and then the 20,000 francs for which the word of the King stood pledged.

"Courage," he would say, "it will only be for a little longer, and then my work, my great work will be done. Then a grateful King will pay me the price, and a grateful country will do me just honour."

At last the finishing touches were given, courtiers, generals, nobles, even the King himself visited the atelier, all were charmed, delighted, enraptured. Even rival artists, in their Bohemian generosity, confessed ungrudgingly that the work was a great one, and that Blanc had proved himself worthy to paint the picture for the King.

And Blanc himself—now that the work was done, he could scarcely bring himself to part with it: it had been his life for many a long month, his whole being had gone out into it, his whole self was in every part: it seemed as if all he had hitherto done was absorbed into this one great work, it had exhausted him. But now for the remedy: true the atelier would be empty, but then the walls of the world-renowned picture gallery would hold his treasure: true his purse was exhausted, but then the King would soon replenish that: true his eye was dimmed, his appetite impaired and his sleep fitful, but was he not "le grand Blanc," who had painted the picture for the King?

Even rival artists, in their Bohemian generosity, confessed ungrudgingly that the work was a great one.

The great event is over. The great picture complete in every detail, gorgeously framed, as became a scene of so great importance and such great characters, has been conveyed to the palace with the utmost care, and placed in the position of honour. Blanc is a great man, every journal contains notices of his masterpiece, but he himself feels as though he had lost a child, and notwithstanding all the congratulations which pour upon him, he is oppressed with a sort of presentiment of impending evil.

He is seated in his now empty studio feeling the reaction after the strain from which he has really suffered, which he had scarcely realized when the bell of his appartement announces a visitor. The visitor is the King's Equerry.

"Good-morning, M. Blanc. You are, I regret to see, not looking as well as your friends could wish."

"Well, my general, you see I have had little time to attend to my health, or to think of anything but the King's order for some time."

"Aha, we are all like that in his service. When he orders there must be no rest, eh?"

"Certainly, I found it so. But tell me, my general, does his majesty really like the picture?"

"Without doubt he does. I do not think he has any that pleases him so much; in fact he is almost tedious in the way he talks about it, and will have everyone admire it."

"So much the better for me, but I hope he does something more than admire it."

"Ah, you sly rogue, I suppose you mean has he paid for it? Well, that is the business which has brought me here this morning."

"And I am truly thankful to hear it, for I am absolutely what our English neighbours call stoney broke."

"Ah, well, we can soon mend that. Here, count these notes, and sign this receipt, for I have to attend a review in half-an-hour."

With almost feverish haste the artist took the notes and counted them; something seemed wrong, again and again he went through them with the same result. At last he said: "My General, is this what the King sent me?"

"Certainly," replied the Equerry. "do you think me capable of being dishonourable in such a delicate matter?"

"By no means, but here is the fact: the King agreed with me for twenty thousand francs, and you have brought me sixteen thousand."

"Twenty thousand francs! Blanc, you must be mad to think of such a sum."

"Very far from it. I neither would nor could have painted the picture for a sou less. It has cost me what I shall never regain, and what money cannot buy, but still the 20,000 francs is the price, as many persons know, and those 20,000 francs I intend to have."

"Softly, my friend. This language may cost you very dear; you are implying that somebody has cheated you, either the King or myself: if the former, you know he has rather an unpleasant way of dealing with persons who offend him, and if the latter, I am at your service when and where you please."

"I accuse no one," said Blanc, "and I will only ask you to give me your word of honour that this is the sum actually sent by the King."

"On the faith of a general it is," said the Equerry. "Now be a sensible fellow and sign my receipt, which you see says, 'Received of General Richeton the price of the picture.' Why, man, the few francs about which you make such a fuss are only the King's margin."

It seemed that there was no more to be said, so Blanc, with many a protest, signed the receipt, by which he stated that he had received the price of the picture, and wished his visitor good-morning.

"Softly, my friend, this language may cost you very dear."

After he was left alone he again thought very carefully over the whole incident and at last resolved for the satisfaction of his own mind and the honour of the King to lay the whole matter privately before the King himself, and as he had the right of entrance to the palace, and remembered that the General had told him he was going to the review, he thought no time like the present, and without further delay than was needful to change his dress he set forth, and arriving at the private entrance he asked if he might see the King.

The answer was in the affirmative, and in a few moments he was admitted to the King's cabinet, and received in a very courteous manner.

"Well, M. Blanc, are you come to get an order for another picture?"

"No, your majesty, but I am come to ask whether the one I have had the honour to execute still gives pleasure."

"Certainly it does, how can you doubt it? Have not I told you so a hundred times? Why, you artists are so sensitive that you require constant praise."

"No, your majesty, I do not want praise, but I had a very special reason for the liberty I have taken in repeating the question."

"Oh, never mind, I am quite satisfied; but, M. Blanc, there is one thing which does not satisfy me, that is the price, it is terrible."

"Your majesty astonishes me."

"I find it terrible, I assure you, I never seem to be able to get money; in fact I have had to deny myself most unpleasantly in order to pay you this money."

"But the margin is very great, your majesty."

"The margin! What does the man mean?"

"I mean, your majesty, that there is a great difference between 20,000 francs and 16,000 francs."

"And what in the world has that got to do with me?"

"Because 16,000 francs is the exact sum which I have this morning had the honour to receive from your majesty as payment for the picture which I was ordered to paint for 20,000."

"Is this true?" said the King, turning a shade more livid than his wont.

"Perfectly true, your majesty. These identical notes were put into my hands scarcely an hour ago by your majesty's chief Equerry, and I was distinctly told that I must expect no more."

"But how did he account for the difference?"

"Your majesty, he called it 'the King's margin.'"

"The accursed scoundrel," said the King, "this is not the first act of the kind, by many, of which I suspect him, but alas, what can I do? Oh! Blanc, any position is preferable to that of a king, and I only hope if the day comes that my country is in a strait it may not prove that the men whom she now trusts have treated her as they have treated me. Now leave me to think over this business."

M. Blanc sank heavily to the ground, and, murmuring "Ah, my picture!" expired.

It was evening verging into night. A grand assembly filled the salons of one of the most accomplished hostesses of the day. Wit and wisdom, beauty and rank, wealth and valour united to form a gathering that it would be difficult to surpass. Among the guests was the wearied and yet strikingly handsome figure of M. Blanc, while in another part of the salon might have been seen the flashing decorations and the gay uniform of the chief Equerry.

As the evening passed, it so happened that M. Blanc found himself engaged in conversation with his hostess within a very short distance of the Equerry. There occurred one of those sudden and inexplicable lulls which do sometimes hush a large assembly, and a single voice was heard asking the strange question:

"Madame, did you ever hear of the King's margin?"

"Certainly not, my friend," was the reply. "The King's margin! What do you mean?"

"Ah, madame, I too never heard of it until this morning, and then I was not pleased at discovering it. But it seems that the person who can give all information on the subject—better even than the King himself—is the chief Equerry."

By this time no little curiosity was aroused, all eyes except one pair, were turned on the painter, and he was questioned on every side and urged to explain himself. At length, with a very apparent struggle to master his feelings, he began the account of his picture, his toils, his hopes and his fears, and when all were on the tip-toe of expectation, he closed his story with a calm account of the episode of the morning. Many of the guests heard the whole statement, and when he had ceased there was an almost feverish haste to resume the buzz of general conversation,

Scarcely had the conversation again become general when M. Blanc felt a sharp touch on the shoulder, and, turning round, met the angry and cynical glance of the Chief Equerry.

"Sir," said he, "you are aware that this matter cannot end here."

"It shall end where and when you please, my General," replied Blanc. "I am ready to support my words even in the King's presence."

"You know well enough what I mean. Name your second."

M. Blanc at once named a well-known gentleman of the company, and in a few moments a grim party of five, for the host was present, assembled in a secluded part of the picture gallery. Swords were procured and carefully measured, the distance was marked, and the seconds placed their men.

But, alas, it was soon apparent that the painter was no match for the bully. A few passes only were exchanged, and then M. Blanc sank heavily to the ground, and, murmuring "Ah, my picture!" expired.

"Adieu, gentlemen," said the other. "Let us hear no more of the King's margin, if you are wise."

JOHN H. ROGERS.

[The above story can be vouched for as being perfectly true. The names of the characters have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but otherwise the incidents related are in strict accordance with actual facts. It may be of interest to add that the equerry had what he euphemistically described as the "King's Margin," and it will be in accordance with the reader's sense of justice that a terrible expiation awaited him later.]

My Fiancé's Glass Eye.

He was tall, dark, and, to my taste, altogether charming.

Last evening, for the first time, we walked in the winding pathway of the park; the straight avenue which stretched itself under the windows of the house had been until now the only witness to our confidences; I loved dearly this avenue, with its great oak trees placed at a regular distance apart, the benches for talking quite at one's ease, the green grass all around and beyond. When one wandered off a bit, the huge window panes, which seemed, by the light of the setting sun, great wide open eyes, all smiled at our happiness.

"Walk along the avenue with Monsieur de Valente, Angèle," my mother had said to me at the beginning of our engagement. "The pathways of the park are altogether too damp."

And I walked along the broad avenue, gently resisting Raoul (he was named Raoul), who appeared to have, I do not know why, a marked preference for the covered walks.

"Mamma says the narrow pathways with the overhanging shrubs are damp. Had we not better remain here?"

That evening, however, my head was turned, and something tugged at my heart-strings—he was to leave the next day to hunt up some papers necessary for our marriage.

Eight days without seeing him! How could I live! And he, taking advantage of my trouble, made me turn into the damp alley, which, by-the-way, in spite of its bad reputation, seemed to me as dry as possible.

"My Angèle, you are not going to forget me during these eight days?"

"Forget you! Ah!"

I would have lifted my hands to take Heaven as a witness that such a thing could never happen, if he had not held them tightly clasped in his own. It is not my habit to lose myself in sentimental protestations, my vivacity forbids it, and this time not more than at others did I play my nature false.

"Raoul, you love me, do you not? Well, then, I wish to tell you all my faults. I shall be more tranquil if you know them beforehand. You would see them sooner or later; so listen! I am very wilful. I will not yield to you; you may as well make up your mind to it. Then, I am quick as gunpowder. I stamp my foot, I scream, I even cry at times. Happily, all this passes quickly. Besides that, I am a coquette, like all women. You will not be jealous, I hope. And then, what else? I can't quite tell—a little gourmand at times, not wicked, not deceitful—I find nothing else. So much then for the moral side. As to the physical, what can I have wrong there? You must know that also. Ah! One of my finger-nails is not quite the same as the others; look! but it seems to me that isn't too ugly."

And, releasing my hand, I showed him a little pink nail, a little squarer than the others, a very innocent eccentricity of Nature. Raoul laughed, and wanted to kiss it, but I drew away my hand.

"I have also lost a wisdom-tooth, which is lost for ever, alas, so I can never be altogether wise. They took it out because it came too soon. Now, sir, it is your turn. Confess yourself."

Raoul, visibly embarrassed, remained silent.

"Go on. Have a bit of courage. You may be quite easy. I shall not scold. I do not know your faults, but it is quite certain you have some. In the first place, you are near-sighted, for you wear a monocle instead of an eye-glass, with which, it seems to me, you would see much better. Mamma says that glass causes you to make such fearful faces; but I don't think so. You please me as you are. However, take out the glass, so that I can see how you look when your face isn't crooked."

I had seized, with a little gentle pressure, the string of the monocle, when Raoul stopped my hand.

"No, my little Angèle, leave it there. Without it, I should no longer see you. I am near-sighted, very near-sighted, it is true; and I want to see you, Angèle, for you are the joy of my eyes."

Then, before even I had time to think, he had taken me, drawn me to him, and covered my eyes and my hair with kisses.

"Raoul, how naughty of you! enough of that—if you please."

"Why naughty? Are you not my fiancée, my darling little wife?"

"When I am your wife it will be quite different; let me go, I will not remain here, it is too dark under these trees."

I had succeeded in releasing myself and holding down my hair, which, under those soft kisses, was flying in all directions, as if charged with electricity. I escaped by running to the avenue. There was no longer any question of making Raoul confess; blushing violently, I was thinking of quite different matters.

The next day he was gone. What a frightful moment this departure when, standing on the front steps, I had turned away my head so as not to see Jean gather up the reins, the horses pull together, the victoria sway; in a word, so as not to see they were taking him away from me.

Papa had gone with him to the station, while mamma and I breakfasted alone together. It was dismal in the extreme.

Mamma ate as usual, which I couldn't understand; as for myself, I ate only a very little, just enough to sustain me, and even that with difficulty. Every mouthful stuck in my throat.

In the midst of breakfast Justine opened the door.

"Madame, Monsieur de Valente has left his glass eye in his room. Shall it be sent to him?"

Had the heavens been opened to let fall on the table the sun and the moon, I couldn't have felt a greater shock. The end of the world will, perhaps, be nothing to equal it. I repeated with horror:

"His glass eye, Justine?"

"Yes, mademoiselle; it is on the washstand."

Mamma grew pale, but remained calm.

"Very well, Justine, you may leave the room. We will see if it is necessary to send it to him."

I had only two alternatives, either to faint away or to burst into convulsive sobs. I chose the latter.

"Mamma—mamma, he has a glass eye! Good Heavens, is it possible? How horrible! I shall never console myself! I shall die of grief!"

"Calm yourself, my child, calm yourself. It is ridiculous to put yourself in such a state. This gentleman has deceived us, that is all. I always thought he had rather a queer expression."

Mamma had risen, and I was sobbing on her breast.

"Why did he not tell me? I who avowed all my own defects—the nail, the wisdom-tooth, and the anger—all—everything! Dear me! how unhappy I am! And only last evening he had said: 'You are the joy of my eyes.' He should have said: 'You are the joy of my eye.' Ah, it is dreadful!"

"Come, quiet down; don't cry like that. I tell you it is ridiculous. Think no more about it, try to calm yourself. How unfortunate it is things have gone so far! Only eight days before the wedding, and everything ready! Well, it is a good thing we found it out in time."

I hardly listened. One question burned in my throat.

"He has another eye to change with, mamma, and this one, which he has used, is probably put in water to cool."

Mamma was horribly worried. "I knew nothing whatever about it," she said. "I have never known anyone intimately who had a glass eye, and do not care to know how they manage."

She continued a little monologue all to herself: "It is pleasant. All this trousseau, marked with a V. We never will find the same initial again; and your father will listen to no one else. He was charmed with this gentleman at first sight. The references were perfect; the Jesuit fathers, his colonel, and everyone. That is so like a man; one can never count on them. A pretty discovery, indeed! I always thought there was something extraordinary about him; the individual never pleased me, and I was quite right."

I had raised my head; the vision of the glass eye gazing at me from the depths of the wash-basin still troubled me profoundly. But another vision came also to my memory.

I saw again my fiancé, so good, so tender. I heard once again all our prospects for the future; all our plans made together; and, suddenly, it seemed to me to be last evening, and a rain of kisses was falling on my hair. I had not told mamma about these kisses; but I felt I loved Raoul with his one eye, and that nothing would induce me to give him up. All my courage came back to me.

"Mamma, I am sure he lost that eye in some honourable, magnificent way! It is a wound of which he should be proud; in saving someone, perhaps, from a fire; in sacrificing himself, it is certain—he is so good, he has such noble sentiments. I quite understand he would dislike confessing it."

"What do you say? Are you quite crazy? Do you think I am going to allow you to marry this man with such an infirmity? You, beautiful as you are, and only seventeen, and with your fortune, too? No, a thousand times no, my child; do not forge yourself a romance of devotion and sacrifice, it is perfectly useless. I will never consent to your marriage with a man with one eye. Should he lose the other, he would be quite blind, and how agreeable that would be!"

"But, mamma, I will be his faithful dog; I will lead him, I will take care of him, and will love him, in spite of his infirmity, in spite of everything which interferes to separate us!"

I was in an extraordinary state of exaltation. My sobs began again, harder than ever and did not promise to stop, when Justine re-entered the room, her honest face showing every expression of astonishment and stupefaction.

"It isn't possible that mademoiselle can put herself in such a state because M. de Valente has forgotten his eye; at all events he can buy another if he needs it before this evening, and he won't throw himself in the river because he hasn't that thing in his face."

And Justine showed me, hanging delicately at the end of her fingers, Raoul's monocle that I knew so well, with its round glass encircled with tortoiseshell, which seemed to me for the moment like a luminous halo. My emotion forbade my speaking. Mamma, however, went quickly towards Justine.

"Is that what you call a glass eye, Justine?"

"Certainly, madame; it seems to me that's the name for it. In any case it doesn't suit Monsieur Raoul, and mademoiselle would do well to give him spectacles when they are married; it is strange that men of the present day think it pretty to look with one eye—like that; it must be very difficult to keep it in place. I should never know how"—and Justine, with a comical grimace, stretching her mouth and turning up her nose, tried to introduce the monocle underneath her right eyebrow. I could contain myself no longer. My tears and sobs turned to idiotic laughter—I was so content! So happy!

It is now twenty-five years since all that happened.

Raoul has been an excellent husband—quite as unendurable as that order of individual always is. He has worn spectacles now for a long time, and when he wishes to see anything, looks with his two eyes. The monocle is buried in a drawer. I keep it as a relic of tears and laughter, and shall will it to my grandchildren if I should have any. My daughters are engaged and I have already told them that the pathways of the park are cold and damp in the evening! Each one has his turn in this world—life passes and very soon there will be nothing of our household but my fiancé's glass eye.

"A Tide in the Affairs."

Now that Philip Mannell is dead—in body only, for many generations will gratefully remember the name of one whose writings roused an enthusiasm which will be lasting—I will give the world a chapter of his life hitherto unwritten.

Like most men with or without an intellect above the average, being twenty-five or twenty-six, he was consumed with the firm conviction that he could make if not a mark in, yet a living out of letters, if only—and that "if only" sticks to most men—the necessary opportunity would come.

How many times have you and I in our spring days drawn up the skeleton of a plot, possible or impossible, to be torn up the next minute?

If possible, second thoughts made it too commonplace; if impossible, sufficient courage was lacking to trust it to the coldly cynical eye of an editor.

Mannell had the same wish—the same firm conviction, but the plots would not come.

Being without predilection for any particular practical calling, and being a person of rather more than average abilities and less than average foresight, he had become a schoolmaster.

For a year or two he had pursued his calling in London and was fast settling down into a feeling that, though he might be a success in his profession, the muse of literature would never condescend to befriend him, in spite of the strong feeling that he had missed his vocation.

He had rooms in Acton, and, of a nature loving solitude, lived, and took his recreations alone.

One evening he left his rooms in an aimless sort of manner, intending, as he often did, to enjoy a smoke either walking, or, if particularly lazy, on the useful 'bus.

He sauntered along, his thoughts busied with nothing in particular; then hailing a 'bus, which at this time of the evening, going citywards, was almost without occupant, he climbed to the top, refilled and relit his pipe, looked out his necessary change, and prepared—to do nothing. He had no direct intention, but let the 'bus take him where it would. The steady jog-trot and the clanking chains of the horses, with the fact that, the shops being closed for the most part, the way was not well lit, combined to bring a drowsy feeling over him.

Now and then the 'bus pulled up, and the "Benk, Benk" of the conductor, though not very energetic, would rouse him.

Half-way between Queen's Road and the Marble Arch, the 'bus again stopped.

Mannell was partly roused, though beyond noticing two men had hailed the driver he did not bestir himself.

"Only one on top. That's better than those two women inside."

Though this was said in an undertone, Mannell heard it. They came upstairs and sat down, with some little hesitation. Mannell was in a middle seat, and so the two men could not sit far from him. Dulled as his attention was, he felt that they regretted the presence of another.

This was interesting, but he little dreamt what he was in for.

The 'bus started again.

Carefully avoiding attracting their attention, Mannell took stock of his companions.

One man—evidently the elder—in a long overcoat and large soft felt hat, with his bushy eyebrows and heavy military moustache, had a distinct Slav appearance.

His comrade was a beardless youth, with sharp aquiline features and keen eyes.

After a low conversation of some minutes, Mannell's attention, which had flagged, was again called to them, by the younger exclaiming in a louder tone:

"It's not my fault. There were no cabs about. We had to come up here. We may as well remain, for he can't hear."

"Speak French, you fool," growled the other. "I expect he won't understand that. I'll make sure."

By this time, Mannell was outwardly asleep, and inwardly keenly alive. He felt thankful that he was a fairly good French linguist.

The elder man leant over and speaking in French said:

"Pardon me, sir, how far should I book for Charing Cross Road?"

Mannell looked up.

"I am sorry, sir. I don't understand. I am English."

"Nevare mind, sare. Please ze route to Sharing Cross Road to tell me."

Mannell told him and with voluble thanks the man resumed his seat.

After the conductor had taken his dues, their conversation began again—this time in French.

"What time does he expect us?" said the younger.

"Any time this evening!"

"Have you settled details? Are you reckoning that he will be landed here in London?"

"No! No! that would never do. Nowhere near London. The East Coast though, I expect."

"When shall we know?"

"Strazy says in the Telegraph the day after to-morrow."

"Why not to-night?"

"He won't know till to-morrow, and in the meantime he will arrange the other details with us. You and I will have to see it through, I expect. By the way, the government seems uneasy about the vessel as it is. I hope they won't delay much longer."

The 'bus stopped at the top of Shaftesbury Avenue, and the two got off and walked away in a southerly direction. Mannell assuring himself that they did not see him, followed at some little distance. He, however, was destined to lose them, though he noticed, as he expected, they did not make for Charing Cross Road, but turning off, made towards Wardour Street, and were soon lost in the intricacies of Soho. Mannell, after wandering about for some little time, made his way back to Oxford Street and home. He felt if he could spot that communication in the Telegraph, that he was on the track of something startling, though for the moment he could see no way of following it up.

* * * * *

Two days afterwards, on Friday, there appeared in the agony column of the Telegraph the following:

Apckmp, qyr, lglc, nk—qrpyxw.

This was the only notice that Mannell could connect with the incident on the 'bus, and for a long time being unprepared for cipher, he could think of nothing to help him.

After many essays, it suddenly struck him that the last word was probably a signature, and then he remembered "Strazy" was to be the informant.

Following this up he found the letters were two earlier than the actual and thus he made out:—

Cremor, Sat, nine p.m.—Strazy.

This was very plain and straightforward, and though now and then he was afraid he was finding a mare's nest or was interfering in some private business, the matter had some fascination for him. If it fizzled out, he at any rate had had a little excitement out of it.

Cremor is, we know, a comparatively small place on the East coast; and to this place, Saturday being a free day for him, Mannell went for the week end.

It was in the train going to his destination that Mannell came to the conclusion that the business he was engaged in was no unimportant one. Turning over the leaves of his daily paper, his attention was caught by a paragraph stating that the French Government and people were exercised at the delay of a vessel, which was bringing home for a re-trial, a man whose condemnation and transportation had caused a European sensation and who was believed by very many to be the victim of an appalling series of machinations on the part of those in authority.

The vessel had been due some days, and had been sighted two days before in the Channel.

Secrecy had to be exercised because of the ferment of public opinion, and therefore nothing more was known.

Here then was the discovery he was on the eve of.

It was too late for advice, in fact he was rather unwilling to seek it, for fear after all of a fiasco.

The day passed all too slowly for the latter, who, excited as he was, could find no interest in the popular seaside resort, and scarcely knew how to pass the time after making the few arrangements he thought necessary.

* * * * *

On the deck of a yacht of some 150 tons, steaming up the North Sea and keeping just out of sight of the coast stood three or four men. One was gazing apparently eagerly over the water. The others were evidently engaged in watching the first. The latter, some few days before, had been transferred to his present vessel from a French cruiser, and he was expecting to be landed somewhere on the French coast.

Suddenly a man in the bows evidently in command, having scanned the coastline which had just appeared through his glass for some minutes exclaimed:

"Here is our destination at last."

These words acted as a signal and almost before they were finished, the three men had closed round the fourth, and in a few moments, he was gagged, bound, and thrust into a long chest not much larger than a coffin, but with ventilation for breathing purposes. As a further precaution a dose of chloroform was administered to the victim in order to keep him silent till he was safely landed and concealed.

* * * * *

When the two men whom Mannell had overheard on the 'bus, after sighting the yacht, sauntered down to the beach and ordered a boat, they might have been suspicious at the alacrity with which it was ready and manned; and they would have been still more averse to the little excursion if they had known that at least one fisherman was new to the calling, being a schoolmaster by profession, and that all were secretly armed, more prepared for boarding a pirate than for fetching ashore some luggage from the yacht which has scarcely had time to drop anchor.

The luggage consisted almost solely of a long chest of heavy weight.

Mannell's uncertainty about the whole business, led him to devote all his energies to securing the chest, and he neglected the vessel almost completely. He realised his mistake later.

The conspirators were too much engaged with the apparent success of the undertaking to scent failure now.

As the boat grounded Mannell jumped ashore first.

When the chest was landed, the elder of the conspirators speaking fairly good English, asked for help to carry the chest to a spot above the beach where a trap was to be ready to take it—to be examined if necessary.

Then Mannell stepped forward.

"One minute, please. We will examine it here."

Whether the question was so unexpected, or whether the air of the fishermen was threatening the two men at once turned and ran but they were quickly secured and detained while Mannell opened the chest and discovered its gagged occupant, more dead than alive.

As Mannell had guessed, the occupant of the chest was none other than the man who was the centre of Europe's interest.

Communication was made with London and the victim and his captors were sent to France, and thanks to judicious expenditure of hush money the matter never became public property.

It was surmised that Strazy, a name which concealed the identity of a high-placed French official wished to secure the man, and to force him to sign a statement that he was guilty of the crime with which he was charged or of some other equally serious offence.

Mannell received a suitable acknowledgement from the two governments, for the part he had played in the affair, but his greatest gain was more lasting.

His first and perhaps his greatest work was founded on the incident, and thus he laid the foundation of a fame which, though he is dead, is still undimmed.

How I Played Providence to Richard Stanley.

"How I came to be staying at Fairleigh Court at the time of the exposure of Lionel Vernon, its owner, doesn't matter," said Fred Massey. "There I was, and there I remained a spectator, if not an actor, in one of the strangest dramas that ever was enacted. You remember Dick Stanley, don't you?" he asked us, barely waiting for the unanimous refrain of "Rather" before he continued, "As nice a fellow as one could wish to meet. Shall I spin you the yarn?" with a sudden access of difference extremely amusing.

"You'll explode if we stop you," laughed Fairfax, "we all know your weakness, Massey, so fire away."

And nothing loth Massey obeyed.

"A charming host, a perfectly ordered establishment, the companionship of my favourite chum, what could be the matter with me that, try as I would, I was not able to shake off the feeling of depression that hung over me from the hour I arrived at Fairleigh Court?

"I felt positively nervous as the prospect of an introduction to Dick's fiancée, the beautiful Esmé Vernon, and when I tried to congratulate dear old Dick himself on his approaching marriage I found myself faltering out the merest common-places and platitudes.

"However, I put it down to brain fag and trusted that after a while my normal health and spirits would reassert themselves.

"I did not meet Miss Vernon at dinner, 'a headache,' her brother Lionel explained, prevented her joining us, much I regret to say to my satisfaction. In the course of the evening Dick announced he had some letters he was bound to get off. Our host was summoned to a consultation with the farm-bailiff and, perforce, I was left to my own devices.

"'Have a look at the pictures in the north gallery, old chap,' said Dick, 'there are one or two well worth your attention. Besides,' and he flushed a little, 'I want your opinion on Esmè's portrait. It was painted some years ago now—in fact, when she was but seventeen. She was always lovely,' he added, musing, 'but even I hardly realised what a beautiful woman my darling would have grown.

"''Tis a long time for a woman to wait—seven years—isn't it, Fred? And yet my dear girl has waited just so long for me. More, she had not even the consolation of letters, for correspondence between us was forbidden. I was anything but prosperous, as you know, when I left England, and Lionel declined to sanction our engagement. I don't blame him, though between ourselves I think he's a bit hard. But now Fortune's turned. I 'struck 'ile," as the Yankees say, out in California, or rather stumbled on a gold mine, and so there is nothing between me and happiness which,' he added with a bright smile, 'being interpreted signifies Esmé.'

"Fairleigh Court was by no means an ancestral mansion. It was a large commodious modern house, well-built, artistically decorated and filled with all the newest improvements.

"Lionel Vernon was by way of being an artist, and the north gallery was fitted up very much in the fashion of a studio. There were, as Dick had said, several pictures well worth one's attention, but although I was tempted to linger over an exquisite face after Romney, curiosity induced me to look for Miss Vernon's portrait. Instinctively I made my way towards a large oil-painting, at the extreme end of the gallery. It represented a young and exquisitely lovely girl of about seventeen. Lovely it was in very truth but mournful beyond expression. In the large wide eyes—of dark-brown, there lay a shadow. The perfect lips formed for laughter drooped in sad curves. It was a face to haunt one, a face—I started. Of whom did it remind me? Memory conjured up a fleeting vision of a tall slight form, a wealth of golden hair, eyes brimful of happiness. How like, and yet how cruelly unlike the face before me; and then the recollection faded, and I was no nearer discovering who it was that Esmé Vernon's portrait so curiously recalled to me.

"Somehow the sadness of the pictured face affected me. I found myself pitying the girl, feeling that life had some sad fate in store for her. I remember even as the thought flashed through my mind how indignantly I dismissed it. What more could any girl want from fate than a husband like Dick Stanley? How Dick would stare if he knew the length to which imagination had carried me.

"I laughed at the idea and turned to leave the gallery, my hand was on the door, when a strange sound broke the silence. I turned, my blood tingling and a queer sensation at my heart. Once again it echoed through the gallery, and I shivered as I listened. Ay, shivered, for it was the echo of a mad woman's laugh. I glanced round apprehensively. Nobody was to be seen. After a while I was ready to persuade myself that my wretched nerves had played a trick, and that I had heard nothing more dreadful than the wind rustling among the poplars. I shut the door again, and walked boldly up the gallery. All was unchanged, no sign or trace of anything or anybody. I remained sceptical until I reached Miss Vernon's portrait, The face looked sadder than ever and I felt strangely stirred as I gazed.

"Suddenly I saw the drapery upon the gallery wall move, and a small white hand drew back a heavy portière. Fascinated, I watched a pale, thin face look out at me—watched till the face was burnt into my brain. The shadow lurking in the eyes of the pictured beauty had become a dread reality. The original of Esmé Vernon's portrait stood before me, madness written in her every line and movement.

"Even as I looked, the figure, with a weird unnatural laugh, vanished, and search as I might no trace of her remained.

"The shock which the awful vision gave me, left me deep in meditation from which I was aroused by Dick himself.

"'Why, old chap,' he said, 'have you fallen asleep or what? I've spoken to you three times already. Here's Esmé come to see my best and dearest friend. Why, Fred——'

"Shaking off his hand I gazed in utter stupefaction at the girl beside him. Tall, fair—I glanced from her back again to the portrait. Ah, no, there was no shadow in her eyes, no hint of a fate too sad, to pitiful to think of. But who, who could she be?

"And then, by one of those strange freaks of fancy, brain waves—call them what you will—the studio faded, and I seemed to stand in an old-fashioned garden. A tall grey-haired man hastened to welcome me and by his side a fair young girl.

"'It's Mavis,' I cried, 'Mavis Grey.'

"Stanley gazed at me in astonishment.

"'What does he mean, Dick?' cried his fiancée. 'How dare he so insult me?'

"The words recalled me to the present position of affairs.

"'Your resemblance to the daughter of an old friend for the moment quite startled me, Miss Vernon,' I explained. 'I can never apologise sufficiently for my clumsiness in speaking so abruptly.'

"She listened to my explanation, and appeared quite satisfied, and Dick took no further notice of the incident, but for the rest of the evening I was conscious that Lionel Vernon was regarding me in a catlike fashion from under his eyelids.

"'I hope you'll sleep well,' said he as I wished him good-night. 'Only don't let your exuberant imagination get the better of your common sense, else you'll be seeing or hearing something else peculiar!'

"'Hardly,' I returned. 'I expect you keep your chamber of horrors locked at night.'

"For a second his eyes dropped, then staring me full in the face he laughed:

"'You mean the gallery?' he asked. 'Hardly a compliment to my sister or her portrait.'

"The man was beyond me. I could no more fathom him than I could explain what had occurred that afternoon. His sister Esmé was undoubtedly insane. What motive could he have in concealing her and substituting another woman in her stead? For that the woman who had been introduced to me as Dick's fiancée was Mavis Grey I was convinced.

"A mystery there undoubtedly was; how could I solve it?

"And by one of those strange turns of fortune chance put the clue into my hands.

"I was too much agitated by the strange events of the day to feel able to compose myself for sleep. I paced the room with nervous energy forming first this and then that conclusion. At last nature reasserted itself. I found myself yawning, I grew drowsy, and finally threw myself dressed as I was upon the bed.

"I woke that night with a start to find my hands icy cold and my heart beating at express speed. Something had startled me, but before I had time for conjecture I heard a sound as of a woman weeping. In an instant I remembered that my room was on the same floor as the North Gallery and as quickly I decided that the sounds issued from there. Intensely excited, but with my nerves well in hand I groped my way as quietly as possible down the dim corridor until I stood a few feet from the entrance to the picture gallery.

Fascinated, I watched a pale, thin face look out at me.

"I glanced into the room, and at the sight which met my eyes I had difficulty in repressing an exclamation of horror.

"Lionel Vernon was bending over Dick's fiancée, who with every appearance of terror and dismay, was striving to shake off his restraining hand.

"'You to defy me, to say what you will, and what you will not do! Another word, and I will crush you utterly, destroy for ever the love you boast of. Do you suppose Dick Stanley will continue to love you when he knows the truth?'

"'The truth!' she echoed scornfully. 'Tis you, not I, who should fear that. I have but to tell my tale to Dick, and he will love, will pity and forgive!'

"Lionel smiled in that smooth, evil sort of fashion that I had always hated.

"'What have I to fear?' she went on passionately. 'The fault, if any, will be laid to your charge. You told me that Dick Stanley was engaged years back to your sister Esmé, and after years of weary waiting at last he returned to England a wealthy man. You told me that if he had learnt the girl he loved was dead, he would go mad or die of grief.'

"'Yes,' said the man quietly, 'and then?'

"'You begged me for his sake, the sake of the man your dear dead sister had adored, to personate her. You said I was her living image, and that no one could detect I was not she.'

"'And then?'

"'I did so, and—and, Dick never knew. But now,' and her voice took a note of exultation, 'now Dick loves me for myself, not for the sake of that other woman, and when I tell him all, he will but love me the more. It isn't possible,' she went on, 'that I could marry him with such a lie upon my lips. Besides why should you wish it? Even if I consented, it would be no good; sooner or later I should be discovered. You see that man this afternoon remembered me. Others also know me as Mavis Grey. I cannot marry him with such a lie upon my lips,' she cried once more.

"'It will be that or nothing,' said Lionel savagely.

"'You mistake,' she answered eagerly, 'he will surely forgive, because he loves me so.'

"'You are leaving me out of the question, I fancy,' interrupted the man. 'Your tale sounds pretty and interesting, I grant you. As to whether it will bear inspection or not, that is another matter. If you remember, you first met Stanley at my house in Bayswater; he entered the room, where you were alone, greeted you as the woman he loved—and you replied as that woman.'

"'Well?'

"'Not well at all,' he answered with a mocking little laugh, 'listen to my version of the affair and you will agree with me. First I met you at the house of an artist to whom you sat, as afterwards you did to me.'

"'What if I did?' she broke out fiercely. 'I was poor and glad to earn my living—no matter how, so long as it was honest.'

"The other shrugged his shoulders and continued:

"'As a model you came to me, and in the course of conversation you learnt the history of my dead sister's engagement to Dick Stanley. You also remarked on your extraordinary likeness to her. One day Dick Stanley returns; taking advantage of my absence you throw yourself into his arms, and he, mistaking you for Esmé, is only too glad. I am horrified at the deception you have practised, but partly out of sorrow for Dick, partly out of the weakness a man always shows when a pretty woman is in question, I did not unmask you. But at last my conscience would not let me countenance the fraud. Say,' he added, with a scornful laugh, 'shall I give your lover my version?'

"'He cannot believe what you say,' she panted.

"Vernon broke into a peal of mocking laughter.

"'What, believe your word, the word of an adventuress, against mine. Try, and see what the result will be.'

"She moaned, clasping her hands like one distraught.

"'What shall I do? What shall I do?' she cried.

"'Be sensible, hold your tongue. Marry him and say nothing.'

"'But——'

"'I have my reasons for wishing it,' he said, with that soft slow smile of his. 'What they are do not concern you. You will have a home, a loving husband, wealth and happiness.'

"'At the cost of truth, of honour. Oh, what will it all profit me when the price I must pay—is my soul.'

"'Folly,' he sneered, 'you are nervous and excited. A good night's rest is what you want, my dear. Things will appear very different in the morning.'

"But she could only answer with her sobs, until out of patience the man took her arm and led her from the gallery—passing, greatly to my comfort, through the other door.

"In the library next morning I noticed a small packet of papers on Mr. Vernon's writing-table, and the idea suggesting itself that amongst them I might find something connected with the strange conspiracy, I felt no compunction in going through them. At present the motive for Vernon's conduct was lacking, and it must be, I reasoned, a strong motive to induce him to embark on so perilous an undertaking.

"He greeted you as the woman he loved."

"My expectations were fulfilled. Among the papers was a deed by which Stanley settled £30,000 on Esmé Vernon, his future wife, with power to will it as she chose.

"The whole vile plot stood revealed. In a flash I understood the villain's purpose. He intended Mavis Grey to impersonate his sister Esmé right up to the hour of the wedding. But at the ceremony the poor mad girl herself was to appear. After—well, no one could see the fragile figure and believe she would live longer than a year. And in the event of her death Lionel would doubtless take care that he should profit.

"As I stood, the paper in my hand, someone grasped me by the arm.

"'Good Heaven, Dick,' I cried.

"'What are you doing,' said my friend sternly, pointing to the papers. 'What does this mean?'

"But I could only stammer, 'Dick,' I began, 'Dick—'

"'DICK.'

"A low voice echoed the name, the heavy curtains at the window parted and a tall slight form advanced.

"I recognised her as the real Esmé Vernon, the woman I had seen the previous afternoon; with outstretched hands she came towards us.

"'Don't you know me,' she said in a hoarse, strained voice. 'Don't you know me?'

"'My God,' said Dick,; 'what does it mean?'

"For a moment he stood speechless, unable to move or stir, until a piercing scream roused him, as it were, to life.

"All unperceived, Mavis Grey had entered, and at the sight of the woman whom she so closely resembled, whose eyes were hers, whose mouth seemed to wear the self-same smile—at the sight, I say, she staggered, tottered, and fell.

"And the tall, slight figure in black came closer to where Dick stood, helpless and aghast.

"'Darling,' said a voice—her voice—and I noticed how exquisitely sweet and tender were her tones, 'darling, I'm glad you've come at last because I'm very tired.'

"Something, I know not what, made Stanley, dazed and bewildered as he was, respond to the appeal. He gathered the slight figure in his arms, and kissed the lips that clung so loving to his. A look of infinite happiness stole over her features, and then——

"'Fred,' said he hoarsely, 'come, look here.'

"And with a great fear at my heart I looked.

"Esmé lay dead in Dick's arms.

"For his sister's sake, Stanley let Vernon go unharmed, but the man's villainy was even greater than we suspected. From various sources we gathered that the poor dead girl, never very strong, had been subjected to a course of persecution by her brother, who was desirous of marrying her to an old reprobate whose sins were as numerous as his income was large.

"Finding threats and persuations were useless he, hoping to secure her adherence to his schemes by these means, had told her that Stanley had married another woman, with the result that the girl's nervous organization broke down completely, and she became a victim to melancholia. The disease made frightful inroads upon her constitution, and her heart was much affected, while her mental condition became such that marriage was out of the question.

"Vernon, desperate for money, had conceived the idea of making Mavis Grey impersonate his sister on Dick's return home, meaning as I have said to produce the real Esmé at the wedding. Once married he had little fear of Dick's disputing the settlement—mad or not mad she would be his wife. And in a short time Esmé would die, and he, Lionel, would, as her legatee, be in possession of £30,000.

"The sound of her lover's voice had for a moment recalled the poor girl's reason, and I like to think that—if only for a moment—she tasted happiness before she died.

"And Mavis?

"Well, as I say, I always thought her more sinned against than sinning, and by her suffering she fully expiated her deceit. For a long time she lay between life and death, and when at last she recovered, it was to find her lover broken in health and spirits, a wreck of his old self.

"But time cured their wounds as it cures most others, and the year after Esmé's death they married, and I can truly say are happy."

AN UNANSWERED PRAYER.

It was a wild, stormy night, but the Rev. John Benham —rector of the Devon fishing village of Upmouth—gave little heed to it, as he sat in his study preparing his sermon for the following Sunday. He was over fifty, and looked it, by reason of his grey hair and stooping shoulders, but his features were fine and clear-cut, and his expression gentle and sympathetic, coupled with the far-away look of the deep thinker and profound scholar.

There was a knock at the door, and in answer to his "come in," his wife entered the room. She was a young and beautiful woman, whom the rector had married only two years before, and though he lived somewhat in the clouds, his love for his wife was very real.

He adored her as a precious gift sent to be the comfort and the delight of his old age. Truly, he knew little of her past life—only what she had told him —but that little was enough for his simple and unsuspicious nature. He trusted her implicitly.

Though only twenty-six when he first knew her, she was already a widow. Her husband had ill-treated her, and then deserted her, leaving her utterly destitute, and his death had caused her no grief. With her rich colouring, sunny hair, and lovely blue eyes, she made a bright picture in the dull, almost gloomy study.

"Oh! John," she exclaimed, seating herself unceremoniously on the arm of the rector's chair, "isn't it a dreadful night? James has just come back from the village, and he says there is great excitement down there, as there is a large ship going to wreck just off the rocks, right in sight of the people. The fishermen are doing all that they can with the boats, and James says they hope to save them all. I sent him back with some brandy, as it might prove useful."

"That's right, my darling, always so thoughtful," the rector replied fondly. "How dreadful these storms are, I hope no lives will be lost. Do you think I had better go down to the beach?"

"No, dear," she replied almost smilingly. "What good could you do? You know our brave fishermen will do all that can be done, and I told James to tell them to bring any injured person here. Was I right?"

"Quite right, dear, it is the least we can do, except pray."

"Oh! John, how wonderfully good you are!" she exclaimed, stroking his grey hair caressingly, "I verily believe you are the best man living. It is difficult to conceive there are so many bad men in this world, with you so good."

She meant what she said. To her he seemed something of a visionary and idealist, but always the best man in the world, and her love for him knew no limit.

"It is force of contrast," she assured herself. "If I am not bad myself—and I am not at all sure about that —I have known so much badness in my chequered life, and he is so good."

His wife's praise was sweet to him, but the rector was too modest to accept it without mild remonstrance.

"My dear, I am not good, not half so good as I ought to be," he protested gently, "and you know you may be good, too, if you wish, if you will."

She took his head in both her hands, and gazed deep down into his eyes.

"Dear, dear John, how I love you!" she said, in a tender whisper. "You are good enough for both. I am quite content to stand in the light of your reflected glory. But I must go, I hear a noise in the hall," and with a loving glance, she sped away.

The rector sighed. How beautiful and charming she was! Every day his love for her grew; but she was not entirely one with him. They were not yet one in thought and spirit. The great truths which were of such vital importance to him, were mere names to her. But he did not despair, he would go on hoping, and praying, and fervent prayer was always answered, he firmly believed.

In the hall Mrs. Benham found the servants gathered round a prostrate figure which two stalwart fisherman had just brought in.

"You told us to bring 'em here, mum," said one, pulling his forelock to the rector's wife, "and as he seems the only one much hurt, we brought 'im; he be dying, I think."

"Oh! poor man, I am so sorry, what can we do for him," she replied, bending over the injured man, and then the pallor of death came over her face, and a great horror shone in her eyes, as she uttered a slight exclamation.

The man opened his eyes, and for one brief moment gazed full at her, then wearily closed them again, feebly muttering to himself.

"I fear he is very badly injured," Mrs. Benham said, rising to her feet, and looking around with a strange expression.

"Mary, see that he is taken to the spare bedroom, and send for Dr. Jones at once. I will go and acquaint your master."

"She be that tender-hearted, she be," whispered one rough fisherman to the other, "did you see how white she went when she looked at him?"

"Ay, she be as good as she is luv'ly," the other returned cordially.

The rector was startled when he saw his wife.

"Nellie, you have allowed this to upset you," he said, when he had heard the story of the unfortunate man.

"It has been too much for you, sit here in my chair, while I go and have a look at him."

Dr. Jones had examined his unknown patient, and had done all that was possible, but he shook his head gravely as the rector entered.

"I am afraid your services are more needed here than mine," he observed. "I don't think he will live, he is injured internally, as well as a broken leg. He looks a decent fellow, but I fancy has roughed it a good deal."

The rector's grey eyes were full of deep compassion, as he leaned over the man.

"My friend, can you hear? Is there anything you would like to say?" he asked in the gent'est tone. The man regarded him steadily for a moment and then said in a weak but eager voice:

"My wife! where is she? I saw her here, bring her to me."

"Poor fellow, so you have a wife," the rector replied feelingly. "But I think his mind is wandering," he added in an aside to the doctor, who answered with decision:

"Undoubtedly. You must be very quiet for a while," he continued turning to the sufferer. "We will talk about your wife later on," and he drew the rector from the room, adding: "He may live a day or two, perhaps longer; he is a man of splendid physique."

Mrs. Benham awaited her husband's return with feverish anxiety, pacing the study in an agony of fear and apprehension. But one look at his face was enough; as yet, he knew nothing.

"Oh! how long you have been," she cried, going close up to him, and speaking rapidly. "What did he say? Did he speak? Is he better?"

How truly kind and sympathetic she was! Anxiety for this stranger had quite excited her.

"Jones says he has little hope of his recovery, but that he may live for some days. He is slightly delirious, and talked of his wife; he saw her here, he says."

"Oh!" she gasped, clasping her hands together tightly, "what a strange idea. It must have been one of the servants he imagined to be his wife. I must go now and speak to cook. You must stay here and try and finish your sermon, you have been interrupted enough for one night."

But she did not seek the cook. She went swiftly and silently up the stairs to the room where the injured man lay, and locking the door behind her, stood staring down at him, as if unable to speak.

"Nellie," the man muttered, raising himself, "I knew you would come. I knew you were here; but how did you get here?"

"How did you get here?" she replied, in a low tone of suppressed excitement. "You who left me five years ago, you who died in South Africa? Explain quickly."

"It was all a mistake," he answered, turning his eyes away from her as he spoke. "I had a dreadful fever, and was unconscious for some time, and they thought I was dead, and wrote and told you so, and when I recovered I did not write and contradict it, as perhaps I should have done; but I was going to London to seek for you—a rich man, Nellie, but all my wealth has gone down in that accursed ship, and here I am in a strange house, without a penny. We'll have to begin all over again—you and I—when I get better. I swear I'll never be unkind to you again, as I was in the past. I must have been mad then, as I always loved you, and love you now."

"Hush!" she exclaimed, holding up her hand with an imperious gesture. "Don't speak of love, such men as you don't know the meaning of the word. I wished never to see you again. I would that you had gone down in that ill-fated vessel, for I am the wife of the clergyman you saw just now, and I love him with all my heart as I never loved you."

The man stared at her in surprise too great for words, and then stammered out:

"But what—how did it come about? I left you in London."

"Yes, to starve. Fortunately I had friends who got me a situation here, as a companion-housekeeper, and the rector of the parish married me, that is all."

"What a dreadful thing!" he replied. "I have a prior right to you though, you'll have to come with me, so you had better do it quietly, without any fuss. It's a clear case of bigamy, you know, what would your holy parson say to that?"

"Don't!" she cried fiercely, "don't refer to him in any way. You are not worthy to touch even the hem of his coat, such men as you and he are as far apart as the poles, you could never understand him. But he must never know, he loves me, and the disgrace would kill him. I shall never go with you," she added triumphantly. "You will never leave here until you are taken away, the doctor says. You will die, die before this week is out."

The man's face grew whiter than it had been before, and he stared at her in a dazed manner, as if trying to take in the meaning of her harsh cruel words.

"And you tell me this in that brutal way," he said at length. "Die! I, who was so full of life and hope, but yesterday! I, who am only thirty-four! Have you no pity, Nellie?"

"Yes, the same that you had for me when you left me alone in London, wretched and penniless," she replied, in clear cutting tones. "If my husband is holy, remember, I am not."

He sighed, and moved restlessly, murmuring:

"It is my own fault, I deserve it Nellie, if I die as you say I must, die without confessing anything, will you forgive me? Will my death atone for my sins?"

"Yes, I will forgive you, will try to think kindly of you even, but you must not live. He must not, shall not suffer. For his sake I would do anything, for his sake you must die."

And wearied with pain, and bereft of hope, with no desire to live—in the early hours of the next morning he died.

When it was all over, the anxiety and strain at an end, she threw herself into the rector's arms, and wept as though her heart would break, and he soothed and comforted her, as only he could. A few days later he took her to Italy. She needed a change of scene and air, after the sad event which had so tried and upset her delicate, highly strung nerves; and in Italy he discovered what a creature of whims and quaint ideas she was. Coming suddenly one morning upon a tiny Roman Catholic chapel, almost hidden in a nest of trees, she gazed enraptured at it.

"I should so like to be married in just such a dear little church," she exclaimed. "Oh John! may we? do say yes."

"But my darling, how can that be, when we are already married?" he answered in surprise.

"I know," she replied earnestly, "but I was brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, and somehow I cannot quite shake off its superstitions, and our marriage seems to me hardly any marriage at all, because it was performed only in a Protestant Church. Let us be married over again, and I shall be perfectly happy and satisfied. And after all it cannot matter, I shall be doubly yours then, and the tie can never be too close that unites me to you."

How could he refuse her when she spoke like this? And if she really had a scruple about the validity of their marriage why not humour her? It only meant procuring a license and witness; and so never for one moment imagining her real secret motive he consented, and they were married.

It was a lovely sunny day—the day of their marriage, and their hearts were atune with it.

"How inscrutable are the ways of Providence," the rector observed, looking at his wife's radiant face, "that we should be so happy, and others so unhappy. That poor fellow who died at our house, for instance—I hoped that he would live, and be restored to the wife he spoke of; I prayed so fervently tha the might, but it was not to be, my prayer was unanswered."

She looked at him long before replying, as if in deep meditation, then she said seriously:

"Do you remember once telling me that if our prayers were unanswered it was all for the best, for our good that it was so? Perhaps it was so in this case. Perhaps it was best for his wife, best for all concerned, that he should die. If you can understand what I mean perhaps God answered your prayer by not answering it."

"Perhaps so," her husband asserted thoughtfully. He was delighted that she should talk in this manner At last she took an interest in these matters. She was beginning to be "good." VERA BROWNING.

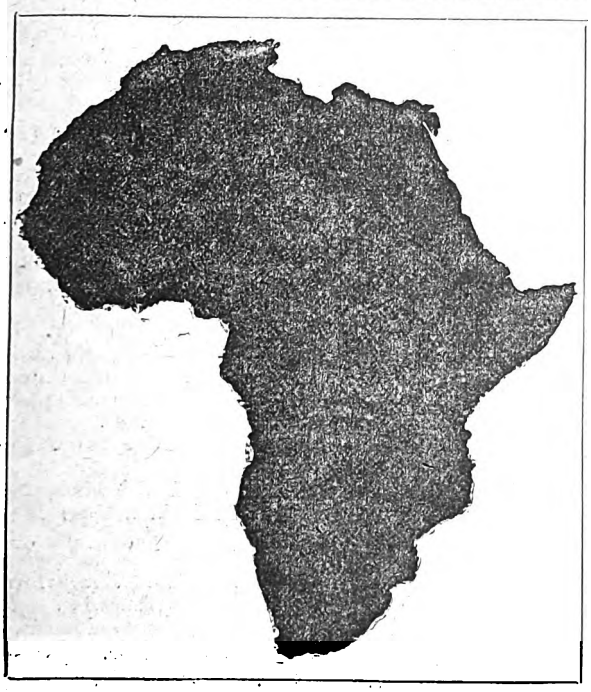
RESULT OF THE "TWO WIRE STITCHES" COMPETITION.

THIS competition was taken up by many readers, and most of the articles sent were very well made. Several competitors seem to have had a difficulty in making the wire bend, but if they had heated it it would have been much more pliable.

Some of the articles which were most carefully finished off are reproduced above.

The sender of the best made article is F. Moore, 11 Lorne Street Fairfield, Liverpool, to whom I am sending the first prize of One Guinea.

The next best, to each of whom one of our stereoscopes is being sent, are: P. A. Smith, 1 Crosby Villas, Dyson's Lane, Upper Edmonton, N.; H. Frisby, 17 Dover Buildings, Old Kent Road, S.E.; S. W. Baker, 1A Calverley Road, Eastbourne; W. Benwell, 1 Ernest Place, Whitehead Road, Aston; C. Whybourne, 1 The Pavement, New Malden, Surrey; G. Dowman, 150 St. James Road, Tunbridge Wells; G. Heitzmann, 29 Noel Street, Islington, N.; H. Horn, 211 Blackfriars Road, S.E.



"SHORT STORIES" SILHOUETTE COMPETITION

THIS competition seems to have been very popular, no doubt on account of it being such an easy one.

When properly pasted up, the pieces assume the shape of the

of which we give a reduction.

The entries were very numerous, and the result is that 224 of our readers sent in correct solutions.

It would be ridiculous to attempt to share the first prize of £5 among the winners, as it would not average sixpence each, so I have sent one of Pearson's stereoscopes to each of the 224 correct competitors.

IF YOU CAN'T DRAW PICTURES, the probabilities are that you can make a clever illustration by cutting out pieces from different sketches and making a good picture by pasting them together.

We will give £2 2s., £1 1s., twenty-five stereoscopes, and ten silver-plated pencil-cases for the best pictures we receive made up entirely of illustrations which appear in during the first three weeks in February, dated February 3rd, 10th, and 17th.

I SAT spinning at my little wheel in the sun, for the autumn day was cold, when I heard some one whistling, and, looking up, there was young Squire Turner, with his arms folded on the gate, looking towards me. When he caught my eye he laughed. I blushed, and made him a courtesy.

He was a handsome gentleman, the squire, and he was bonny to look at with his hair like spun gold in the October sunlight.

When I courtesied he bowed, and, said he:

"I've spoiled one pretty picture that I could have looked at all day, but I've made another as pretty, so I'll not grieve. May I come in?"

"And welcome, sir," said I, and I set a chair, for he was grandfather's landlord; but for all that I felt uncomfortable, for I was not used to fine company.

He talked away, paying me more compliments than I was used to, for grandmother, who brought me up, said:

"Handsome is as handsome does," and "Beauty is but skin deep."

Since I'm telling the story, I'll tell the truth. I had done wrong about one thing.

Neither of the old folks knew that I wore Evan Locke's ring in my bosom, or that we'd taken a vow to each other beside the hawthorn that grew in the church lane. I never meant to deceive, but grannie was old and a little hard, and that love of mine was such a sweet secret.

Besides, money seems to outweigh all else when people have struggled all their lives through to turn a penny, and they knew that Evan was a poor, struggling young surgeon.

I thought I'd wait a while until I could sweeten the news with the fact that he'd begun to make his fortune.

Grannie came in from the dairy five minutes after the squire was gone and heard he had been there. I didn't tell her of his fine speeches, but there was a keyhole to the door she came through and I have a guess she heard them.

That night we had something else to think of.

Misfortunes had come upon grandfather; but I didn't foresee that when the half year's rent should come due not a penny to pay it with would be found.

All this time Evan Locke and I had been as fond as ever of each other, and he came as often as before to talk with grandpa on the winter nights; and still every little while our young landlord, Squire Turner, would drop in and sit in his lazy way and watch me knit or spin.

Once or twice he was flushed with wine and over bold, for he tried to kiss me. But squire or no, I boxed his ears for his pains, and no softer than I could help either.

I could not help his coming, nor help seeing him when he came, and I did not deserve that Evan should be angry with me.

But he was. Eh, so high and mighty, and spoke as high as though one like the squire could mean no good by coming to so poor a place as the schoolmaster's.

He made me angry and I spoke up.

"For that matter the squire would be glad to have me promise to marry him," said I. "He thinks more of me than——"

"May be you like him better!" said Evan,

"I don't say that," replied I. "But bad temper and jealousy scarce ever make me fond of another. I pray I may never have a husband who will scold me."

For he had been scolding me. No other name for it.

Well, Evan was wroth with me and I with him—not heart deep, though, I thought—and I did not see him for more than a week.

I was troubled much, though, I knew he would come round again, and mayhap ask my pardon. For before you are wed you can bring your lover to his senses.

So I did not fret after Evan's absence, nor quite snub Squire Turner, who liked me more than ever. But one night grandfather came in, and shutting the door stood between grandmamma and me, looking at me, and so strangely that we both grew frightened.

At last he spoke:

"I've been to the squire's," said he. "For the first time I had to tell him that I could not pay the rent when due."

I opened my lips. Grandmamma's hand covered them. Grandpa drew me to him.

"Thou'rt young, lass," said he, "and they are right who call thee pretty. Child—couldst like the squire well enough to wed him?"

"Eh?" cried grandma. "Sure you're not wandering?"

"Squire Turner asked me for this lass of ours to-night. Of all women in the world there is but one he loves as he should his wife, and that is our Agatha."

"I dreamt of golden rings and white roses on Christmas eve," cried Grannie. "I knew the lass would be lucky."

But I put my head on grandfather's shoulder and hid my face.

The truth must come out, I knew.

"Wilt have him and be a rich lady?" said grandpa.

And when he had waited for an answer I burst out with "No," and a sob together.

"She's frightened," said grandmamma. "Nay, we must all wed once in our lives, my child."

I sat spinning at my little wheel, in the sun, when I heard someone whistling, and, looking up, there was young Squire Turner, with his arms folded on the gate, looking towards me.

Then grandpa talked to me.

He told me how poor they had grown, and how kind the squire was, and I had but to marry him to make my grandparents free from debt and poverty all their lives through.

If I refused and vexed the squire heaven only knew what might happen.

"She'll never ruin us," sobbed grandmamma.

Ah! it was hard to bear—bitterly hard; but now there was no help for it, I took the ring from my bosom and laid it on my palm, and told them it was Evan Locke's and that I had plighted my troth to him.

And grandmamma called me a deceitful wench, and grandfather looked as if his heart would break.

Oh, I would have done anything for them but give up my true love.

That night I kissed his ring and prayed heaven that he might love me always. In the morning it was gone, ribbon and all, from my neck.

I looked for it high and low, but found no sign of it. And I began to fear the loss of that dear ring was a sign that I would never marry Evan Locke.

The days passed on, and he never came near me.

"Oh, it was cruel in him," I thought, "to hold such anger for a hasty work he had provoked, when I spoke it that he must know I loved him so."

And grandma would scarcely look at me (I know why now), and grandpa sighed and moaned and talked of being turned out of his home. And I thought I should die of grief among them.

One day grandma said to me:

"It seems that your sweetheart is not over fond of you, nor over anxious to see you."

"Why not?" said I.

"Where has he been this month back?" asked grandma.

"Busy, doubtless," said I, with a smile, though I thought my heart would burst.

"You're going with him, maybe."

"Where?" said I.

She went to the kitchen door and beckoned in a woman who sat there—Dame Coombs, who had come over with eggs.

"I heard you rightly," she said. "You told me Evan Locke and his mother were making ready for a voyage."

"They're going to Canada. My son, a carpenter—and a good one, though I say it—made the doctor a box for his things. The old lady dreads the new country, but she goes for the doctor's sake. There's money to be made there."

"I told you so," said grandmother.

"I don't believe it," said I.

"They've sold the house and gone to Liverpool to take ship; and you may find the truth for yourself, if you choose to take the trouble," said Dame Coombs. "I'm no chatterbox, to tell falsehoods about my neighbours."

And still I would not believe it until I had walked across the moor and had seen the shutters fast closed and the door barred, and not a sign of life about the place.

Then I gave up hope. I went home all pale and trembling, and sat down at grandmamma's knee.

"It's true," said I.

"And for the sake of so false a lad you'll see your grandfather ruined and break his heart, and leave me, that have nursed you from a babe, a widow."

I looked at her as she sobbed, and I found strength to say

Digitized by Google

And one night the pain in my heart grew too great, and I went out among the purple heather on the moor, and there knelt down under the stars and prayed to be teken from the world.

"Give me to whom you will then, since my own love does not want me."

And then I crept upstairs and sat down on my bedside weak as though I had fainted.

I would have thanked heaven for forgetfulness just then, but it wouldn't come.

The next day Squire Turner was in the parlour as my accepted lover.

How pleased he was, and how the colour came back into grandfather's old face! And grannie grew so proud and kind, and all the house was aglow, and only I sad.

But I couldn't forget Evan—Evan whom I had loved so—sailing away from me without a word.

I suppose they all saw I looked sad.

The squire talked of my health, and would make me ride with him over the moors for strength.

The old folks said nothing. They knew what ailed me; only our little Scotch maid seemed to think there was aught wrong.

Once she said to me:

"What ails ye, miss? Your eye is dull and your cheek is pale, and your braw grand lover canna make ye smile; ye are na that ill, either."

"No, I am well enough," said I.

She looked at me wistfully.

"Gin ye'd tell me your all, I might tell ye a cure," she said.

But there was no cure for me in this world, and I couldn't open my heart to simple Jennie. So the days rolled by, and I was close on my marriage eve, and grannie and Dorothy Plume were busy with my wedding robes. I wished it were my shroud they were working at instead.

And one night the pain in my heart grew too great, and I went out among the purple heather on the moor, and there knelt down under the stars and prayed to be taken from the world, "for how can I live without Evan?" I said.

I spoke the words aloud, and then started up in affright, for there at my side was an elfish little figure, and I heard a cry that at first I scarce thought earthly. Yet it was but Scotch Jennie, who had followed me.

"Why do ye call for your true love now?" she said, "ye sent him fra ye for sake o' the young squire."

"How dare you follow and watch me?"

But she caught my sleeve.

"Dinna be vexed," she said. "Just bide a wee, and answer what I speer. It's for love of you, for I've seen ye waste like the snaw wreath in the sun sin the squire wooed ye. Was it your will the lad that loved the ground ye trod on should have his ring again?"

"What do you mean?" said I.

"I'll speak gin I lose my place," said Jennie. "I rode with the mistress to young Dr. Locke's place past the moor, and there she lighted and gave him a ring, and what she said I know not, but it turned him the tint o' death, and said he, 'There's na a drop o' true bluid in a woman 'gin she is false.' And he turned to wall and covered his eyes, an' your grannie rode home. There 'tis all I ken—wull it do?"

"Ay, Jennie," said I, "heaven bless you!"

And had I wings on my feet I could not have come to the cottage door sooner.

I stood before my grandmother, trembling and white, and I said:

"Oh, don't tell me, grannie, you have cheated me and robbed me of my true love by a lie. Did you steal the troth ring from my neck and give it back to Evan, as if from me? You I've loved and honoured my life long——"

She turned scarlet.

"True love!" she said, "you've but one true love now—Squire Turner."

"You have done it!" I cried. "It's written on your face."

And she looked down at that and fell to weeping.

"My own true love was breaking his heart," she said. "My husband and I had loved for forty years. I did it to save him. Could I let a girl's fancy, worth nothing, stand in my way, and see him a beggar in his old age? Oh, girl, girl!"

And then I fell down at her feet like a stone. I knew nothing for an hour or more; but then, when I was better, and they left me with Jennie, I bade her fetch my hood and cloak and her own and come with me, and away I went across the moor in the starlight to where the hall windows were ablaze with light, and asked the housekeeper to let me see the squire.

She stared at me for my boldness—no wonder—but called him. So in a moment he stood before me, with his cheeks flushed and his eyes bright, and led me into a little room and seated me.

"Agatha, my love, I hope no mischance brings you here."

But I stopped him.

"Not your love, Squire," I said. "I thank you for thinking so well of me, but after all that has passed I——"

I could say no more. He took my hand.

"Have I offended you, Agatha?" he said.

"Not you. The offence—the guilt—oh, I have been sorely cheated!" And all I could do was to sob.

At last strength came to me. I went back to the first and told him all—how we had been plighted to each other, waiting only for better prospects to be wed, and how, when he honoured me by an offer of his hand, I angered my grandmother by owning to the truth, and of the ring grannie had stolen from my breast and the false message that had been sent my promised husband from me.

"And though I never see Evan Locke again," said I, "still I can never be another man's true love, for I am his until I die."

Then as I looked all the rich colour faded out of the squire's face, and I saw the sight we seldom see more than once in a lifetime—a strong young man in tears.

At last he arose and came to me.

"My little Agatha never loved me," he said. "Ah, me! the news is bad—I thought she did. This comes of vanity."

"Many a higher and fairer have hearts to give," I said. "Mine was gone ere you saw me."

And then, kind and gentle, as though I had not grieved him, he gave me his arm and saw me across the moor, and at the gate paused and whispered:

"Be at rest, Agatha. The Golden George has not sailed yet."

He took my hand. "Have offended you, Agatha?" he said.

I liked him better than I had ever done before that night when I told grannie that I would never wed him.

Eh! but he was fit to be a king—the grandest, kindest, best of living men, who rode away with the break of the morrow and never stopped till he reached Liverpool and found Evan Locke just ready to set foot upon the Golden George, and told him a tale that made his heart light and sent him back to me. Heaven bless him!

And who was it that sent old grandfather the deed of gift that made the cottage his own, and who spoke a kind word to the gentry for young Dr. Locke that helped him into practice? Still no one but the good Squire Turner, whom we taught our children to pray for every night.

For we were married, and in a few years had boys and girls at our knees; and when the eldest was nigh two, the thing I needed to make me quite happy happened—and from far over the sea, where he had been three twelvemonths, came our squire with the bonniest lady that ever blushed beside him, and the hall had a mistress at last—a mistress who loved the squire as I loved my Evan.

Eh! but it's an old story. She that I remembered a girl I saw in her coffin, withered and old. And then they opened the vault where the squire had slept ten years to put her beside him; and I've nothing left of Evan, my life and my love, but his memory, and it seems as if every hope and dream of joy I ever had was put away under tombstones. And even the Golden George, the great strong ship that would have borne my dear from me, has mouldered away at the bottom of the sea. And I think my wedding ring is like to outlast us all, for I have it yet, and I shall be ninety to-morrow.

Ninety! It's a good old age, and it can't be long now before I meet Evan and the rest in Heaven.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of Mr. G. Manville Fenn's "The Vibart Affair" to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. C Goolding, 335 Liverpool Road, N. Attempts for this week's prize may deal with any subject, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 29th. Post-cards only, please.

"Said Sarcastic."

AN enthusiastic Yeomanry recruit, albeit not noted for his good riding, was well-known as an admirer of the fair sex.

During some recent manœuvres, he had the misfortune to have a rather frisky horse, which began to prance directly the band started. This caused the rider to lose his stirrups, and he only saved himself from a fall by clinging on to his horse's neck.

A sweep passing by, seeing him in this position, shouted out, much to the amusement of the crowd:

"Stop a kissing 'er, guv'nor, there's no mistletoe about."

Cured Them in Once.

SOME few years back the officer in command of the Royal Marines on board of one of H.M. battleships was much exercised in his mind as how to deal with two of his men who were continually fighting. Threats, pack-drill, and even "cells" were tried, but were of no avail. No sooner were they free than they flew at one another, and were at it again with worse results than before.

At last he hit on a very happy expedient. The next time the men were brought before him he set them to clean all the large windows on board, one inside, the other out, and neither to go to the next window till the other had finished.

The next morning they started, and after glaring at one another for three or four windows, the situation became too ludicrous and they both burst out laughing and have been good friends ever since.

A Good Reason For Why.

JUST after the Battle of Magersfontein, in South Africa, where the gallant 42nd Highlanders were almost cut up, an Irishman belonging to the same was seen the next morning turning over a huge heap of broken implements of warfare in search of something.

"What are you doing there, Private Murphy?" shouted an officer.

"Beg pardon, sor," was the quick reply, "but Oi'm lookin' for Private McCabe's helmet."

The officer then walked a few yards away, when a sudden thought struck him, so he shouted back:

"Why doesn't Private McCabe look for his own helmet?"

"'Cause his head was in it!" came the unexpected reply, and the officer walked away dumfounded.

Editors Are Not Thieves.

A RURAL preacher, finding the weather too warm, pulled off his coat and preached in his shirt-sleeves. After the sermon, a good brother, thinking an editor who was present would make a sensation of the incident, said to the parson:

"I don't suppose you knew, when you pulled off your coat to-day, that one of them newspaper fellers was at the meetin'?"

"Yes, I did," replied the preacher. "But I had my eye on the coat all the time!"

Where Democracy is Perfect.

THE spirit of democracy is dominant in Aberdeen. A little while before the city election a candidate for an office thought he would call on a few of the leading city councillors. He hailed a cab, and told the cabman to drive him to Councillor Bissett, the treasurer.

The councillor was found in a blacksmith's shop, shoeing a horse. "I'll see somebody better than this," said the candidate. "Drive me to Councillor Maitland's."

The cabman thereupon drove him to the pawnbroker's.

"Drive me to Councillor Gray's."

"I'm Councillor Gray, sir," replied the cabman.

He Didn't Stay There.

HALF-A-DOZEN commercials foregathered recently in a railway carriage, and as they neared a station where all tickets were inspected, the traveller nearest the door held out his hand for the bits of pasteboard, which his companions handed to him. He pretended to drop one ticket out of the window, and said:

"My goodness, Jones, I've lost your ticket! Get under the seat, quick!"

Alarmed and flurried, Jones obeyed. The train ran into the station, and the collector came up for the tickets, which were given him.

"Six tickets, five passengers?" he said with an inquiring look round.

"Oh, yes," explained the commercial nearest the door. "Jones always prefers to travel under the seat. See!"

The collector looked underneath the seat, and there, sure enough, was the sixth traveller. The collector said nothing, but it was evident that he had received a shock.

What Jones said had better not even be hinted at.

The Call to Arms.

ONE of our brave volunteers was sitting at tea with his mother when the postman arrived with a letter, on the envelope of which were the words "On Her Majesty's Service."

"Mother," said the brave volunteer, "it has come at last; I was expecting it every day."

"Go, then, my son, and do your duty to your Queen and country," said his mother.

The son then opened the letter, only to find that it was a notice to inform him that the dog tax was due.

Not the First, Nor the Last.

AT a concert held in Sheffield recently, an artiste, having just concluded with a screaming sketch, was greatly applauded by the audience.

Upon stepping back to fill the vacant chair he had just previously left (each chair upon the stage was decorated with a British flag) he unfortunately alighted upon the floor instead of the chair.

This naturally caused a good deal of laughter amongst the company assembled. But the artiste was equal to the occasion.

"Ah well," he remarked, arising from his unhappy position, "I'm not the first one who has come to grief by trying to sit on the British flag."

This witty remark was the hit of the evening.

"No Use Bossin'."

A HULL bricklayer, who, on the death of a relative, had come into a fortune of a few hundred pounds decided to set up as a master builder, and as a commencement entered into a contract to erect a small villa. The building was started, but our friend soon found that an employer's life is not one of unalloyed bliss.

An old friend chanced to pass the house one morning, and was astonished to find his mate of other days wielding the trowel once more, and superintending him and other workmen was a strange foreman.

The following conversation ensued:

"Why, Jack, lad! How's this? I thought you was a gaffer noo!"

"So I is, man, so I is. But I soon found I was no use bossin' the men, so I determined to go to wark agen meself, and I've hired yon chap to look after us."

Marrying a Widow.

MRS. WILLIAMS is a widow with three boys, whom she has brought up with great firmness. It is one of her rules that obedience to her commands must come immediately, and explanation, if at all, at her leisure.

"Freddy," she said to her youngest boy, aged seven, "I am going to do something in a few days about which I want to talk to you a little."

"Yes, mamma," responded Freddy meekly.

"I am intending to marry Dr. Morse on Monday next week," said the lady, and then she paused for a moment.

"Yes, mamma," said Freddy again; then he added, with a look of awe on his small face: "I s'pose Dr. Morse won't know anything about it till the time comes, will he, mother?"

He Knew a Thing or Two.

SIR CHARLES GAVAN DUFFY—a former Premier of the Australian colony of Victoria—was once made the object of a peculiar embarrassment. A man on a public occasion presented himself to Sir Charles, who had been appointed to some petty Government office after a campaign in which there had been questionable electoral practices.

"I suppose," said Sir Charles, "that you are one of my supporters?"

"Three of them," answered the man, with a wink that was impossible to misunderstand.

He Visited His Uncle's.

A RATHER seedy and penniless man was passing down the Salt Market in Glasgow the other day, at the same time feeling very dry, entered a pawnshop and asked what they would give him on his coat.

The assistant eyed the coat with curiosity, then quietly advised him to take it to the nearest rag-store.

So feeling rather down in the mouth he entered a rag-store, threw the coat on the scales, expecting to get at least the price of one drink.

But imagine his dismay when the assistant, after examining it, coolly asked whether he would have a bit of toffee or a balloon.

Practical Demonstration.

A RESIDENT of Kingston recently engaged a boy to run errands and make himself generally useful. The lad, who was rather "green," was sent the other morning into the fowl-house to fetch the eggs.

"Go and see if there are any eggs," said his mistress, "but don't bring the china ones."

The lad departed, and in about five minutes' time reappeared with a few shells in his hands, and the front of his coat smeared all over with the contents of the eggs.

"Whatever have you been up to?" shouted the good lady.

"Why," said the boy, "you told me not to bring the china ones, and how could I tell which were china and which were not unless I broke 'em?"

Paid off.

His Free Confession.

THE following story, which hails from a North Country town, shows there are widely varying ideas as to what constitutes voluntary testimony on any subject.

"Did I understand you to say that this boy voluntarily confessed his share in the mischief done to the school-house?" asked the magistrate, addressing the determined-looking female parent of a small and dirty boy.

"Yes, sir, he did," the woman responded. "I just had to persuade him a little, and then he told me the whole thing voluntarily."

"How did you persuade him?" queried his worship.

"Well, first I gave him a good hiding," said the firm parent, "and then I put him to bed without any supper, and took his clothes away, and told him he'd stay in bed till he confessed what he'd done, if 'twas the rest of his days, and I should thrash him again in the morning. And in less than an hour he told me the whole story voluntarily."

AN OLD BAILEY MYSTERY.

I DOUBT if any young man ever passed through such a varied experience as I met with when in the employ of Messrs. Lockyer and Legatt, the well-known firm of solicitors. For a time they were absolutely at the top of the tree, and one cause célèbre after another was placed in their hands. One secret of their success lay in the fact that they believed in retaining young and promising barristers with their way to make, rather than briefing counsel of assured position. By this means they discovered several budding geniuses, who would devote more time for considerably less money than their more comfortably placed brethren.

One of their pet protégés was Frank Mayhew, indeed old Lockyer prophesied great things of him, declaring he was a second Sergeant Ballantyne. I rather fancy the chief reason for his belief in Mayhew lay in the fact of the latter's engagement to Miss Connie Lockyer, the old man holding fast to the doctrine of "Cry me, and I'll cry thee."

I by no means shared my principal's enthusiasm for Mayhew, judging him, in fact, to be more of a steady goer than a showy speaker, nor blessed with "the gift of tongues," though plodding and painstaking to a degree.

I confess, therefore, that I felt surprised when I learnt that the firm had briefed him to appear for Stephen Leonard, who, as you will all remember, was charged with obtaining money by threats and menaces.

It was a strange case and at the time made a great stir, not only in the newspaper world, but throughout society. Stephen was a handsome ne'er-do-well, who had been shipped off to Australia by his sorrowing relatives so that he might disgrace himself, rather than them. That he would do both was, I firmly believe, greatly desired by the prime instigator of his banishment. This individual was a cousin of Stephen's father who since the latter's death had gained great influence over Mrs. Leonard, and who contrived in the course of a few years to gain the foolish woman's heart and fortune. To make a long story short, after some six years absence Stephen returned to find his mother dead and his step-father in possession of the property.

High words passed between them, and it is small wonder if the young man let indignation get the better of discretion, for it is no small thing to find your bitterest enemy in possession of the money that by all the laws of justice and of equity should be your own. Stephen's father had died a rich man, leaving all his property to his wife, to dispose of as she should so please, and the silly woman had pleased to leave her son penniless, to enrich the man he hated.

Finally, young Leonard held a pistol to Robert Grainger's head, and under threats of murder the wretched man was induced to sign a cheque for £15,000. Any other man but Stephen would have got clear of the country within twenty-four hours, but devil-may-care Steve must needs fool about for over a week, and when at last he stepped aboard a "liner" bound to the "States" he was greeted by a 'tec.

A woman had been seen with him in Liverpool but with their usual cleverness the police had neglected to detain her and since then she had skilfully managed to elude capture. Who, or what she was no one knew, but it was rumoured that she had made away with the greater part of the money, as but a small portion of the £15,000 could be traced.

Public sympathy ran in favour of the prisoner, but my opinion of his chance of getting off was but a poor one. The facts of the case were dead against him, all that he could hope for was a recommendation to mercy and a light sentence.

Even such hopes as these were to my mind not increased by the advocacy of Frank Mayhew. The surprise that so young and unknown a barrister should have been retained in so important a case was universal and as the time grew near Lockyer himself seemed to feel mistrust as to the capacity of the man on whom so much depended.

Leonard was utterly indifferent as to who was briefed on his behalf; the poor fellow alternated between fits of rage and a state of extreme depression. Chief among his anxieties appeared to be the safety of the woman whom the police had "missed" at Liverpool; so long as she was not taken he appeared to worry little as to the result of his trial.

"I shall know my fate soon enough," he said with a shrug. "Anyway, Granger hasn't got the money."

It was an anxious time for all of us more or less. Lockyer grew more irritable and Mayhew more nervous daily. In fact the latter's state somewhat alarmed me and I was fully prepared for him to break down any minute. Whatever else might be said no one could deny that a more hardworking counsel it were difficult to find; early and late he studied, compiling facts figures, and statistics as to the property possessed by Robert Grainger, with painstaking elaboration as futile as it was foolish.

One would have thought the man was going to contest a chancery bequest, instead of defending a prisoner at the Old Bailey. However that might be he fagged himself to the verge of brain fever, with the result that on the eve of the trial, he broke down and in a state of feverish exhaustion was peremptorily ordered to bed.

I shan't easily forget that afternoon, I can tell you. When the message arrived old Lockyer fairly lost his head. He raved, blasphemed, tore his hair, and anathematised himself and everyone else. Then, all but in tears, he took a cab and drove to Mayhew's house, where—as I afterwards learnt—he was with difficulty prevented from dragging his unfortunate prospective son-in-law out of bed.

He returned to the office somewhat jaded but more subdued.

"What on earth we're to do, I don't know, Transom," he confided to me. "There's not a big man that would take it up for love or money so late as this and I simply daren't trust it to a junior."

"Best send round for Mayhew's papers," I said, "and start instructing Davidson. He's very fairly smart and thoroughly understands the line his 'lead' was going to take up. Anyway he'll make a better show than a stranger."

Lockyer gazed at me in a hopeless sort of fashion but at last signified his assent to the proposal, and I went round poste haste to Mayhew's.

I returned with the papers to find Lockyer closeted with a mysterious individual, who, according to that ubiquitous being, the office boy, had called soon after I left with a "lidy," the aforesaid "lidy" having departed some few minutes before I arrived.

I waited patiently for half-an-hour, when, there being no signs of the conference ending nor, equally strange, of Davidson having been sent for, I knocked at the door.

Lockyer came out with a queer expression on his face —half perplexed, half pleased.

"Let me have the papers, Transom," he said. "And I don't think you need wait. I half fancy Mayhew will be well enough to appear to-morrow, anyway don't mention his illness."

Considering I'd just left Mayhew tossing about with a temperature a good deal higher than his doctor cared about, such a statement was hardly likely to inspire me with confidence, I suppose my face expressed a part, at any rate, of my surprise, for he suddenly drew quite close to me and whispered emphatically:

"I can't explain now, Transome, but you may rest assured that we shall pull it off to-morrow. Unless," he added, with true lawyer's caution, "something unexpected happens."

Considerably mystified I took my leave, wondering what was up, and feeling, if the truth were known, more anxious about Stephen than Mayhew.

The court was packed the following day. All the best dressed women, no less than the most popular men, in or about town, were in evidence. Newspaper artists jostled society reporters, while as many of the junior bar as could cram in leavened the whole.

Stephen Leonard looked well and remained perfectly impassive throughout the proceedings. Only once did he show traces of emotion, and that was when his counsel commenced to speak.

I say, "counsel" but who and what the man could be who appeared for him I for one could not determine. I had left Mayhew that morning, in fact not half an hour ago, in a darkened room, delirious with pain, and too weak to lift a finger. Yet had it not been for my positive knowledge to the contrary, I could have sworn that it was Mayhew, and no other, who spoke in such impassioned and soul stirring accents. The same strongly marked eyebrows, nervous lips and aquiline nose, the same irresolute movements of the hand. Face, figure, gestures, voice—ah! no, there at least was a dissimilarity. Mayhew possessed an even, almost a monotonous delivery, and his voice, though not unpleasing, was neither strong nor telling. The deep, strong tones that echoed through the hall, vibrating with tenderness, roused to passion, sinking to entreaty only to rise upon a storm of indignation and contempt, who but a fool could have supposed that it was Mayhew who so played upon the hearts of all who heard him?

As I say, Leonard had given a start when the speech for the defence commenced, and throughout the whole of what was considered one of the finest orations ever listened to in court, he sat gazing at the man in silent but profound astonishment.

As you all know the verdict was "Not Guilty" and for once the jury and the public were agreed.

No one ever suspected that there was a mystery in connection with Mayhew's great success, and for a long time I despaired of ever finding the solution. Lockyer was always conveniently deaf when I approached him on the subject, and Mayhew simply would not answer. I was beginning to fancy that I should have to give it up when chance all unexpectedly put the key into my hands.

I was travelling in the States a year or two later when I ran up against Stephen Leonard. He was always a cheery good-natured sort of chap, and dragged me home to "see his wife," without giving me a chance of refusing.

I found Mrs. Leonard a charming woman with a sweet face and smile, and a voice which reminded me in an odd sort of way of somebody—whom, I could not tell.

After dinner we all went to the theatre. I forget the name of the piece now, suffice it to say that the chief interest lay in a "trial" scene—that good old prop beloved of every dramatist—wherein the hero's innocence is proved at the same time that the villain's wickedness is made manifest.

As the man who played the part of prisoner's counsel took his place, I started to my feet. "Good Heavens," I cried, "it's the man who personated Mayhew."

Leonard hurried me from the theatre and after a little hesitation told me the truth.

At the time he returned to England, he was married, and his wife, who accompanied him, was in very delicate health. He was half mad with anxiety concerning her, and, without means or the hope of getting money save from his step-father, was driven to take the rash and foolish course he had adopted. It was his wife's illness that delayed his departure, and it was—as I had already guessed—his wife who had accompanied him to Liverpool.

"But the barrister—I mean the actor—I mean—in Heaven's name, Leonard, who is the man who won your case?"

"My wife's brother," he replied, "and one of the cleverest actors in America—or for that matter anywhere—and a master of make-up. My wife heard of Mayhew's illness and was convinced that if only her brother, aided by herself and old Lockyer, could appear in Mayhew's stead, the day would be won. The rest you know."

Mayhew, of course, had no choice in the matter, and was quite content to reap the kudos his supposed eloquence had gained him. I often smile to myself when I hear men wonder why it is he never fulfilled the promise of his youth, for needless to relate the defence of Stephen Leonard was Mayhew's one and only hit.

The young fellow himself? Well, next time a certain actor from the States is advertised to play, you go and see him. He's changed a good bit certainly, but he still retains his voice.

But even so, you'll never hear him to the same advantage as I did, when he played the lead in "An Old Bailey Mystery."

Composite Picture Competition.

- RESULT. -

I AM delighted with the artistic ability shown by my readers in this competition. Most of the entries were of a high order.

Some of the competitors must have spent a great amount of time and patience on their productions.

I have no hesitation, however, in awarding the first prize of £2 2s. to MR. HARRY NOBBS, 27 Mount Pleasant Road, Stroud Green, N., who not only sent in the largest picture (23in. by 13in.), but also showed most careful attention to detail.

The following is the list of competitors whose pictures merited a prize, and to each of whom one of our stereoscopes has been sent:

J. Allen, 12 Sydney Street, Glasgow; J. Baker, 4 Argyll Street, Darwen, Lancs.; J. Child, 2 Montpellier Terrace, Swansea; N. Douglas, 11 Sinclair Gardens, Kensington, W.; M. Green, 15 Richmond Road, Brighton; E. Hope, Frances Cottage, Goginan, near Aberystwyth, S. Wales; M. Martin, 1 Montague Gardens, Castle Avenue, Dover; A. Plowright, 22 Pine Road, Cricklewood, N.W.; G. Sharples, 5 Fisher Street, Blackpool; W. Yeaman, 174 Regent Street, South Shields, Durham.

Making Both Ends Meet.

IT should not be difficult to provide a substantial and varied breakfast for two people for five mornings for the sum of five shillings. On the whole, the entries were very good, but some competitors lost sight of the fact that variety in the menus should be considered, and only provided bacon and eggs for every morning. Others forgot that cocoa, although very wholesome and nourishing, is apt to become monotonous if taken every day, and many, too, omitted to provide some little dainty—such as jam, marmalade, or fruit—which is generally liked as a finish up to the first meal of the day. Three or four of the entries were extremely good, and it was hard to decide between them.

However, after reading them through most carefully, and comparing each item, I think that the first prize of £1 1s. is fairly won by MRS. PENTNEY, 98 Queen's Road, Dalston, N.E., who has provided menus which are at once economical, varied, and substantial.

The next best twenty, to whom I am sending a copy of Mrs. Williamson's popular six shilling novel, "Fortune's Sport," are:

M. Burt, Mount Pleasant, Ashley Road, Upper Parkstone, Dorset; M. Busby, 5 Eton Place, Plumstead; J. T. Davidson, 184 Slatefield Street, Glasgow; M. Dobson, 103 Beston Hill, Leeds; E. Everest, 74 Barnwell Road, S.W.; T. Fisher, 35 Mentone Mansions, S.W.; E. H. Harland, "Lindale," West Croydon; F. R. Hearse, 15 Vivian Road, E.; A. Herriot, 46 Fauldhouse Street, Glasgow; N. Lang, 25 Colet Gardens, West Kensington; M. Lilly, 97 Westminster Bridge Road, Lambeth; M. Nevin, 26 Balls Road East, Birkenhead; K. Nicol, 70 Clova Road, E.; M. Pritchard, 20 Claxton Grove, Hammersmith; M. Puttet, 111 Shenley Road, S.E.; M. Riley, 22 Myddleton Buildings, Islington, N.; A. Schmieden, 9 Juxon Street, Lambeth; F. Sentance, 271 Friern Road, S.E.; M. Shepherd, 128 Stephendale Road, Fulham; M. Wright, 18 Brantsfield Avenue, Edinburgh.

After the battles of Dover and Harwich the invading forces advanced upon London in the following order: The Army of the South had landed at Deal, Dover, and Folkestone in three divisions, and after a series of terrific conflicts had fought their way via Chatham, Maidstone, and Tunbridge to the banks of the Thames, and occupied all the commanding positions from Shooter's Hill to Richmond. These three forces were composed entirely of French and Italian army corps, and numbered from first to last nearly four million men.

On the north the invading force was almost wholly Russian, and was under the command of the Czar in person, in whom the supreme command of the armies of the League had by common consent been now vested. A constant service of transports plying day and night between Antwerp and Harwich had placed at his disposal a force about equal to that of the Army of the South, although he had lost over seven hundred thousand men before he was able to occupy the line of heights from Hornsey to Hampstead, with flanking positions at Brondesbury and Harlesden to the west, and at Tottenham, Stratford, and Barking to the east.

By the 29th of November all the railways were in the hands of the invaders. A chain of war-balloons between Barking and Shooter's Hill closed the Thames. The forts at Tilbury had been destroyed by an aerial bombardment. A flotilla of submarine torpedo vessels had blown up the defences of the estuary of the Thames and Medway, and led to the fall of Sheerness and Chatham, and had then been docked at Sheerness, there being no further present use for them.

The other half of the squadron, supported by a few battleships and cruisers which had survived the Battle of Dover, had proceeded to Portsmouth, destroyed the booms and submarine defences, while a detachment of aerostats shelled the land defences, and then, in a moment of wanton revenge, had blown up the venerable hulk of the Victory, which had gone down at her moorings with her flag still flying as it had done a hundred years before at the fight of Trafalgar. After this inglorious achievement they had been laid up in dock to wait for their next opportunity of destruction, should it ever occur.

London was thus cut off from all communication, not only with the outside world, but even from the rest of England. The remnants of the armies of defence had been gradually driven in upon the vast wilderness of bricks and mortar, which now held more than eight millions of men, women, and children, hemmed in by long lines of batteries and entrenched camps, from which thousands of guns hurled their projectiles far and wide into the crowded masses of the houses, shattering them with bursting shells, and laying whole streets in ruins, while overhead the war-balloons slowly circled hither and thither, dropping their fire-shells and completing the ruin and havoc wrought by the artillery of the siege-trains.

Under such circumstances surrender was really only a matter of time, and that time had very nearly come. The London and North-Western Railway, which had been the last to fall into the hands of the invaders, had been closed for over a week, and food was running very short. Eight millions of people massed together in a space of thirty or forty square miles area can only be fed and kept healthy under the most favourable conditions. Hemmed in as London now was, from being the best ordered great city in the world, it had degenerated with frightful rapidity into a vast abode of plague and famine, a mass of human suffering and misery beyond all conception or possibility of description.

Defence there was now practically none, but still the invaders did not leave their vantage ground on the hills, and not a soldier of the League had so far set foot in London proper. Either the besiegers preferred to starve the great city into surrender at discretion and then extort ruinous terms, or else they hesitated to plunge into that tremendous gulf of human misery, maddened by hunger and made desperate by despair. If they did so hesitate they were wise, for London was too vast to be carried by assault or by any series of assaults.

No army could have lived in its wilderness of streets swarming with enemies who would have fought them from house to house and street to street. Once they had entered that mighty maze of streets and squares both their artillery and their war-balloons would have been useless, for they would only have buried friend and foe in common destruction. There were plenty of ways into London, but the way out was a very different matter.

Had a general assault been attempted, not a man would ever have got out of London alive. The commanders of the League saw this clearly, and so they kept their position on the heights, wasted the city with an almost constant bombardment, and, while they drew their supplies from the fertile lands in their rear, lay on their arms, and waited for the inevitable.

Within the besieged area martial law prevailed universally. Riots were of daily, almost hourly, occurrence, but they were repressed with an iron hand, and the rioters were shot down in the streets without mercy; for, though siege and famine were bad enough, anarchy breaking out amidst that vast sweltering mass of human beings would have been a thousand times worse, and so the King, who, assisted by the Prime Minister and the Cabinet Council, had assumed the control of the whole city, had directed that order was to be maintained at any price.

The remains of the army were quartered in the parks under canvas, and billeted in houses throughout the various districts, in order to support the police in repressing disorder and protecting property. Still, in spite of all that could be done, matters were rapidly coming to a terrible pass. In a week, at the latest, the horses of the cavalry would be eaten. For a fortnight London had almost lived upon horse-flesh. In the poorer quarters there was not a dog to be seen, and a sewer rat was considered a delicacy.

Eight million mouths had made short work of even the vast supplies that had been hurriedly poured into the city as soon as the invasion had become a certainty, and absolute starvation was now a matter of a few days at the outside. There were millions of money lying idle, but very soon a five-pound note would not buy even a little loaf of bread.

But famine was by no means the only horror that afflicted London during those awful days and nights. All round the heights the booming of cannon sounded incessantly. Huge shells went screaming through the air overhead to fall and burst amidst some swarming hive of humanity, scattering death and mutilation where they fell, and high up in the air the fleet of aerostats perpetually circled, dropping their fire-shells and blasting-cartridges on the dense masses of houses until a hundred conflagrations were raging at once in different parts of the city.

No help had come from outside. Indeed none was to be expected. There was only one Power in the world that was now capable of coping with the forces of the victorious League, but its overtures had been rejected, and neither the King nor any of his advisers had now the slightest idea as to how those who controlled it would now use it. No one knew the real strength of the Terrorists or the Federation which they professed to control.

All that was known was that, if they chose, they could with their aerial fleet sweep the war-balloons from the air in a few moments and destroy the batteries of the besiegers; but they had made no sign after the rejection of their President's offer to prevent the landing of the forces of the League on condition that the British Government accepted the Federation and resigned its powers in favour of its executive.

The refusal of those terms had now cost more than a million British lives, and an incalculable amount of human suffering and destruction of property. Until the news of the disaster of Dover had actually reached London, no one had really believed that it was possible for an invading force to land on British soil and exist for twenty-four hours. Now the impossible had been made possible, and the last crushing blow must fall within the next few days. After that who knew what might befall.

So far as could be seen, Britain lay helpless at the mercy of her foes. Her allies had ceased to exist as independent Powers, and the Russian and the Gaul were thundering at her gates as, fifteen hundred years before, the Goth had thundered at the gates of the Eternal City in the last days of the Roman Empire.

If the terms of the Federation could have been offered again, it is probable that the King of England would have been the first man to own his mistake and that of his advisers and accept them, for now the choice lay between utter and humiliating defeat and the breaking up of the Empire, and the recognition of the Federation. After all, the kinship of a race was a greater fact in the supreme hour of national disaster than the maintenance of a dynasty or the perpetuation of a particular form of government.

It was not now a question of nation against nation, but of race against race. The fierce flood of war had swept away all smaller distinctions. It was necessary to rise to the altitude of the problem of the government, not of nations, but of the world. Was the genius of the East or of the West to shape the future destinies of the human race? That was the mighty problem of which the events of the next few weeks were to work out the solution, for when the sun set on the Field of Armageddon the fate of Humanity would be fixed for centuries to come.

CHAPTER LXII.

AN ENVOY OF DELIVERANCE.

FROM the time that the Tsar had received the conditional declaration of war from the President of the Anglo-Saxon Federation in America to nightfall on the 29th of November, when the surrender of the capital of the British Empire was considered to be a matter of a few days only, the Commander-in-Chief of the forces of the League was absolutely in the dark, not only as to the actual intentions of the Terrorists, if they had any, but also as to the doings of his allies in America.

According to the stipulations arranged between himself and the confidential agent of the American Government, the blockading flotilla of dynamite cruisers ought to have sailed from America as soon as the cypher message containing the news of the Battle of Dover reached New York. The message had been duly sent, via Queenstown and New York, and had been acknowledged in the usual way by the Federation agent at the other end of the cable which had been re-connected for the sole use of the President. This accounted for the fact that no further reply had come to it, and will explain why a month had elapsed without the appearance of the promised squadron.

Other messages had been sent to which no reply had been received, and a swift French cruiser, which had been launched at Brest since the Battle of Dover, had been despatched across the Atlantic to discover the reason of this strange silence. She had gone, but she had never returned. The Atlantic highway appeared to be barred by some invisible force, no vessels came from the westward, and those which started from the east where never heard of again.

His Majesty had treated the summons of the President of the Federation with silent contempt, just as such a victorious autocrat might have been expected to do. True, he knew the terrific power wielded by the Terrorists through their aerial fleet, and he had an uncomfortable conviction, which refused to be entirely stifled, that in the days to come he would have to reckon with the same fleet.

But that a member of the Terrorist brotherhood could by any possible means have placed himself at the head of any body of men sufficiently numerous or well-disciplined to make them a force to be seriously reckoned with in military warfare, his Majesty had never for a moment believed.

And, more than this, however disquieting might be the uncertainty due to the ominous silence on the other side of the Atlantic, and the non-arrival of the expected fleet, there stood the great and significant fact that the army of the League had been permitted, without molestation either from the Terrorists, or the Federation in whose name they had presumed to declare war upon him, not only to destroy what remained of the British fleet, but to completely invest the very capital of Anglo-Saxondom itself.

All this had been done; the sacred soil of Britain itself had been violated by the invading hosts; the army of defence had been slowly, and at a tremendous sacrifice of life on both sides, forced back from line after line, and position after position, into the city itself; his batteries were raining their hail of shot and shell from the heights round London, and his aerostats were hurling ruin from the sky upon the crowded millions locked up in the beleaguered space; and yet the man who had presumed to tell him that the hour in which he set foot on British soil would be the last of his Empire had done absolutely nothing to interrupt the march of conquest.

From this it will be seen that Alexander Romanoff was at least as completely in the dark as to the possible course of the events of the near future as was the King of England himself, shut up in his capital and cut off from all communication from the rest of the world.

On the morning of the 29th of November there was held at the Prime Minister's rooms in Downing Street a Cabinet Council, presided over by the King in person. After the Council had remained for about an hour in earnest consultation, a stranger was admitted to the room in which they were sitting.

The reader would have recognised him in a moment as Maurice Colston, otherwise Alexis Mazanoff, for he was dressed almost exactly as he had been on that memorable night, just thirteen months before, when he made the acquaintance of Richard Arnold on the Thames Embankment.

Well-dressed, well-fed, and perfectly at ease, he entered the Council Chamber without any aggressive assumption, but still with the quiet confidence of a man who knows that he is practically master of the situation. How he had even got into London, beleaguered as it was on every side in such fashion that no one could get out of it without being seen and shot by the besiegers, was a mystery, but how he could have in his possession, as he had, a despatch dated thirty-six hours previously in New York was a still deeper mystery, and upon neither of these points did he make the slightest attempt to enlighten the members of the British Cabinet.

All that he said was that he was the bearer of a message from the President of the Anglo-Saxon Federation in America, and that he was instructed to return that night to New York with such answer as the British Government might think fit to make to it. It was this message that had been the subject of the deliberations of the Council before his admission, and its nett effect was as follows.

It was now practically certain, indeed proved to demonstration, that the forces at the command of the British Government were not capable of coping with those brought against them by the commanders of the League, and that, therefore, Britain, if left to her own resources, must inevitably succumb and submit to such terms as her conquerors might think fit to impose upon her.

The choice before the British Government thus lay between surrender to her foreign enemies, whose objects were well known to be dismemberment of the Empire and the reduction of Great Britain to the rank of a third-class Power—to say nothing of the payment of a war-indemnity which could not fail to be paralysing—and the consent of those who controlled the destinies of the mother country to accept a Federation of the whole Anglo-Saxon race, to waive the merely national idea in favour of the racial one, and to permit the Executive Council of the Federation to assume those governmental functions which were exercised at present by the King and the British Houses of Parliament.

In a word, the choice lay between conquest by a league of foreign Powers and the merging of Britain into the Federation of the English-speaking peoples of the world.

If the former choice were taken the only prospect possible under the condition of things was a further enormous sacrifice of human life on the side of both Britain and its enemies, a gigantic loss in money, the crippling of British trade and commerce, and then a possible—nay, probable—social revolution to which the message distinctly pointed.

If the latter choice were taken the forces of the Federation would be at once brought into the field against those of the League, the seige of London would be raised, the power of the invaders would be effectually broken for ever, and the stigma of conquest finally wiped away.

It is only just to record the fact that in this supreme crisis of British history the man who most strongly insisted upon the acceptance of the terms which he had previously, as he now confessed in the most manly and outspoken fashion, rejected in ignorance of the true situation of affairs, was the man who believed that he would lose a crown by accepting them.

When the Ambassador of the Federation had been presented to the Council, the King rose in his place and handed to him with his own hands a sealed letter, saying as he did so:

"Mr. Mazanoff, I am still to a great extent in ignorance as to the inexplicable combination of events which has made it necessary for me to return this affirmative answer to the message of which you are the bearer. I am, however, fully aware that the Earl of Alanmere, whose name I have seen at the foot of this document with the most profound astonishment, is in a position to do what he says.

"The course of events has been exactly that which he predicted. I know, too, that whatever causes may have led him to unite himself to those known as the Terrorists, he is an English nobleman and a man to whom falsehood or bad faith is absolutely impossible. In your marvellous aerial fleet I know also that he wields the only power capable of being successfully opposed to those terrible machines which have wrought such havoc upon the fleets and armies not only of Britain, but of Europe.

"After all, the first duty of a Constitutional King is not to himself and his dynasty, but to his country and his people, and therefore I feel that it will be better for me and mine to be citizens of a free Federation of the English-speaking peoples, and of the nations to which Britain has given birth, than the titular sovereign and Royal family of a conquered country, holding the mockery of Royalty on the sufferance of their conquerors.

"Tell Lord Alanmere from me that I now accept the terms he has offered as President of the Anglo-Saxon Federation, first, because at all hazards I would see Britain delivered from her enemies, and, secondly, because I have chosen rather to be an English gentleman without a crown, than to wear a crown which, after all, would only be a gift from my conquerors."

Edward VII. spoke with visible emotion, but with a dignity which even Mazanoff, little and all as he respected the name of king, felt himself compelled to recognise and respect. He took the letter with a bow that was more one of reverence than of courtesy, and as he put it into the breast-pocket of his coat, he said:

"The President will receive your Majesty's reply with as genuine pleasure as I shall experience in giving it to him. Though I am a Russian, without a drop of English blood in my veins, I have always looked upon the British race as the real bulwark of freedom, and I rejoice that the King of England has not permitted either tradition or personal feeling to stand in the way of the last triumph of the Anglo-Saxon race.

"As long as the English language is spoken your Majesty's name will be held in greater honour for this sacrifice which you make to-day than will that of any other English king for the greatest triumph of arms ever achieved in the history of your country.

"I must now take my leave, for I must be in New York to-morrow night. I have your word that I shall not be watched or followed after I leave here. Hold the city for six days more at all costs, and on the seventh at the latest the seige shall be raised and the enemies of Britain destroyed in their own entrenchments."

So saying, the envoy of the Federation bowed once more to the King and the astonished members of his council, and was escorted to the door.

Once in the street he strode away rapidly through Parliament Street and the Strand, then up Drury Lane, until he reached the door of a mean-looking house in a squalid court, and entering this with a latchkey, disappeared. In half-an hour he emerged a seedy, half-starved looking individual, muffled from head to heel in a long shabby ulster, and made his way northward by Gray's Inn Road towards Chalk Farm.

Three hours later a Russian soldier of the line, wearing an almost imperceptible knot of red ribbon in one of the button-holes of his tunic, passed through the Russian lines on Hampstead Heath unchallenged by the sentries, and made his way northward to Northaw Wood, which he reached soon after nightfall.

Within half-an-hour the Ithuriel rose from the midst of a thick clump of trees like a grey shadow rising into the night, and darted southward and upward at such a speed that the keenest eyes must soon have lost sight of her from the earth.

She passed over the beleaguered city at a height of nearly ten thousand feet, and then swept sharply round to the eastward. She stopped immediately over the lights of Sheerness, and descended to within a thousand feet of the dock in which could be seen the detachment of the French submarine vessels lying waiting to be sent on their next errand of destruction.

As soon as those on board her had made out the dock clearly she ascended a thousand feet and went about half a mile to the southward. From that position she poured a rapid hail of shells into the dock, which was instantly transformed into a cavity vomiting green flame and fragments of iron and human bodies. In five minutes nothing was left of the dock or its contents but a churned-up swamp of muddy water and shattered stone-work.

Then, her errand so far accomplished, the air-ship sped away to the south-westward, and within an hour she had destroyed in like fashion the submarine squadron in the Government dock at Portsmouth, and was winging her way westward to New York with the reply of the King of England to the President of the Federation.

CHAPTER LXIII.

THE EVE OF ARMAGEDDON.

WHEN the news of the destruction of the two divisions of the submarine squadron reached the headquarters of the League on the evening of the 29th, it would have been difficult to say whether anger or consternation most prevailed among the leaders. A council of war was hurriedly summoned to discuss an event which it was impossible to look upon as anything less than a calamity.

The destruction which had been wrought was of itself disastrous enough, for it deprived the League of the chief means by which it had destroyed the British Fleet, and kept command of the sea. But even more terrible than the actual destruction was the unexpected suddenness with which the blow had been delivered.

For five months, that is to say from the recapture of the Lucifer at Aberdeen, the Tzar and his coadjutors had seen nothing of the operations of the Terrorists, and now, without a moment's warning, this apparently omnipresent and yet almost invisible force had struck once more with irresistible effect, and instantly vanished back into the mystery out of which it had come.

Who could tell when the next blow would fall, or in what shape the next assault would be delivered? In the presence of such enemies, invisible and unreachable, the commanders of the League, to their rage and disgust, felt themselves, on the eve of their supreme victory, as impotent as a man armed with a sword would have felt in front of a Gatling gun.

Consternation naturally led to divided councils. The French and Italian commanders were for an immediate general assault on London at all hazards, and the enforcement of terms of surrender at the point of the sword. The Tsar, on the other hand, insisted on the pursuance of the original policy of reduction by starvation, as he rightly considered that, great as the attacking force was, it would be practically swamped amidst the infuriated millions of the besieged, and that, even if the assault were successful, the loss of life would be so enormous that the conquest of the rest of Britain—which in such a case would almost certainly rise to a man—would be next door to impossible.

He, however, so far yielded as to agree to send a message to the King of England to arrange terms of surrender, if possible at once, in order to save further bloodshed, and then, if these terms were rejected, to prepare for a general assault on the seventh day from then.

These terms were accepted as a compromise, and the next morning the bombardment ceased, both from the land batteries and the air. At daybreak on the 30th an envoy left the Tsar's headquarters in one of the war-balloons, flying a flag of truce, and descended in Hyde Park. He was received by the King in council in Buckingham Palace, and, after a lengthy deliberation, an answer was returned to the effect that on condition the bombardment ceased for the time being, London would be surrendered at noon on the 6th of December if no help had by that time arrived from the other cities of Britain. These terms, after considerable opposition from General le Gallifet and General Cosenz, the Italian commander-in-chief, were adopted and ratified at noon that day, almost at the very moment that Alexis Mazanoff was presenting the reply of the King of England to the President of the Federation in New York.

As the relief expedition had been fully decided upon, whether the British Government recognised the Federation or not, everything was in readiness for an immediate start as soon as the Ithuriel brought definite news as to the acceptation or rejection of the President's second offer. For the last seven weeks the ten dockyards of the east coast of America, and of Halifax in Nova Scotia, had been thronged with shipping and swarming with workmen and sailors.

All the vessels which had been swept off the Atlantic by the war storm, and which were of sufficient size and speed to take part in the expedition, had been collected at these eleven ports. Whole fleets of liners of half-a-dozen different nationalities which had been laid up since the establishment of the blockade, were now lying alongside the quays taking in vast quantities of wheat and miscellaneous food-stuffs which were being poured into their holds from the glutted markets of America and Canada. Every one of these vessels was fitted up as a troopship, and by the time all arrangements were complete, more than a thousand vessels, carrying on an average twelve hundred men each, were ready to take the sea.

In addition to these there was a fleet of warships as yet unscathed by shot or shell, consisting of thirty battleships, a hundred and ten cruisers, armoured and unarmoured, and the flotilla of dynamite cruisers which had been constructed by the late Government at the expense of the Capitalist Ring. There were no less than two hundred of these strange but terribly destructive craft, the lineal descendants of the Vesuvius, which, as the naval reader will remember, was commissioned in 1890.

They were double-hulled vessels built on the whale-back plan, and the compartments between the inner and outer hull could be wholly or partially filled with water. When they were entirely filled the hull sank below the surface, leaving nothing as a mark to an enemy save a platform standing ten feet above the water. This platfom, constructed throughout of six-inch nickel-steel, was of oval shape, a hundred feet long and thirty broad in its greatest diameter, and carried the heavily armoured wheel-house and conning-tower, two funnels, six ventilators, and two huge pneumatic guns, each seventy-five feet long, working on pivots nearly amidships.

These weapons with an air-charge of three hundred atmospheres would throw four hundred pounds of dynamite to a distance of three miles with such accuracy that the projectile would invariably fall within a space of twenty feet square. The guns could be discharged once a minute, and could thus hurl 48,000 lbs. of dynamite an hour upon a hostile fleet or fortifications.

Each cruiser also carried two under-water torpedo tubes ahead and two astern. The funnels emitted no smoke, but merely supplied draught to the petroleum furnaces, which burned with practically no waste and developed a head of steam which drove the long submerged hulls through the water at a rate of thirty-two knots, or more than thirty-six miles an hour.

Such was the enormous naval armament, manned by nearly a hundred thousand men, which hoisted the Federation flag at one o'clock on the afternoon of the 30th of November, when orders were telegraphed north and south from Washington to get ready for sea. Two hours later the vast flotilla of warships and transports had cleared American waters, and was converging towards a point indicated by the intersection of the 41st parallel of latitude with the 40th meridian of longitude.

At this ocean rendezvous the divisions of the fleet and its convoys met and shaped their course for the mouth of the English Channel. They proceeded in column of line abreast three deep, headed by the dynamite cruisers, after which came the other warships which had formed the American Navy, and after these again came the troopships and transports properly protected by cruisers on their flanks and in their rear.

The commander of every warship and transport had the most minute instructions as to how he was to act on reaching British waters, and what these were will become apparent in due course. The weather was fairly good for the time of year, and, as there was but little danger of collision on the now deserted waters of the Atlantic, the whole flotilla kept at full speed all the way. As, however, its speed was necessarily limited by that of its slowest steamer until the scene of action was reached, it was after midnight on the 5th of December when its various detachments had reached their appointed stations on the English coast.

At the entrance of the English Channel and St. George's Channel a few scouting cruisers, flying French, Russian, and Italian colours, had been run down and sunk by the dynamite cruisers. Strict orders had been given by Tremayne to destroy everything flying a hostile flag, and not to permit any news to be taken to England of the approach of the flotilla.

The Federation was waging a war, not merely of conquest and revenge, but of extermination, and no mercy was to be shown to its enemies, who had shown none in their march of victory from one end of Europe to another.

While the Federation fleet had been crossing the Atlantic other events no less important had been taking place in England and Scotland. The hitherto apparently inert mass of the population had suddenly awakened out of its lethargy. In town and country alike men forsook their daily avocations as if by one consent. As in America, artisans, pitmen, clerks, and tradesmen, were suddenly transformed into soldiers, who drilled, first in squads of ten, and then in hundreds and thousands, and finally in tens of thousands, all uniformed alike in rough grey breeches and tunics, with a knot of red ribbon in the button-hole, and all armed with rifle, bayonet, and revolver, which they seemed to handle with a strange and ominous familiarity.

All the railway traffic over the island was stopped, and the rolling-stock collected at the great stations along the lines to London, and at the same time all the telegraph wires communicating with the south and east were cut. As day after day passed, signs of an intense but strongly suppressed excitement became more and more visible all over the provinces, and especially in the great towns and cities.

In London very much the same thing had happened. Hundreds of thousands of civilians vanished during those seven days of anxious waiting for the hour of deliverance, and in their place sprang up orderly regiments of grey-clad soldiers, who saw the red knot in each other's button-holes, and welcomed each other as comrades unknown before.

To the surprise of the commanders of the regular army, orders had been issued by the King that all possible assistance was to be rendered to these strange legions, which had thus so suddenly sprung into existence; and the result was that when the sun set on the 5th of December, the twenty-first day of the total blockade of London, the beleaguered space contained over two millions of armed men, hungering both for food and vengeance, who, like the five millions of their fellow-countrymen outside London, were waiting for a sign from the sky to fling themselves upon the entrapped and unsuspecting invader.

That night countless eyes were upturned throughout the length and breadth of Britain to the dun pall of wintry cloud that overspread the land. Yet so far, so perfect was the discipline of this gigantic host, not a sign of overt hostile movement had been made, and the commanders of the armies of the League looked forward with exulting confidence to the moment, now only a few hours distant, when the capital of the British Empire, cut off from all help, should be surrendered into their hands in accordance with the terms agreed upon.

When night fell the Ithuriel was floating four thousand feet above Aberdeen. Arnold and Natasha, wrapped in warm furs, were standing on deck impatiently watching the sun sinking down over the sea of clouds which lay between them and the earth.

"There it goes at last!" exclaimed Natasha, as the last of the level beams shot across the cloud-sea and the rim of the pale disc sank below the surface of the vapoury ocean. "The time that we have waited and worked for so long has come at last. This is the eve of Armageddon! Who would think it, floating up here above the clouds and beneath those cold, calmly shining stars! And yet the fate of the whole world is trembling in the balance, and the doings of the next twenty-four hours will settle the destiny of mankind for generations to come. The hour of the Revolution has struck at last——"

"And therefore it is time that the Angel of the Revolution should give the last signal with her own hand!" said Arnold, seized with a sudden fancy. "Come, you shall start the dynamo yourself."

VISITOR: "And who are you, my little man?"

Little Boy (with conscious pride): "I'm the baby's brother."

"Do you believe that woman is man's equal?"

"Well, that depends upon who the man is and who the woman is."

"You weren't at the club last night."

"No. Heard a lecture."

"On what."

"'Husbands Who Are Never at Home,' by my wife."

"MAMMA," said three-year-old Flossie, "didn't Mrs. Jones say I got my eyes from you?"

"Yes, dear," was the reply.

"And did you used to have four eyes, mamma?" queried the little miss.

CLERK: "What do you wish, ma'am?"

Mrs. O'Flartye: "Oi want to sae some mirrors fit to give as a Christmas gift."

Clerk: "Hand mirrors?"

Mrs. O'Flartye: "No; some thot ye kin sae yer face in."

"THEY seem to be having a lot of accidents on these ocean steamers," said old Mrs. Spriggins, putting down the evening paper.

"What's happened now?" asked Spriggins.

"One of 'em's broke her record," said Mrs. Spriggins.

SOMETHING FOR THE CHILDREN.

When children meet at birthday and other parties, the hostess is naturally anxious to provide the most suitable and acceptable fare. Children do not require heavy meat food, yet they need variety, and the mother would do well to secure — among other appetising things—a supply of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. These excellent Jellies are refreshing and cooling and also nourishing. Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are flavoured with ripe fruit juices, expressed by the firm themselves from the fresh fruit. Their sale and popularity are ever increasing. It is merit that does it all, the merit that takes pains to do the best. Children like Chivers' Jellies—there is no doubt about that. Put it to the vote where they have been used and the "Ayes" have it unanimously. The Medical Press, after careful analysis, says: "Chivers' Jellies are to be commended for the delicacy of their flavour and for their absolute purity. The Woman's Signal gives this testimony: "Chivers' Jellies can be confidently recommended, they are perfectly pure, absolutely clear and pleasant to look at on the table, and the flavour is simply perfect." The Christian World says: "In these village industries there is no room for deception. You must turn out a genuine article if you would defy competition, and this is why the firm in question are now at the top of the tree."

"IT IS A BADGE OF COURAGE."

Mr. Millward says he got low-spirited. I don't wonder. If anything on the face of the earth will "take it out of" a man, that kind of experience may be depended on to do it.

It isn't that he was confined to his house for eleven weeks. That was dull enough, but no man with pluck and mental resources need let the mere monotony of it weigh heavily on his nerves. Not in this age and country anyway, with the comforts of home around him and the portable helps of civilisation to draw upon.

"There is no man," says an eminent medical authority, "to whom the grave seems so near and death so terrible as to the male adolescent dyspeptic. He runs the gamut of fancied disease, often selecting the most serious and the least likely. Every time his pulse flutters he is sure he has heart disease, and he thinks of an attack of vertigo as a warning of approaching insanity. Fears and anxieties gather about him like clouds over the setting sun, and his courage oozes out like that of an imaginative child who is obliged to pass a churchyard after dark. In short, the depressing influence of dyspepsia upon the mind is far in excess of the actual danger to strength or to life involved in the complaint itself."

All of which is true, and explains in good part our correspondent's low state of feeling. But (as all doctors know) the ailment called dyspepsia is dangerous as well as depressing. It does more than threaten and scold—it hits hard enough to kill. For dyspepsia, as its name implies, is a disease of the food system, and that, practically, includes every organ and function of the body. Therefore, almost any disease which carries men off may have been born in a languid stomach and reared to a vicious maturity amid the sloughs and poisons of chronic dyspepsia.

As for Mr. Millward, his was a common experience; there are so many millions exactly like it between Berwick and Dover.

"It was in the spring of 1893," he says, "that my health began to give way. My strength and energy appeared to lapse from me without any reason, so far as I could see. I had more or less pain and weight at the chest, especially after eating; and I ate little enough, as I had no appetite worth calling by that name. There was a vile taste in my mouth, and I was constantly spitting up phlegm and bitter stuff that came into my throat from my stomach. I noticed, too, that what I did eat did me no good—it did not strengthen me at all. In spite of all we could do, and the medicines I took, I got weaker and weaker, until I was compelled to give up my work, and, as you may put it, make a business of being ill.

"You can better understand how bad I was when I tell you that I was confined to the house for eleven weeks, continually taking medicines of one sort and another, and hoping some of them would help me out. It was a most miserable time, and I trust it will never happen to me again.

"While I was thus a prisoner at home, taking no pleasure or comfort in anything, my wife heard of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and insisted on my trying it. More to please her than because I had any confidence in it, I got a bottle from Mr. Johnson's, at Leek, and after taking it I was better—decidedly better—and easier. I went on using the Syrup, as you might suppose, and in a few weeks I was a well man—something I never expected to be. My natural strength came back, and I was out of the house and at work once more, to my own surprise and that of all who knew me. I shall require no urging to recommend Mother Seigel's Syrup every time I meet with anybody suffering from dyspepsia. It is a badge of courage. With my health I recovered my spirits and energy, and now enjoy my meals, my work, and good company."—Matthew Millward, Grindon, near Leek, Staffs.

CADBURY'S COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE, THEREFORE BEST.

THE FOOD VALUE OF COCOA.

In the course of a lecture on Cocoa, delivered at the recent Grocery Exhibition, by Dr. Goodfellow, of the East London Technical College, and the official Analyst of the Exhibition, the lecturer said:

"Cocoa when properly prepared is a most valuable article of food. Cocoa, while being a slight stimulant to the jaded system, is at the same time a nourishing food of the highest value and importance. It may be made with care a perfect food in itself, supplying all the constituents required by the animal economy for health and strength, and the increasing demand for cocoa indicates that the public are beginning to appreciate its many admirable qualities as a food beverage.

"The modern tendency to interfere with the natural properties and constituents of such a valuable food as cocoa is deeply to be deplored. The removal of the fibre and the excess of fat is all that is necessary to produce the most perfect food beverage known to physiologists, and the best cocoa, from the dietetic standpoint, is undoubtedly that which is perfectly pure, without addition of any kind whatsoever.

"Perhaps the most novel departure of late years is the addition of kola to cocoa. Kola is a powerful drug, and contains besides caffeine other potent nerve stimulants of an unknown character.

"It is impossible to defend on hygienic grounds the addition of such a powerful drug to an article of daily consumption, and though under medical advice, and in exceptional cases, the increase of nerve stimulating properties which kola confers on cocoa may be beneficial, yet to the masses such uncontrolled drugging may be followed by serious consequences.

"Pure cocoa is so rich in good dietetic properties that to interfere with the normal proportions of the food principles is to notably decrease its nutritive value, and I strongly urge the exclusive use of pure cocoa solely in the interests of public health."

HOW THE VICOMTE WON HIS WIFE.

The Marquis de Rochemont and the Baron von Sternberg were deadly enemies, therefore it was the more unfortunate that Sternberg Castle should have been situated on a hill which overlooked the Chateau Rochemont. Some people thought that this very thing might be the cause of the ill-feeling which existed between them, and that the Marquis resented being looked down upon by a German baron, but then other people always do know so much more about one's private affairs than one does oneself.

The true cause of their enmity was to be found in a story which reached back two hundred years, when the great-grandfather of the Frenchman had been one of the favourite courtiers of the Grand Monarch, whilst the Baron's ancestor at the same period had followed the despicable calling of a paid spy, and being caught in the act of conveying some private correspondence of a compromising nature, (which had been stolen from Her Majesty's secretaire) Monsieur le Marquis had, to prevent any scandal, and at the Queen's request, killed him with his own hand.

This blot on his escutcheon the Baron could not forget, nor for the matter of that did the Marquis.

There were two ways of reaching Sternberg Castle, one wound up along the mountain side, the other and shorter route being through a forest and up a steep path. This latter however was never used by the Sternbergs, for the forest formed part of the Rochemont domain.

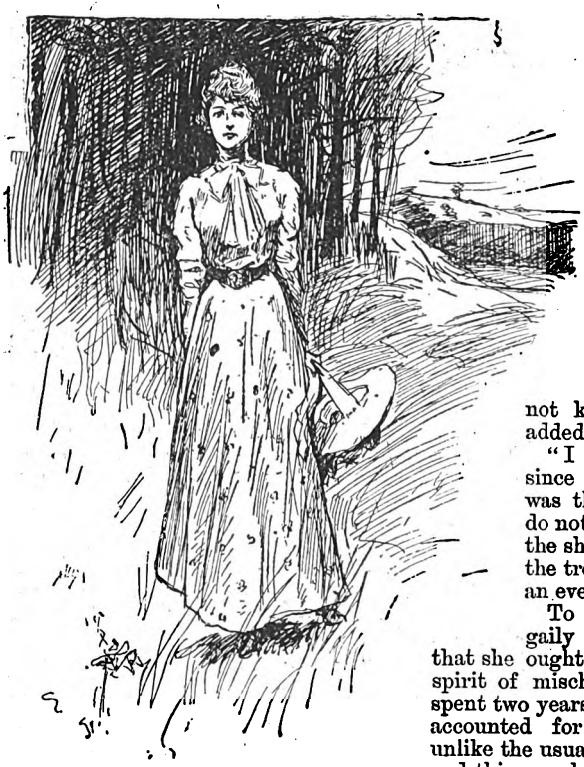
In one respect the Marquis and the Baron were alike, each had an only child, and as fate willed it, the Marquis had a son, whilst the German's family was represented by the Baroness Ernestine. Curiously enough, though such near neighbours, it chanced these two had never met, though now Henri was of age, and Ernestine had almost reached her eighteenth year.

The Marquis was a student by nature, never happy save when devouring musty records, and his ineptitude for business affairs had resulted in his being greatly imposed upon.

Henri de Beauville had just reached home after a tour round the world, found that his father's property needed a master's eye, and was wondering whether he could ever bear the monotony of living ten months in the year at Rochemont, as he lay one day, soon after his return, under one of the pine trees in the forest.

Whilst thus brooding, he heard a sound which made him start; it was a woman's voice, a pure soprano singing "Elizabeth's Song of Greeting" out of Tannhäuser.

Now Henri was devoted to music, and in his many travels he missed few opportunities of attending any of the great opera houses, yet he was fain to acknowledge that never before had he heard Wagner so exquisitely rendered, as by this unknown stranger. He almost feared to breathe lest the spell should be broken.



Presently the singer came into view.

Presently the singer came into view; she was a tall, slender girl with wonderful golden hair and eyes which looked from under dark lashes with the far-away gaze of one inspired. From whence had she come, this stranger, and how could he attract her notice? Hardly had this thought come into his mind, than Fortune seemed to favour him, for at that moment she stumbled against a root in the path and fell. He darted forward and lifted her from the ground. She started violently and appeared filled with terror, then with the quick reaction of a child gave vent to a peal of laughter, which was if possible more bewitching than her song.

As she freed herself from his arms and quickly recovered her composure, she asked to whom she was indebted for the timely aid she had received.

"Henri de Beauville at your service," answered the young Vicomte. At these apparently harmless words Henri was distressed to see another startled look in those wonderful eyes.

"Ah, it is clear you do not know who I am, or you would not have aided me so kindly, Vicomte. I am Ernestine von Sternberg, the daughter of your father's enemy."

"Impossible!" ejaculated the young man horror-struck, for with the impulsiveness of youth he had already made up his mind that this was the one woman in the world for him, yet the family feud—bah! he cared not, these things could not last for ever. And after all only the two families knew of the skeleton in the Sternberg cupboard, so quickly recovering himself, he added:

"Baroness, now that I know your name, let me repeat that now and ever I am at your service."

Ernestine laughingly gave him her hand, which he raised to his lips with all the grace of a scion of generations of courtiers. For her part she was charmed at this encounter, she had so often heard of the Vicomte, but never imagined him like this, why, he was more like an Englishman if it had not been for his manners.

"I shall not dare to tell my father that I have seen you," she went on, "he has forbidden me ever to enter the wood, but it looked so cool and inviting this hot afternoon, and indeed I did not know you were home," she added playfully.

"I am very glad you did not, since it has led to our meeting," was the grave reply, "but please do not let me drive you away from the shade, or I shall feel that I am the trespasser. Let me show you an even cooler retreat."

To this engaging invitation she gaily acquiesced, her conviction that she ought not to, being overcome by a spirit of mischief. He found that she had spent two years at an English school, which accounted for her natural manners, so unlike the usual primness of German girls, and this gave her an added charm in his eyes.

Indeed they found they had so many things to talk about, that it was an hour later when they parted, not however before Henri had begged Ernestine not to discontinue her walks on his account.

She went off with a merry twinkle in her blue eyes, muttering to herself what sounded very like, "Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou Romeo?" but of this Henri could not be sure.

When he reached the Chateau, he acquainted his father with his intention of giving up travelling for the present at any rate, and settling down to overhaul the estate.

The Marquis was delighted, and after thanking him, added:

"Henri, my boy, you must marry, for remember the hopes of the House of Rochemont centre upon you."

"Well, father, what do you say to my calling on the Baron von Sternberg, and asking for his daughter's hand? The two properties would go well together," suggested Henri.

"Henri de Beauville, your jest is misplaced, for you know that never will a living Sternberg come under my roof. A Rochemont mates not with the descendant of a spy," and the old man's voice shook with anger.

This showed the Vicomte pretty plainly that should he in time be able to win Ernestine, stratagem would have to be exercised in order that his father might recognize the marriage.

In spite of their dread that their respective parents might discover their movements, and perhaps on Ernestine's side because of the added zest it gave, the young people continued to meet in the wood daily, until the time arrived that Henri felt he could no longer hold his peace, but must proclaim his love.

So it came to pass that one September afternoon, about three weeks from the day they first met, as they wandered through the woods side by side, Henri poured out his love for her, and asked her to become his wife. Very handsome he looked as he stood there before her, the last gleams of the sun playing on his fair hair, and silhouetting the manly form against the dark green of the forest trees. So at least thought Ernestine, as she listened to his passionate words. There was a pause and then the girl looked up, right into her lover's eyes, and let him read his answer in her own, and after that there was for a space, a silence too eloquent for words.

"Henri," at last said Ernestine, looking up again, "I can never tell my father, he would never forgive me, and nothing would make him consent to our marriage. Why he is so bitter against your family I cannot think, and he will never tell me."

"Quite right of him darling, it's an old story dating back two hundred years, surely it has lived in the memory of the two houses long enough. But, dear heart, I am not one whit better off than you are, for my father has vowed that never shall the Baroness Ernestine von Sternberg cross his threshold alive," added Henri ruefully.

"What are we to do then? Ah! Henri, I cannot bid you farewell, my love, for you are part of my very existence," and the girl nestled closer in his arms.

"My little sweetheart, do you think that I will let all the fathers in the world come between us? No, indeed, we must bring diplomacy to bear upon the case. Listen!" and he unfolded to her the elaborate plan he had thought out during the last few days, when he hardly yet dared to hope that he might win her love.

"It is a great thing to ask of you, darling, but I think it is the only plan by which my father can be induced to recognise you as my wife. Are you brave enough to try?"

"Henri, I love you," was the girl's only reply.

Apparently the Vicomte found it a satisfactory one, for they agreed to carry out their scheme a few days later, when the two friends he had summoned to Rochemont should have arrived.

So they parted with a last farewell till the next evening should come, when Henri would meet her to tell her further of the plot he proposed and to make the final arrangements.

L'Abbé Beaupaire had formerly been a tutor of the Vicomte's, and loved him dearly, so that when the letter from Henri reached him asking for his help and a visit to the château, he immediately repaired thither with all speed.

As to his other friend, Edward Cary, the young doctor was delighted at the prospect of staying at an old French château, and renewing his friendship with Henri de Beauville, in whose company he had passed many a pleasant hour in London. M. le Marquis welcomed his son's friends with his own courtly grace, and then begged them to excuse him for that evening as he was in the midst of a translation of the Assyrian inscription on a tablet recently brought him from the East.

Nothing could have been better. The Vicomte explained how matters stood between himself and Ernestine, and entreated his friends' aid in carrying out his plot.

The Abbé listened gravely, asking a question in his keen way at such times as the plan seemed too involved, whilst the younger man waited for him to speak first.

"Henri, my son, is this lady a good Catholic?"

"Surely you know had she not been, my father, I had not dared ask you here to marry us," replied the Vicomte with a smile.

"It is well, and surely to heal this feud would be a good deed," said the priest thoughtfully, as he looked up at this eager boy. "Yes," he said at last, "I am willing to play my part in this ghastly farce, but what says our friend here?" and he turned towards the Englishman.

"Henri, old man," answered the Doctor, "I like your spirit, and will declare you mad till I am black in the face, since that seems to be the part assigned to me. But the Baroness, who will prepare her for her weird betrothal?"

"You and I between us, Ted. Have you any drug, which will to all appearance render her dead for the space of half an hour?"

"Yes I have, and luckily it happens to be in the medicine chest I always carry about with me. But won't the lady object to a stranger experimenting on her?"

"Not when that stranger happens to be my friend. Beside, she approves of my plan, and places herself entirely in our hands, darling that she is," added the Vicomte fervently.

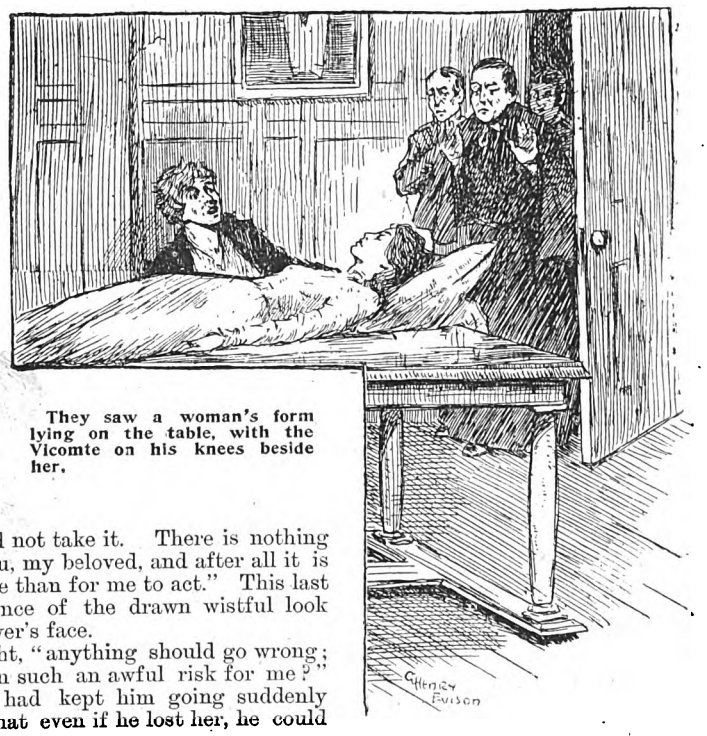
So it chanced that two days later, the Vicomte and his English guest shouldered their guns and went into the forest.

There they were met by the Baroness, looking lovelier than ever in a dress of the finest white embroidered muslin, confined at her waist by a belt of solid silver, made like a curb chain. She was paler than was her wont, the tension of what she was about to do, having told upon her nerves.

When Henri introduced her to Edward Cary, that gentleman came to the conclusion that his friend had shown uncommonly good taste in his selection of the future Marquise.

After the greeting was over, Edward and the Abbé, who had joined them, discreetly walked on, leaving the two lovers together.

"Henri, is there really no other way?" the girl asked anxiously. "But no, if there were I could not take it. There is nothing I would not dare for you, my beloved, and after all it is far harder for you to see than for me to act." This last she added in consequence of the drawn wistful look which came over her lover's face.



They saw a woman's form lying on the table, with the Vicomte on his knees beside her.

"Suppose," he thought, "anything should go wrong; can I really let her run such an awful risk for me?" The excitement which had kept him going suddenly collapsed, and he felt that even if he lost her, he could not carry out his plan.

As his courage failed, hers, with true womanliness, rose, and calling to his friends she asked that the last explanations and instructions might be given her, and the attempt made as soon as possible. In vain did Henri protest, she motioned to Dr. Cary to take no notice of him, but to proceed with what he was saying.

"We will take great care of you, Baroness. It's awfully plucky of you, I think," ended Edward, after he had made it all plain.

"Thank you, Mr. Cary, I feel sure I can trust you," replied the girl, then turning with a bright smile to her betrothed, she added "I am quite ready to be taken off by force now, if M. L'Abbé will get out of sight, but remain in earshot." The Abbé bowed and withdrew further into the wood, whilst Ted Cary murmured in low tones:

"Please, Baroness, remember that once you pass the château gates, your heart fails and you die. I shall inject the drug the moment we put you down, and the effects will last exactly half-an-hour."

Henri now besought the girl to fly with him, and on her answering with a decided negative, he motioned to his friend, and advanced to carry her off by force. In the struggle Henri's gun went off, giving him a slight flesh wound, then Edward stooped over the girl, and bound a handkerchief round her wrists, whilst the Vicomte lifted her in his arms despite her struggles and cries for aid.

No sooner had they got inside the château, than Henri having deposited his prisoner on a table, the doctor proceeded to inject the fluid, which in five minutes produced a rigidity indistinguishable from death.

Henri meantime had been divesting himself of his collar and tie, rumpling his hair, and altogether assuming the appearance of one distraught with grief.

In response to his cries and groans footsteps began to be heard, and as had been arranged the Abbé, accompanied by two servants, hurried into the room. All three held up their hands in horror as they saw a woman's form lying stark and stiff on the table, with the Vicomte on his knees beside her apparently out of his mind.

"My son, what has happened, what are you doing?" asked the priest, then as Henri vouchsafed no reply, save a groan, he turned to the Englishman for an explanation.

"Our friend has lost his heart to this lady, and meeting her in the wood, tried to persuade her to marry him, and on her refusal he seemed to lose his head, and nothing I could say or do would prevent his lifting her up in his arms and carrying her off here by force. Now, poor fellow, as you can see he is frantic, for the shock has proved too much for the girl's heart, and he has killed the one he loved best in the world."

The Abbé could scarcely speak for emotion, but inquired if they knew who the lady was.

They answered in the negative.

"Then we must let the body remain in the large hall till we have made inquiries," said the Abbé.

With great difficulty they made the Vicomte understand that they were not going to separate him from his beautiful victim for the present. The servants approached to raise the body, but their master waived them aside angrily, only consenting to let Edward help him with his sad burden.

Tenderly they bore the rigid body of the girl to the hall, a priest going to tell the Marquis of the tragedy.

Digitized by Google

They laid the fair form on a sofa, and it was thus the Marquis saw it as he followed the Abbé. Henri was crouched down on the floor beside it, muttering "Death shall not rob me of you, you shall be my bride, you shall I say."

Edward Cary stood looking on for some minutes, and then crossed over to where the Marquis was standing, and told him that he feared his son's reason would be permanently lost if his strange whim was not humoured. The old man turned helplessly to the Abbé.

"Monsieur is right, my friend. With your consent I will ease Henri's mind, by reading the marriage service over him and this lady."

"Yes, yes," cried the heartbroken father, "anything to comfort my poor boy."

The Abbé raised Henri from beside the apparent corpse, and explained to him in low tones that he would marry him as he desired, but that they did not know the girl's name.

"Ernestine von Sternberg," came the startling reply.

The Marquis made a gesture of dissent, but was soothed into acquiescence by Edward Cary, and the weird ceremonial began.

There was a pause whilst the Marquis pulled off his late wife's wedding ring from his finger, and gave it with trembling hand to the Abbé.

The doctor perceiving signs of returning animation, made a sign to the priest to get on with the service. Scarcely had Henri spoken the words making her his wife, than Ernestine's eyes opened and rested on his face. His appearance seemed to revive her memory, for when the Abbé addressed the question to her, whether she would take Henri de Beauville to be her wedded husband all the company present, excepting those who were in the secret, were electrified by hearing a faint "I will" come from her they had until that moment believed to be gone past recall. Henri slipped the ring on to her finger, and the Abbé without a moment's pause, pronounced them man and wife, before the Marquis had recovered from his astonishment sufficiently to interfere.

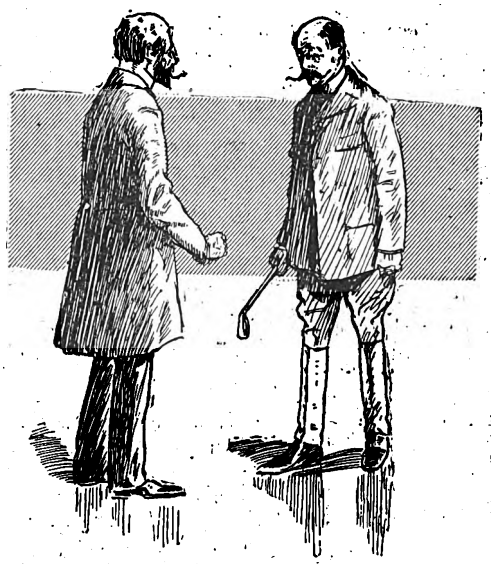
Henri still remained kneeling by her side, with a semi-dazed expression. Now the deed was done his mind seemed hardly able to grasp the fact that the great stake was over, and Ernestine indeed his wife. The girl herself was the first to recover.

"Henri," she whispered, "is it really all over, and am I indeed your wife?"

For all answer he took her in his arms, and held her there before them all. "Father," he cried, "do not be angry with me. I love Ernestine with all my heart, and could marry no other woman, but you told me she should never enter your doors alive, so we were forced to fall back upon stratagem, and now, my father, let me present you to Madame la Vicomtesse de Beauville."

For an instant the old man hesitated, then as the girl knelt at his feet in her pure white bridal robe that matched the colour of her face, he raised her gently, and taking her in his arms kissed her on the forehead, afterwards turning to his son with outstretched hand, and a smile on his proud old face, saying, "Henri, my son, I forgive you, I once was young myself, and know full well that I should have lost my heart to Madame la Vicomtesse, had I chanced to meet her then,"—this with a courtly bow to Ernestine.

"Ah, father, you are too good to us," rejoined the young man gratefully, "and you, my friends, how can I thank you for the help you gave us."



"M. le Marquis, it shall be as you wish."

A few moments later the great bell resounded through the chateau, and who should be standing outside but the Baron von Sternberg himself. Someone had seen his daughter go down to the forest, and heard the scuffle, then creeping to where the sound came from, had seen the girl carried off by force, and had fled up to the castle to carry the news.

The Marquis, taking his daughter-in-law by the hand led her to the furious Baron, who mindful only of the fact that she was alive and unhurt, clasped her to his bosom again and again.

As soon as she could speak, Ernestine turned towards her husband, and beckoned him to her side.

"Father, let me introduce you to your son."

"To my what?" exclaimed the Baron.

"Permit me to explain," here interposed the Marquis. "Both you and I, Baron, have been fairly tricked by these two young people, who it seems fell in love with each other, but since they are now united by Holy Church, as M. l'Abbé will testify, shall we not bury the hatchet of which only you, myself and my son have cognisance, and for the future strive only in friendly rivalry as to which is the more important, the perfecting of scientific discoveries, or the deciphering of ancient tablets?" for the Baron was well known in scientific circles.

Henri here put in his word.

"Father," and the bewildered Baron started at hearing such a title fall from the Vicomte's lips addressed to him. "Father, you have gained a son as well as kept a daughter, if you will have it so."

"I don't seem to have any choice left," answered Von Sternberg at length, half grimly, then turning to the Marquis he extended his hand, adding:

"M. Le Marquis, it shall be as you wish, and indeed I am sensible of the honour you have conferred on me."

"And now, gentleman, what think you of a rubber of whist, while Henri and his wife have time to talk over these wonderful events, and congratulate themselves on ending a feud which has lasted already far too long," replied the Marquis.

M. Hoey.

A CRIMINAL BARRISTER.

THIS story, in the main, is appropriated; having been published some thirty years ago. But, before branding me with the odious crime of plagiarism, I would ask the reader to hear the story to the end. Then, should he consider me deserving, let him apply the brand, burning the mark deeply, that others may avoid me in future. I shall, however, feel amply repaid, whatever the public judgment, for having been the means of giving to the world for the first time the true facts in one of the most interesting criminal cases that ever came before the courts, the dénouement to which reveals an instance of resort to the lowest depths of duplicity and perfidy in the history of crime, involving the character of one whose name was almost a household word, and whose career is cited, even to this day, as one representing all that is exemplary in that which constitutes a life of integrity, honesty and uprightness of character.

The story as it first appeared was entitled; "A Criminal Barrister; or, the Beginning of a Successful Career." Just why the author should have made use of the words "A Criminal Barrister," always remained a mystery to me, as the title could in no general way be considered appropriate to the tale. But the reading between the lines stood out like a revelation when I came into possession of the key. The story is given here, somewhat abbreviated, but the main facts are as originally written.

* * * * *

On March 13th, 1855, there was added to the large list of barrister's names outside No. 10 Pump Handle Court, that of "J. A. Baldwin," and thus marked the beginning of my legal career.

Several months passed, during which time I had not secured a single case in the courts. I began seriously to doubt the wisdom of my having chosen the law as a profession, when, as is often the case, the unexpected happened and my opportunity came.

One night in a town in Kent, which shall be nameless, a policeman heard a woman's scream in the vicinity of an archway for foot passengers only, under the railway, which here was very broad. Hastening in the direction of the alarm, the officer found near the entrance of the archway, a young man, kneeling over the prostrate form of a young woman. As he came up to them he heard the young man utter in an undertone these words:

"Oh, Helen, how I loved you, and how often you have spurned that love; but your lips will never say those cruel words again."

The woman was found to be dead and the man was arrested, charged with her murder.

The young man proved to be my old friend, George Grier. We had been at the University together and occupied adjacent rooms for over three years. I knew that Grier was innocent—utterly incapable of such a brutal, cowardly crime. Circumstances were overwhelming against him, however, but I resolved when I was asked to act in his defence to save him from paying the penalty of a crime with which he was charged.

I set to work upon the case without a shred of evidence as to his innocence, save the general good character he had always borne, and my absolute knowledge of his utter incapability of the crime.

At the coroner's inquest the following facts bearing upon the case were elicited. The woman had died instantly—the condition of the blood proving this. On the right side of the head and directly over the ear was a contusion, the result, apparently, of a blow from some blunt instrument. The body had not been robbed or otherwise disturbed and was still warm and limp when found by the policeman. Grier had been known to have sought the young lady's company, but had not been favourably received. They had quarrelled the same evening that the tragedy occurred.

Grier had been seen by a railway ganger, who recognised him, to enter the archway from the upper side a few minutes before the young woman passed through. There had been no one else seen near the spot for some little time.

The officer who effected the arrest testified as to the manner in which he discovered the crime, and the facts as previously related. He also produced a loaded cane which Grier acknowledged belonged to him and which he had carried with him at the time he was arrested. The head of the cane, it was shown, would doubtless produce just such a contusion as that found on the head of the dead woman, if used with sufficient force.

Grier acknowledged that he and the young woman had had a misunderstanding that evening, and had parted with angry words. This, he stated, also accounted for his passing through the archway alone that evening. He had always made it a practice to accompany the young woman when she was late returning home, but as their disagreement would not admit of it on this occasion, he had preceded her to the archway and waited in the vicinity until he should see that she had passed safely through.

Passing through to the lower side, he had sat down upon some planks which were lying near. While sitting there he was startled by hearing a woman scream in the archway. Suspecting it to be her for whom he was waiting, he ran to the entrance and at the same moment the young lady came running out and fell at his feet.

Thinking at first that she had swooned he had tried to restore her to consciousness, but failing in this, he had just discovered that she was dead when the officer came up. His grief at the sad discovery accounted for the words he uttered, which the officer had overheard.

The evidence produced was considered sufficient, however, and Grier was committed for trial to the assizes charged with the murder of the young woman. The trial was set down for October 15th, which left but two weeks in which to secure evidence and prepare my case.

During those two weeks I made frequent visits to the scene of the tragedy and held many consultations with my friend Grier as well as with his solicitor.

As a result of my investigations I went quietly to the office of the county analyst on the day preceding the trial, and taking him with me, went to the coroner's office. Here I related the results of my investigations, and after a consultation upon the matter, the remains of the dead girl, which had been placed in the public morturay pending the trial, were quietly examined, and an affidavit stating the results of this examination signed by the county analyst and the coroner, placed in my hands.

On the following day at the hour set for the trial the court-room was packed with eager spectators, anxious to know the out-come, as the case was completely shrouded in mystery. Scarcely a person in the entire court-room believed Grier guilty; yet the evidence was so strongly against him that no one could see how he could be acquitted.

The witnesses for the prosecution corroborated the evidence produced at the coroner's inquest, and wove a chain of circumstantial evidence about Grier which seemed certain to place his head in the hangman's noose. As the witnesses were turned over, one by one, to me for cross-examination, they were asked but one question:

"Do you know of anything derogatory to the character of the accused, prior to this charge having been made against him?"

The answers to this question were all to the effect of proving that Grier enjoyed an unblemished character. But the spectators began to grow nervous at this apparent lack of effort upon my part to break the chain of evidence which was gradually being forged about him, and were chafiing under the intense suspense.

At last the evidence for the prosecution was concluded and the time of the defence came to produce their witnesses. I rose, and facing the judge, stated with a feeling of intense earnestness and solemnity:

"My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury:

"The defence has no witnesses, save Him who witnesseth all things and judgeth all things."

As I sat down the hum of excitement rose to a clamour; the people in the court-room climbed up in their seats and pushed and jostled one another in their efforts to get a little nearer the dramatic scene.

Order being restored, the counsel for the prosecution rose and began his speech. Evidently thinking he had it all his own way, and that through my inexperience or lack of confidence I feared to make an effort in the face of the strong case of circumstantial evidence he had produced, his address was but a short one.

When he had finished I rose and told the story that had been burning in my heart for many days.

"My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury:

"Before you is a young man charged with the murder of a young woman, for whom he would have willingly yielded up his life to save from harm. Even now he stands in the shadow of the gallows whose cruel noose the prosecution would gladly tighten round his neck for a crime of which he is as innocent as the prattling babe at its mother's breast, and of which not one word of evidence has been produced to prove him guilty.

"True, they will tell you that it is circumstantial evidence; yea, evidence which is no evidence at all. Oh, humanity, whence art thou fled? When will men learn to be human? Is it meet that we should barter away a human soul upon the narrow shreds of supposition? Were it not that I have been intimately associated with this young man for many years and know him wholly incapable of the fiendish crime he is charged with, and knowing this, have laboured almost day and night since his arrest to thwart the design of those who would place the noose about his neck, his life would this day doubtless have been bartered into eternity without a twinge of compunction.

"But I thank Heaven that the facts have come into my possession which will save the life of an innocent man and spare the country the ignominy and disgrace of that most heinous crime—legal murder.

"On that memorable night when the tragedy occurred which resulted in the death of Helen Vance and the arrest of the accused before you, two lovers had had a misunderstanding. The young lady had to pass through a lonely archway at a late hour and the young man who had, previous to the quarrel, always accompanied her through this archway, because he wished to protect her from possible harm, passes through it a few minutes before the usual time for her to do so and awaits in the vicinity until she shall pass through in safety.

"A few minutes later, she enters the archway from the upper side. Being alone and the archway dark and lonely, she naturally feels timid. As she hastens through she suddenly hears footsteps following her. She screams and runs out, only to see in the dim light afforded by the gas lamp, another man rush at her from the opposite direction.

"She faints and falls to the ground. Her head strikes a sharp cobble stone and makes a contusion.

"A miniature sword which she wears as an ornament in her hat, pierces her temple, breaking off close to the skull and under the skin, which quickly closes over the puncture, leaving no tell-tale mark to show its location. The steps she heard following her in the archway, were but an echo of her own, which can be proven to anyone wishing to visit the archway and make the test. The man whom she saw as she emerged was her friend, the prisoner at the bar, who was hastening to her aid in response to her scream of terror. Here is the hilt of the little sword hat-pin, which I found firmly embedded between the cobble stones where she fell, and which has been identified by several of the dead girl's friends; and here is an affidavit, signed by the county analyst and the coroner, under date of yesterday, telling you, Gentlemen of the Jury, that if you will go to the mortuary where the casket containing the remains of the dead girl now lies, you may see the other portion of this sword firmly embedded in the temple of the corpse, a mute but indisputable witness to the fact that Helen Vance met her death by accident.

"If she had been struck on the head by a loaded cane, as claimed by the prosecution, she would have fallen upon the left side, the blow having been struck upon the right where the contusion was found, and there would have been marks on the left side to show where the head struck the rough cobble stones. On the contrary, the body when found was lying upon the right side, where both the contusion and the embedded hat-pin are to be found.

"In conclusion, my Lord and gentlemen of the jury, I wish to reiterate that not a single word of direct evidence has been produced to convict the prisoner at the bar of the murder of Helen Vance, and consequently there remains nothing for you to do but acquit him of the charge."

Amid thunderous applause I stepped up to the judge and handed him the affidavit and the broken hilt of the miniature sword. After examining both carefully for a few moments, the counsel for the prosecution was asked to close his case.

Rising to his feet the counsel stated that the prosecution was ready to let the case go to the jury as it stood. The judge instructed the jury in a few brief words, reminding them that they were to render their verdict in accordance with the facts given in evidence.

The twelve men filed into the jury room like so many grim and silent spectres. Five minutes later they returned, and upon being asked by the judge what verdict they wished to render, replied:

"Not guilty."

Amid a clamour that it was impossible to subdue, Grier was told he was a free man.

Thus ended the dramatic proceedings of my first case. Friends and strangers alike crowded about me and my friend Grier, and offered warm words of congratulation. From that day the star of my legal career was ever in the ascendant; and not many years later I found myself occupying the judge's bench in the same court where I won my first laurels.

* * * * *

This, in brief, is the story as told by Mr. Justice Baldwin some thirty years ago. But ah, what a different story reads between the lines.

During the last fifteen years of the judge's life I was his private secretary, and as such gained much information that led me to suspect that he held some secret which weighed heavily upon his mind. From ill health he was compelled to give up the bench while yet a comparatively young man. Having never married, the judge had no family to look after his personal wants, and as he grew more feeble my duties partook largely of the nature of body servant.

His mind grew weak and he would frequently wander in his thoughts, dropping fragments of strange speech now and then concerning his past, which I felt it would be wrong to encourage him to divulge, considering the weak state of his mind.

One morning some ten years ago as I entered his room, I found him sitting stark and stiff in his chair, his eyes wide open and staring fixedly at the ceiling. About him, scattered upon the floor, were the fragments of a photograph, which I found by placing the pieces together, to be that of Grier, the friend of his youth. On a small table at his side was an empty phial labelled "Prussic Acid." Beside it lay a slip of paper with these words written across it in a straggling, scrawling hand:

"Thus ends the last chapter of a Criminal Barrister." The word "Criminal" was heavily underscored in a manner strangely suggestive.

In his will he left all his property and personal effects to me, and with the will was a sealed package with instructions that it was not to be opened until five years after his death.

The five years have passed, and with them another five. The contents of that strange package have haunted my life and I have at last determined to give them to the world and thus unburden my mind of a secret that is weighing my own life down.

It was a confession, pitiful in its hopelessness, sad in its bitterness of repentance, of the double crime of shielding a known murderer from the punishment which he so richly deserved, for the purpose of furthering his own interests by making a reputation for himself.

It reviewed the history of Grier's case, stating that Grier had confessed to him that he murdered Helen Vance out of revenge for her having jilted him; that he waylaid her at the archway, and when she appeared, struck her with the loaded cane, and then to cover up his crime, drove the miniature sword into her temple, broke it off and placed the hilt between the cobble stones in a manner to make it appear she had fallen upon it; that together they had planned the whole dramatic plot, which by the power of a cunningly devised case of circumstantial evidence, cleared Grier and won a fame for himself that hung about his neck as a millstone and kindled a fire of remorse within his heart that had burned up his life with the fury of a thousand demons.

The document was signed:

"Jas. A. Baldwin,
"Criminal Barrister."

A SKETCH OF A DULL TOWN.

It was November weather, and the streets of Yawdon were standing in dense puddles of wet, that shivered as the black North-easter struck their surface, driving up the exposed level of the town.

The wind whipping the faces of the passers-by, shrieked out to its victims the meaning of winter time in England, mocking them for their inability to take wing for the sun-kissed shores of the Mediterranean, where the North-easter never blows.

If it had not been for the great fishing industry that absorbed the whole of Yawdon town, the place might well have been described in the caustic language of the porter at the Albert Docks, whose tongue is as graphic as his contempt of the place is keen.

"Lor', this yere place, was you a saying? Why it was a second thought of Mrs. Nature, when she fancied as the Thames was too cheerful looking.

"Do I like living here? Well, I don't know as how I do, leastways I ain't never bothered with folks stravaging round inquiring for houses or lodgings.

"You should have seen a gent off one of these yere P. & O. boats as got left here by mistake. Lor'! you'd a thought as I had exploded a quick match under his feet when the train came in at last, after he'd eaten all the sandwiches at the inn, and smoked his last cigar, and had nothin' to do but sit and look at the Docks."

People drifted to Yawdon sometimes, but the charity of the place was so overwhelming, that until their neighbours had grown entirely accustomed to them; the aliens were always furtively considered either to be given over to intemperance, or to be on the verge of bankruptcy—and were treated accordingly.

The town was not famous for its beauty, being of a dull red colour, with a uniform taste in the shape of its houses. And the streets that did not reek of herrings, smelt of crowded humanity living in narrow rows packed as closely together as the herrings themselves in their barrels.

But away beyond the town, where the broad valley of the waters lies, stretching for miles along the level plain of the land, there is peace and beauty.

In the summer, these waters are the haunts of grebe and coot, and rare birds that nest where the trees hang low down to the hedges of the Broads, and whisper to the bright-eyed water rats on the bank, till the whirr of a steam launch, or the shriek of a boat-load of yelling humanity from the East-end of London, sets the senses of nature jarring.

But those Broads in the winter, under the flame of the sunset sky, with the crisp touch of frost upon the naked trees; the sharp etched body of an heron cleaving its heavy flight across the mere, are a very world of loneliness.

The shiver of the reeds, the scrape of the brown branches against each other; the whistle of the wind in the sedges, are scarcely broken by the advent now and again of a slow moving barge, with bellying red sail—or the call of some woman from the bank, as she summons home the cows from the lowlying pastures.

Once there drifted to Yawdon, on the wings of circumstance or fate, a woman.

She took up her abode quietly, at the extreme end of a street that was frankly uninteresting.

Since it seemed at first that she matched the street, no one troubled themselves about her in any way. She was merely an atom of society wreckage, unprofitable to Yawdon.

In course of time, the loneliness of her life, and the constant companionship of a sorrow that was eating out her heart, drove her mad.

Discovering this, the boys of the town, filled with all the sympathy of a certain class of childhood for affliction wrecked the front of her house with well-aimed bullets of stones and mud.

Seeing that she was the centre of a persecution that did not seem likely to come to an end, she made a barricade for herself of soap boxes and matchwood, plastering up doors and windows, in the front of the cottage, with such mortar as she could procure from the road scrapings. And from thence forward she took refuge in the attics.

The sight of this extraordinary fortress, naturally lowered the rents in Murchiston Road, and several of its inhabitants, who had never known what it was to have lunatics in their own families, left for saner climes.

In the fine weather, Mrs. Longford could be seen walking in her little garden clad in a scarlet wrapper, carrying a tin shovel which she wielded as a weapon of defence in case of a sudden onslaught from the youth of Yawdon.

Sometimes she coaxed the little children into her gate—for she was harmless, and none had reason to fear her—and made them a feast on the lawn consisting of a pound of sugar, eaten out of a rare Worcester bowl, with a silver spoon, fashioned like a stork.

She spoke sometimes, but her voice was harsh, and she seemed to be always seeking for words that might express the blank misery of her eyes. But the little children of Yawdon loved her, for they alone had seen what those two attic rooms contained, store houses of secrets as they were.

Once one of the babies babbled to its mother of the toys that hung on the walls, of the whip and the rocking horse, the suit of boys clothes always kept brushed for use upon the chair, of the picture of the child above the bed, with the yellow hair and bright beautiful face.

And that happy mother, recognising a tragedy in the child's innocent story, sent her little Alsie, with a cake and a pot of jam to the barricaded house, a gift that woke the first smile in the desolate face that had rested there for many weary years.

Soldiers are not regarded with particular favour in Yawdon, especially by that particularly respectable portion of society that dwells in Murchiston Road.

But since there was a depôt in the town, Tommy Atkins was looked upon as a necessary evil, and a source of some profit to the ratepayers, though at the same time, naturally, an object of contempt.

Therefore it chanced that when a gunner in full uniform drifted up the road, it behoved everyone to turn out to look at such an unusual sight.

He must have some interest in the place, seeing that he was scanning each particular house with puzzled keenness. And immediately every dovecote was fluttered to discover what particular family owned its skeleton in the cupboard in the shape of a soldier son.

It is of course far more respectable to weigh out sugar and tea over a counter, or to drive a tram through wet or shine, than to be compelled to wear a coat that is suggestive of the poorhouse, since it is given as one may say in charity by the country, and is similar to that worn by hundreds of other men.

And therefore when the soldier pulled up with a jerk at the barricaded house of Mrs. Longford, it was with a sigh of relief that the inhabitants of Murchiston Road realised that no further indignity awaited any of the members of their select coterie.

He looked up the street and down, referred to a piece of paper that he held in his hand, scratched his head and shook it, as his eyes fell upon the barricade of soap boxes that covered the exterior of the house at the end of the street.

No doubt the condition of siege, aroused in his mind recollections of temporary fortifications, erected by the Sappers on field days, but they failed to stir the chord of memory connected with his mother, of whom he was in search.

One of the neighbours was ostentatiously watering her flowers, with one eye on the street, and the gunner addressed her politely.

"I am in search of Mrs. Longford; can you help me to find her? My paper tells me that her address is No. 49, but I misdoubt me that it can be that house."

His voice was educated and his manner refined, and the neighbour bounced eagerly out of her front garden, scenting an interesting piece of family history, that might serve to divert the street for some days.

In another moment, the gunner was in possession of every detail of Mrs. Longford's life since she had first arrived at Yawdon, a lonely sorrowful woman, and his face assumed an expression of doubt and horror, that changed the ruddy colour of it to ashen grey.

It was perhaps natural that Mrs. Gard should represent herself as having been the particular friend of the poor distraught soul.

By her generosity had the house been supplied with the necessaries of life, and such kindnesses as Mrs. Longford would accept, and according to Mrs. Gard, they had not been a few.

"My mother—mad," said Longford dully at last. "She, I remember as the prettiest, nippiest little woman, in a smart white frock, with a bit of mistletoe in her hair at Christmas time, and always a joke about it. I suppose that when I 'listed and father drowned himself, she must have got queer by degrees. I wondered all the seven years that I was in India why she never wrote but twice. Perhaps it has been my fault, but I never thought when I took the shilling, that father would put an end to himself, just for a bit of failure in his business."

"Aye, you never know," said the neighbour gloomily. "She's very mad at times and wanders awful in her speech."

Longford grew more ghastly under the tan of his face, and choking for breath, loosened the strap of his forage cap at his chin.

"It—will be all—right—now—I have come back," he said at last. "And maybe the sight of me will bring back her senses a bit."

"I'll take you next door," volunteered Mrs. Gard. "You look quite queer yourself, man. Have a drop of something first."

But Longford shook his head; and she, tightening the strings of her shawl, that had come loose in her excitement, opened the gate, and Longford followed her up the winding path, round to the back door.

It stood on the latch, and they passed through the deserted kitchen, up the wooden stairs that were thick with the dust of many years.

One of the attic doors stood ajar, and Mrs. Gard peered in with a stare of curiosity, then drew back sharply to allow the young man to enter.

Mrs. Longford was on her knees by the bed.

She had taken down the picture of the yellow-haired boy, and was crooning a baby lullaby over it, her body moving to and fro, with the gesture of a mother rocking her child to sleep.

She had stuck a piece of mistletoe in her dishevelled hair, though heaven alone knew where she could have procured such a thing, and the gown that she wore was a torn white muslin, belted round the waist with a baby's sash of blue ribbon.

"Heaven!" groaned the young man under his breath, "my poor mother."

His eyes took in the pathos of the relics that had belonged to him as a child, his toys, his clothes, his books, and he wrung his hands, while Mrs. Gard watched him out of her sharp black eyes.

"Mother!" he said hoarsely at last, "mother!"

Mrs. Longford turned her head slowly.

Often in her dreams, in the madness of her waking thoughts, had she heard such a word, such a voice. There was no need to answer, for the ghost of the past was with her once again.

"Mother," he said again desperately, with a wild longing that broke through his agony of trouble.

She turned and saw him, and tottered to her feet, holding the picture against her breast.

Framed in the doorway he stood. Time had hollowed his cheeks, his yellow hair was clipped close to his head, his rounded features had taken the imprint of the world that is made up of so much knowledge and suffering.

But she knew him at once, with the wonderful instinct of a mother, for whom there is no deception.

The man saw the light of recognition in her eyes, and sprang forward to catch her in his arms.

She felt the living warmth of those strong arms about her body that had ached for a touch of love for so long.

She saw the love that shone in his sorrowful eyes for her, and stretching out a trembling hand, she touched him softly, her fingers wandering over each feature whose portrait she had so often held against her breast.

"Jem," she said with a harsh scream, that seemed to be the outcome of her many lonely years of pain.

Then, as his lips touched hers, she gave a little sob:

"Oh, Jem," she said again, her tones melting to the perfection of the tenderness he so well remembered.

"Jem—dearie—at last——"

"Mother! oh, mother! What is it? Look here, look here!"

But when Mrs. Gard hurried up with offers of assistance and eager sympathy, she saw that Jem Longford held in his arms a dead woman, and that he was crying over her like a little child.

Joy had been too much for a soul attuned to sorrow, and in the coming of it, her heart had broken.

THE TROTTER.

"Ta! Ta! Trotter, no more play now—mamma must run and dress."

The Trotter listened attentively. Yes, those were the wheels of father's gig coming up the drive. He was puzzled in his small mind; the sound of father's wheels was always the signal to leave off play with mamma. Why?

Trotter's mamma waved a small hand. She was a diminutive person with quantities of fluffy fair hair and deep blue eyes like the Trotter's. The belt round her muslin frock was surely very small even for her; the bloom on her cheeks rather more decided in tint than Nature intended; in fact, where Nature failed (or rather where Dolly Lovegrove fancied Nature failed) there Art stepped in.

Trotter waited with his solemn blue eyes fixed on his mamma's departing figure. She had thrown the baby down so suddenly that he felt half inclined to cry. (It doesn't take much to bring tears at five years old.)

However, he thought better of it, life might be worse; for exit mamma, enter papa, Tommy Trotter's beloved gee-gee, and Bob, that wonderfully interesting Bob, that important person enveloped in buttons. Oh! how those buttons glistened in the sun.

The Trotter was a contented person on the whole, but if there was one individual he was envious of it was Bob—if there was one thing his soul longed for, it was those buttons. He always imagined papa took Bob out because of them (he must be proud of such a noble array).

One day he had asked nurse, who was a good-hearted soul, to sew him beautiful brass buttons, as much like Bob's as possible, all over his pinafore, and then marched boldly down to the hall hours before papa could possibly have arrived and proudly awaited his coming.

But mamma had appeared and spoiled it all. In answer to his "Me's all buttons to go out with papa," she had caught him up in her arms and carried him back to nurse, with instructions to put Master James to bed. "Master James," that was the height of displeasure. He didn't understand in the least. Mamma was always funny, Nurse called her "herratic," this time she said—jealousy.

Well now he ran gleefully up to papa, who petted and made much of him; he was not like mamma, he was old quite old, and oh, so tired looking—but old and tired as he was, when he played it was with all his heart.

However, when he was angry the Trotter knew all coaxing was in vain, and he was obliged to bear his punishment like a man. The inflictor suffered much more than the inflicted though. Now with mamma, Trotter never knew quite where he stood, a smack one moment, a hug the next, a chocolate one day for what he was scolded for another.

"Hello, my boy, here's nurse."

The Trotter by studiously looking at his toes imagined himself unseen by this spoiler of sport.

"Bed - time, Master James."

The Trotter hesitated between a good rebellious roar which sometimes touched mamma's heart, or good behaviour, which, somehow, papa always expected, when his meditations were interrupted by "You may send Master James down to dessert."

The Trotter departed with a war-hoop of delight.

James Lovegrove with his tired sad face and stooping figure was left alone.

A rustle of silk, an odour of the latest perfume.

"Good evening, Dorothea."

"Good evening, James."

"You dine out to-night?"

"Yes! Truman is late, Ah, here he is," as the brougham drove up. "Elise, my fan."

The smart looking butler who appeared to escort his mistress to the carriage, retreated, the master himself acted as valet on this occasion.

"Good-night, Dorothea. Will you be late to-night?"

"No," with a nervous laugh, "good-night."

"Where shall I direct Truman?"

"He knows, thanks; good-night."

James Lovegrove bowed.

There was a peculiar ring in his voice as he directed the coachman to drive on.

This was the state of affairs at the Dovecote, about the most inappropriate name the charming Putney villa could have, but doubtless the last owners had loved and billed and cooed there, possibly cooed on till Darby and Joan had flown together to another world.

James Lovegrove had felt the inappropriateness of the name but pride kept him from having it altered, for fear of the work people and servants, and neighbours.

Dolly also recognised the mistake, but had flippantly remarked.

"What's in a name?"

James Lovegrove had made a mistake; he, a middle-aged, wealthy merchant had married a pretty actress. He had fallen in love with Dolly Rainsford years ago, and read contrary to other folk's opinion a good heart beat beneath that flippant little manner, and truth and innocence in those deep blue eyes in spite of the pencilled lines underneath.

And somehow this tall, strong, middle-aged man brought out all Dolly Rainsford's best feelings, and so he always saw her fairest side, and when he asked her to marry him, she was glad as a tired child to put herself under his protection.

She gave up the stage without a pang. She was tired, so tired of the struggle for fame and all the petty jealousies and temptations, and for the first year of her married life she was happy, only a little afraid of her sombre-looking husband. He felt a little disappointed in the timidity and childishness of his wife. He liked it at first but later it began to pall.

One day he brought a friend in to dine, a renowned actor who wanted to renew the acquaintance of little Dolly Rainsford. He did so! By degrees he accompanied them out, soon James Lovegrove was too busy to go also, then rather than disappoint his wife he allowed her to go alone with him.

Jack Holmes was an old friend.

By-and-bye the painted lines and rosy tints which had been discarded by Lovegrove's special request reappeared.

Jack Holmes was always saying a great actress was wanted. Those with talent who left the stage were positively wicked.

Lovegrove noticed nothing in these remarks, Dolly who met the accompanying glances saw more—and understood. And so they drifted apart, quite politely but surely.

During the second year James Lovegrove junior made his appearance. Dolly thought Lovegrove wanting in fatherly feelings towards his adorable son and heir. She adored him as a child a new toy, but would never have dreamed of giving up a pleasure on the Trotter's behalf.

Lovegrove noticed this, and was more jealous for his son than he had ever been on his own account.

He petted and spoiled the boy behind his mother's back, but somehow in her presence he was shy.

* * * * *

The Trotter came down to dessert, he seemed flushed and tired, he didn't talk much but as he expressed it, "was dreffel thirsty and felt all burning."

Lovegrove felt uneasy and sent for nurse, who took the Trotter to bed, for a wonder without demur. He was left alone in a brown study.

* * * * *

At a small table at the Pitsani Restaurant, Dolly Lovegrove and Jack Holmes were supping.

She was flushed and excited. He also seemed less calm than usual.

"My dear girl," he was saying. "Thirty pounds a week, you might make a name. Absurd to be cooped up with a dull old fogey and a baby. I'm leading man, and——"

Various scraps of conversation came from the surrounding tables. A contented clatter of knives and forks, the popping of corks, and the noise of the waiters as they rushed to and fro.

Over there the fair woman in blue was giggling loudly, and the lovesick youth by her side looked volumes.

An elderly couple at the next table showed disapproval. At that table in the corner a little débutante was talking excitedly with her parents of her first opera.

The next table was a party of three: a pretty woman,

Digitized by Google

a handsome man, and the third evidently her husband looked decidedly out of it and anything but pleased.

Above all a delicious waltz was playing.

* * * * *

A knock at the dining-room door.

"Come in! You, Nurse! What is it?"

"Please, sir, Master James, he isn't at all well, sir. He's that feverish and a bit delirious too. We ought to send for the doctor."

"Send! No! I'll go myself at once. I'll just have a look at him first."

Up strode Lovegrove.

There in his tiny cot the Trotter with wide open eyes was wailing.

"I wants mamma, my own booful mamma," he cried, over and over again.

Lovegrove with a furious feeling tugging at his heart, rushed down, was out and at Doctor Dent's in a moment.

Doctor Dent came and muttered about young children who were weaklings and high fevers.

"Where's his mother?" he asked sharply, "she ought to be here. He must be given in to. This crying only raises the temperature."

The doctor left. Midnight found the Trotter quieter; he realised it was papa who was sitting by him and smoothing his hot little head and soon fell into a doze, then suddenly roused again.

It was a noise in the street had awakened him. The doctor had said he was particularly to be kept quiet, on no account to be disturbed if he slept.

Yes! It was the carriage wheels, that loud laughter and those voices that aroused him.

"Good-bye!"

"Not good-bye, au revoir!"

To Lovegrove the laughter sounded fiendish. He beckoned to nurse, and in spite of the Trotter's cries went down. He ran into Dolly in the middle of the stairs.

"The child is ill," he said hoarsely.

"What, ill? The Trotter ill?"

All the joyous flippancy left her voice, all the sparkling light of her eyes vanished.

"Ill!"

She brushed past him and made straight for the nursery, straight for the little cot.

The Trotter gazed at her but he did not know the lady in white satin and was frightened. His cries for mamma were forgotten now; it was papa, papa only, that he wanted. She tried to lift him out of his cot.

"Do away, naughty lady," he lisped, "I wants papa."

Lovegrove waved her away and resumed his post by the bed. A wild look came into Dolly's eyes.

"He doesn't want me! The child doesn't want me! Nobody wants me. Jack, Jack! I am coming to you."

She rushed to the door. The rustle of her dress roused the Trotter. The moonlight streaming on the white satin and diamonds cast an eerie light.

"Papa! An angel! Look! Look! It's doing. Tall it back."

There was no need. The angel heard and turned. He held out his little arms and said "Tum!"

Something in her movements recalled him. He jumped up.

"It's mamma, my own booful mamma!" he cried.

She clasped him in her arms, and the Trotter, happy now, laid his little head on her shoulder and slept peacefully. It was the mother's turn now.

"Leave us," she murmured.

James Lovegrove, as he paced up and down the library, kept the vision in his mind of his wife, flippant, childish Dolly, pacing up and down the nursery, regardless of satin and diamonds, the Trotter in her arms, enveloped in her opera-cloak. The woman who thought so much of feathers and furbelows, had snatched up this masterpiece of Doucet's, ostrich feathers, chiffon and all, and had wrapped it round her child. Even the old nurse, who was no friend of her mistress, who never made allowances for youth, beauty, or anything else, demurred.

"Leave us!"

Some of the old stage movements came back to her. There was a world in that wave of her hand.

Nurse retired.

Ah! She was the queen of the nursery now. Rather queen of that one small subject, than monarch of all the audiences of all the theatres in the world.

* * * * *

The sun, peeping in at the window, crowned her queen of home.

The doctor came next morning. Possibly, it was owing to the child's being better, or it may have been something in Mrs. Lovegrove's face; anyway, a few homely facts he had meant to say, remained unspoken.

The fever had run its course; and to Dolly, the fever for fame, glory, admiration, had died out.

The Trotter lived! Whatever he accomplished in after life, it was at the beginning and unconsciously that his best work was done.

'Tis no mean thing to reunite two souls!

Mabel's Stratagem.

It was almost like a bit of Persian poetry, that little conservatory, in its glow and fragrance and soft, delicious murmur of leaves. And Mabel Moore herself looked not unlike a Persian enchantress, as she stood resting one hand on a marble vase.

She was not alone in the flowery fragrance of the conservatory. Ernest Beckford was leaning against one of the stages, twisting and untwisting a spray of jessamine with a sort of impatient rapidity.

"Mabel," he said, "you know that you are asking impossibilities."

"Am I?"

"I cannot go to South America without you."

"You can, Ernest, and you will."

"But, my darling, only think of it—a year's exile from you!"

"Will it be any easier for me to endure?" she asked calmly.

"Sometimes I fancy, Mabel," he resumed impetuously, "that you don't care for me."

"Ernest!"

"My dearest, I know I am unjust, but——"

"Now let us understand just what you wish me to do in this matter."

"I want you to marry me this afternoon and go out to South America with me in the ship that sails to-morrow."

"A very reasonable wish," said Mabel, laughing. "But you know I will never marry you while your mother refuses her sanction."

"She does not know you."

"That makes no difference. I shall never enter a family where I am not welcomed!"

"But just consider how unreasonable you are."

"She fancies me a hollow, heartless woman of the world, does she not? She is unwilling to trust her son's happiness in the keeping of a coquette."

"I am sorry I ever allowed you to read that unreasonable letter."

"But I am glad. No, I have too much pride and dignity to marry you unless your mother gives her free and full consent."

"Then you do not love me, Mabel?"

"I do love you, Ernest, better than I like to acknowledge to myself."

"Mabel," he urged tenderly, "let us cut this Gordian knot by the exercise of our own free will. Become my wife."

Mabel Moore shook her head.

"Let us wait and see what time may bring forth," she said archly. "And now leave me; remember that the ship sails at noon to-morrow."

"I can't possibly go in this vessel."

"But if you do not go to-morrow you will be obliged to wait another week, and your uncle may be dead by the time you arrive."

"Yes, I know, but——"

"Well?"

"I must get that companion for my mother—she will be entirely alone. Mrs. Carter told me she knew someone who would take the situation, and I shall have to go over to see her about it to-morrow."

"Don't let that detain you. I think I know of a young woman who would make an excellent companion, and I will send her to Hampstead."

"Can she read aloud?"

"Oh, she can do everything."

"Send her on, then. But, Mabel——"

"Well?"

"It strikes me you are anxious to hurry me off."

"Ernest," she said in a voice that quivered a little, "you are misjudging me. I want you to do your duty. The sunshine will come at last, if you can only wait unrepiningly."

"Little prophetess," he said, drawing her fondly towards him, "I accept your auguries. No one ought to be discouraged who is sure of your love."

"Going away, Miss Mabel?"

The little maid stood aghast in her occupation of putting away laces in a satin-lined box of sandalwood.

"Yes. Get my trunks ready, Mildred; I prefer to pack them myself."

"And when do we start, miss?"

"I shall not take you with me."

"But Miss Mabel——"

"I choose to go alone. There—now leave me to myself."

Mrs. Beckford, of Hampstead, was sitting alone in her parlour—musing on her far off son, with a total abstraction from all outward sights and sounds—and when all of a sudden she looked up, a pretty young person clad in brown cloth gown stood before her.

"What is it you want?" said Mrs. Beckford curtly.

"If you please, madam, I am come to offer myself as your companion."

"Who sent you?" demanded the lady.

"I heard that Mrs. Beckford was wanting a companion, and I should like to take the situation."

"Hum-m-m," said the old lady. "What's your name?"

"Edith Moore."

"Moore—Moore? Got any relations at Sydenham?"

"No, madam. I am alone in the world."

"I'm glad of that. I couldn't stand anyone who is connected with the guitar-playing girl who—but never mind that just now. Where are your references?"

Edith Moore drew a letter or two from her pocket.

"So Mrs. Carter knows you, eh?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Well," commented the matron, glancing over the notes, "these recommendations seem very satisfactory. I—don't know—but that you may come and try. The only objection I can see is that you're too pretty, but I don't think you are really to blame for that. Take off your things."

* * * * * *

More than a year has crept over the daily current of life at Hampstead. The trees were bare and leafless, and the snow lay white and deep by the roadside.

"How soon it grows dark!" said Mrs. Beckford, with a little sigh. "That's right, Edith, put on some more wood and draw the curtains. Now we're snug!"

Snug, indeed, they were, with the shaded lamp glowing softly on the table and the bright wood fire sending up its fluttering spires of red light on the hearth.

Edith was sitting on a low stool beside her. She looked wonderfully pretty.

"What's that you were saying a little while ago about going back to Sydenham, my dear?" said the old lady, suddenly turning round to Edith. "I want you to understand that you can't go. I can't spare you."

She put one arm round Edith's neck, and drew the round cheek down on her lap.

"Do you really love me, Mrs. Beckford?" asked the girl, earnestly.

"Love you, darling. I could no more get along without you than I could without the sunshine. It seems as though you belong to me. I don't know what you've done to steal my old heart away, I'm sure, but you remind me somehow of the little daughter I once lost. You won't leave me, dear?"

There was something almost pathetic in her pleading voice.

"Dear Mrs. Beckford," whispered Edith, with the nappy crimson dyeing her cheek, "I'll never leave you; I will stay with you always. Oh, I am so glad you have learned to love me—more glad than I can tell you. But——"

"Well, dear?"

"There's something I want to tell you—something I nave kept back from you," faltered Edith. "Mrs. Beckford, I am——"

But Mrs. Beckford had started to her feet.

"Hush! did I not hear his footstep? It was my boy's foot upon the threshold! He has come back to me!"

She rushed to the door and threw it wide open, and the tall, stalwart figure caught her in his arms as if she had been a little child.

"Mother, are you glad to see your wanderer?"

As she drew him in, he caught a momentary glimpse of the figure in the apartment beyond.

"You are not alone, mother?"

"No, Edith is with me."

"And who may Edith be?"

"Didn't you get my letters? I wrote all about her."

"I haven't seen a letter for three months."

Edith was standing where the full brilliance of the lamp shone upon her, as mother and son entered the room together. Ernest stopped short, gazing at her in bewilderment.

"Mabel!"

"Ernest, what do you mean?" exclaimed Mrs. Beckford. "This is Edith Moore."

"She is Mabel Moore, my own sweetheart!" said Ernest, springing forward and sealing his words on lip and brow and cheek, while the young lady, much to Mrs. Beckford's horror, made not the slightest resistance. The next moment, however, she withdrew from his encircling arms, and glided to the astonished matron's side.

"Mrs. Beckford," she said softly, "I may tell you now what was just trembling on my lips when Ernest's footsteps interrupted me. My name is Edith, but it is Mabel too. Will you forgive me for stealing into your heart by stratagem? Half an hour ago I promised never to leave you. You will not send me away from you now?"

And Mrs. Beckford melted straightway before the pleading of the blue eyes.

"I always wanted a daughter," she said, "but I couldn't bear the idea of Mabel Moore, the heiress."

"But you will love little Edith, who came to be your companion?"

"I suppose I ought to scold you for deceiving me," said the old lady, "but I—I couldn't help loving you if I were to try ever so hard, and I don't want to try, and that's just the truth of the matter. There, I must see about some tea for you."

As though Ernest cared for anything less ethereal than Mabel just then? F. M. C.

A Mission in Petticoats.

YES, it amuses you vastly, you young rogues, to learn that the picture of a girl, which hangs in your grandfather's bedroom is simply a portrait of your old grandad. You thought it was a likeness of your dear grandmother before she married me, eh? Well, now you know better.

Want to hear how it all came about? No; of course men didn't wear skirts and petticoats, like women, in those days! Anyone would think I was an ancient Briton.

It's only about fifty years ago; but I suppose that is a terribly long time for you to think of. I'll tell you the tale, since you wish to hear it.

It was at the time when the man who afterwards became Napeleon III. was pursuing his intrigues in order to win the throne of France. I was a young fellow of twenty-one and very badly off; my prospects were anything but brilliant, I had all the Briton's love of adventure, and I had arrived at that condition of mind when a youth is ready to do any mortal thing for the purpose of making a little headway in the world. I wanted to turn a little of the darkness into light, and I was not particular what I did to accomplish this end, so long as the method was not to my discredit.

I was one night walking moodily along the side of the Thames when I passed two men in earnest conversation. As they went by I caught the words "Whom can we get to undertake it?" and, without thinking of what I was doing, I wheeled round, walked right up to them, and said, "I'll do it."

I have often laughed since at the scare I gave them. They turned upon me with fierce exclamations in French, and one whipped out a pistol and pointed it at my head. They said something to me in the same language, but I shook my head.

"Talk in English, as you did just now," I suggested; "then I shall understand."

They looked at each other. Then they smiled.

"It is true," assented one of them. "We have lived many years here, and we fall insensibly into the language." He said a few words in his own tongue to his companion, after which he again addressed me. "Are you in need of work?"

"I am in need of money," I responded bluntly, "and I suppose I must work to get it."

"Come with us," he said, just as abruptly. And we all three made our way to an inn that was situated in one of the streets that led into the Strand

We took our seats in a small room off the bar, and I noticed the second man eyeing me rather unfavourably. Scarcely were we comfortably seated in our chairs, when he spoke contemptuously.

"He will not do for us—he is no stronger than a girl."

Of course, I was quite aware that this remark was directed against me. I ought to explain that, in appearance, I really was rather girlish. I was not more than medium height, I hadn't a vistage of a moustache, and I was slim of figure as well as effeminate of countenance. I had often been twitted about it, but the jesters had discovered that I was strong of muscle. I stood up defiantly now.

"My appearance may be that of a girl," I retorted, "but my strength is that of a man, as I have proved and will prove. Look here," I added, baring my arm, "what of that?"

I fancy that he was somewhat of a judge of muscle and sinew, for after a searching glance he apologised gracefully.

Then we came quickly to the matter in hand. They first questioned me closely regarding myself, and then told me what they wanted me to do. I was to convey a small packet to Rouen and deliver it to a Monsieur Bardeau who resided in the Grande Rue, which, they explained was the equivalent of "High Street."

"Is that all?" I asked in some surprise.

"You will find the task sufficiently hard to accomplish," was the answer of Monsieur Lebrun, as the chief speaker called himself. "The very fact that we are sending it by an Englishman and by hand rather than by the mail is enough to demonstrate that the mission is difficult."

"What is the price and what have I to fear?" was my next remark.

"I will give you enough money to pay your expenses and twenty pounds in addition. Monsieur Bardeau will give you eighty pounds more if—er, when you hand the packet to him. As to the other question, you run the risk of being robbed of the packet by our enemies, but exactly how or by whom I am, naturally, quite unable to say. That is your affair. But, if the worst comes, destroy it."

I began to think that the reward was not proportionate, and tried to get an increase; but they refused, and I did not like to lose the chance. So we commenced to discuss plans for the journey.

Three days later, if you had been alive, you might have seen a young English girl, attended by an elderly Frenchwoman, land at Boulogne. The young lady was on her way to Paris, to join her relatives, but she intended to visit various places on her way. That damsel was your grandfather, just as you see him in that picture.

It had occurred to me that such a disguise was the best calculated to effect the object in view; my companion was not disguised—she was genuine. The plan had been successful so far, and I considered myself indebted to my girlish appearance.

Of course as an English girl I was obliged to have a companion, but I was distrustful of this lady; not because I thought she would play us false—my employers had great confidence in her, but because she might betray our game in her fright if we got into a fix.

We stayed that night at the best inn, and set out the next morning in a hired conveyance that was to take us a few miles across country towards our destination. I was an "eccentric" daughter of perfidious Albion, desirous of running about the country; but as all our people are eccentric in the eyes of our neighbours, there was nothing uncommon in my vagaries.

"This is easy work and I shall earn that money without trouble," said I to my companion, Madame Juvette.

"I hope so," she returned nervously, "but I would not say one word about the affair anywhere, even in English. It is not money that I ask; I am a devoted friend of the cause; but I dare not hope that we shall be fortunate enough to outwit them."

"Nonsense!" I exclaimed in a light-hearted manner. "The roundabout way we have come and our assumed characters have thrown them off the scent entirely."

I contrasted my present idea with my former notion, when I had asked that the reward might be increased, and I laughed gleefully. That was where I made a mistake, for I was not out of the wood.

I had a mind to enjoy the trip as much as I could, so when we had gone some little distance and had arrived in the midst of some scenery that pleased me, I had the conveyance stopped and told Madame Juvette that I intended to stroll about for a while. We alighted, she somewhat unwillingly, telling the coachman to await our return, and off we went.

I do not quite know how long we had been walking when we reached a narrow lane that wound in and out. I liked the peaceful look of this turning, and we walked along it for a few yards. In doing so, as it proved, I had played into the hands of the enemy.

I was reaching up to pick a flower, when an exclamation from my travelling companion caused me to turn. I found myself confronted by a man of middle height, about forty years of age, and clearly a native of modern Gaul. He smiled sarcastically as he addressed me in English.

"Mademoiselle, like all the misses of the other side, is very daring, and her daring has made her imprudent."

I could see at once that he meant that I had been too venturesome in walking down that lane while on my mission—for I had no doubt that he had tracked me. But one thing that was not so evident was—did he really take me for a young woman or was that a part of the sarcasm?

"I do not understand what Monsieur means," I answered, assuming an air of surprise. "I thought that a girl—and a foreigner—would be sure of safety here in France, where the men are so chivalrous." I tried to catch a glimpse of Madame Juvette, out of the corner of my eye, but I could not see that lady.

"Mademoiselle will be safe enough here," said the man, his smile broadening in a way that made me cross, "if she does not interfere with politics. It will be better for her to give up that document she has upon her."

There was no longer any utility in pretending innocence; the crisis had come, and if I wished to preserve the packet I must fight for it. I had a pistol and a dagger about me, but so certain had I been that I should not be molested that I had not got them ready to my hand. I made a movement to get at one or the other, but my antagonist observed my intention and, stepping quickly forward, he grasped my right wrist.

"No resistance, mademoiselle," he continued sternly. "I do not wish to hurt you, but I must have those papers."

My heart gave a little leap; he had ceased to be sarcastic and he still addressed me as "Mademoiselle." That was my chance.

"Oh, will no one help me?" I cried, making a pretendedly great effort to release myself. "Why should I be taken for a conspirator?"

I knew that my feeble attempt to drag myself from his clutch would have a double effect—it would give him the impression that I was a weak girl and it would bring him just a little closer to me. I was ready for him.

With the object, I take it, of stopping further resistance, he pulled me towards him and tried to grip my other wrist; but instead of a weakly maiden he had to deal with a man who was not only strong, but had learned to wrestle and to box. In an instant I had him; there was a very brief struggle, and then he went flying over the head of "Mademoiselle" and landed with a groan in the ditch.

Without thinking of what I was doing, I wheeled round, walked right up to them, and said: "I'll do it."

I should have liked to continue the affray, but I judged it more prudent to be off. I was picking up my skirts to run, but I heard Madame Juvette calling me.

"Come this way," she cried. "Heavens, but how did you manage that?"

"Easily enough!" I returned. "But we are not going back to the carriage. That rascal of a driver is one of the gang, I'm sure. No matter; he must now get his pay from the other parties!"

I knew by the position of the sun the direction in which we should journey in order to reach Rouen, and I resolved to walk some of the distance in as straight a line as I could. We went through fields and rough lanes, cutting off corners by scrambling through hedges, much to Madame Juvette's disgust, for she was not young and active as I was. Still, the thought of the "cause" supported her, and we covered many miles before nightfall.

I felt that we must get to Rouen without avoidable delay now. I did not know how many there might be in that gang, and I could hardly rely upon my disguise any more. So I wanted to put a goodly space between my packet and the man I had left in the ditch, before he could recover, tell his friends, and get on my track again. So we avoided the villages on our way, until night and fatigue compelled us to think of some sort of shelter.

"There seems to be a small village just in front of us," I said. "We will seek rest and food at the inn or of some farmer. We can say that we have been ill-treated by robbers on the road, and forced to give up our conveyance and walk. That will account for our torn clothing. I think it impossible that our mission can be known there."

Madame agreed; she was so done up that she would have acquiesced in any plan, I verily believe. Our clothing was torn by our passage through hedges, to say nothing of a big rent in my bodice—a souvenir of the wrestling bout.

When we reached the village I tried a cottage, but was viewed with such mistrust that I walked off in high dudgeon to the inn.

There we were hospitably received, food was promptly placed before us, and the necessary sewing materials handed to Madame Juvette in order that she might repair our clothing.

"I doubt whether it will be safe to enter Rouen in your present disguise," observed Madame, when we were alone in the small parlour. "It might prejudice Bardeau, and we must not betray anything of our plans before the time is propitious for the coup."

"Then the only way is to push on to the outskirts of the city, and for you to enter Rouen and bring Bardeau out to me," I remarked. "Unless," I added, thoughtfully, "I can get some masculine clothing and pass as a deaf and dumb peasant or something of that sort."

"I might enter the next village or town alone and buy some male attire," said Juvette, "but to do that here would be to arouse suspicion. We can try, but I think it will be best for you not to be seen near the house of Bardeau."

It was at the time of the year when night falls early, and by nine o'clock we had spent a fairly long evening. Madame Juvette was ready for her couch, but I was refreshed by the rest, and in no mood to retire for a while. So she went at the landlady's invitation, and I decided to sit up yet another hour. As I think of it now, it must have appeared indecorous that a girl should sit alone by the fire, but the landlady evinced no surprise. On the contrary, it struck me that she was pleased, and I thought it was because the other bedroom was not quite ready.

About twenty minutes later, there was a rap at the door, and a young woman, about my own age, entered and spoke to me in my own language.

"May I sit with you and talk to you a little?" she asked. "I am of the same nationality as yourself. My mother married a second time—she married the proprietor of this inn. She died two years ago. The landlady is my stepfather's sister."

"Oh!" I said. "That accounts for your being able to speak English. Do you like living here?"

She hesitated a moment. "No," she replied in a low tone. "I do not."

The conversation flagged. Seeing that she had come in to have a chat, I thought this very strange. I observed her eyeing me very narrowly, and I began to feel puzzled. Several minutes passed, and we had exchanged but a dozen sentences or so, when she rose to go. I was vexed with myself for being so dull; I am not usually lacking in conversational powers, but something in her manner stopped the flow of words

"I must go now," she whispered, coming closer to me, "but first I wish to give you a word of advice. Be very careful, Monsieur."

And before I had recovered from my surprise she was gone. She had divined my sex, but how? Had she found out my secret unaided, or had she been told? At any rate, her warning was worthy of my attention. I would be careful! I looked to my pistol and dagger to see that they were in good condition, and to place them handy for use.

The landlady came in again, and questioned me by a look as to whether I was prepared for bed. I nodded assent and followed her out of the room. She carried a flickering candle, but it gave so little light that it was impossible to see where I was going.

We went along a passage, leading to the back of the house, where I supposed the stairs to be situated. She stopped at a door—I could tell that by the sensation of being near something, and by hearing her raise the latch. It opened; I felt a breath of air, and then I was pushed violently forward through the doorway and into a yard, or similar space, paved with great cobbles.

I was just able to prevent myself from falling headlong, but I went down upon my knees. I heard the door slam behind me, and an exclamation in front. I leapt to my feet, and stepped backwards cautiously till I felt my back touch the wall; then out came my pistol.

But, alas! I had hardly drawn it forth ere I heard a kind of swishing or soughing to one side; I made a rapid move, which, undoubtedly, saved me from a severe blow, but the cudgel struck the firearm and knocked it out of my hand. It fell somewhere near me, but I could not locate it.

It appeared that I had two adversaries, armed with staves, perhaps with swords as well. They had no firearms apparently—firearms make a noise, I remembered. I had my dagger only; the fight was therefore unequal.

It was my best plan to keep my back to the wall, while dodging their blows and trying to get one in for myself. There was but little light, but, fortunately, my sight was keen, and I hoped to be able to follow their movements.

I am not likely to forget that fight in the dark. I had to keep both my eyes and my ears strained to their fullest capabilities, in order to defend myself against the two men who were bent upon reducing me to helplessness, at least, and taking the precious packet from me.

I found my feminine attire very much in the way; in my contests at school, and during my lessons in fencing, wrestling, and boxing, I had, of course, been accustomed to more freedom, and the new style of dress was decidedly irksome; still, I had no choice, and was forced to make the best of the matter.

I had my work cut out for me. I sparred about with my left hand, endeavouring to land a blow with my fist. I had to skip about to avoid their blows, and I made one or two feints and rushes in my efforts to make use of my dagger. I did not wish to kill either of them, but I meant to do my utmost to disable them. And I believe that they were actuated by the same motive towards myself.

I cannot tell how long we were at it, but I suppose it was only a few minutes. I had received three slight blows—slight because I had partially succeeded in dodging them, but at last one of the sticks came down on my left arm with sufficient force to render it useless for a time. I ground my teeth in rage; I was now no match for them, tired as I had become, and with only one arm.

I had to keep my eyes and my ears strained to their fullest capabilities, in order to defend myself against the two men who were bent upon reducing me to helplessness, and taking the precious packet from me.

My antagonists chuckled.

"Give it up to us," demanded one of them in bad English. "We don't want to kill you, but——"

"You'll have to kill me before you get it!" I cried desperately.

They made a step towards me, but just then something seemed to irritate my eyes and nose. I sniffed involuntarily, and the next instant I sneezed loudly. My eyes smarted and my nose tickled so that I could do nothing but sneeze. Then I heard the others swearing—that's what I took it to be, from the sound—and sneezing also. All three of us were practically helpless under some evil influence.

I was leaning against what I thought was the wall, sneezing violently, the tears streaming from my eyes, when my support yielded gently, and before I was aware of it I was in the corridor once more, and the door shut behind me. I then saw that my saviour was the young English girl, who said hurriedly:

"I told you to be careful. Now you must be off—quick. They forgot that my room-window overlooked that yard. I hope the pepper has not hurt you much, but it was the only thing I could think of to stop the fight and help you. I tried to throw it mostly over them."

"Heaven bless you!" I cried. "And Madame Juvette?"

"She is away, on the road; you will find her. But get away at once."

By this time we had reached a side door, and she pushed me out. I had no time even to ask her name, for she shut the door softly in my face.

I caught up with Juvette, and the next day she purchased a suit for me. But it was useless to expect that we should not be overtaken if we travelled together; she was known as well as I. So we decided to part; she to remain in the town, where she made friends with a woman, and I, after having studied the route, pushed on by the quietest roads to my destination. We were to meet again, if possible, on my return journey.

I soon found that I was followed, but I eluded my pursuers by hiding in a ditch. I take it that they did not know my exact destination, for I heard no more of them.

I entered Rouen after dark on the following day, and went to Bardeau's house, which I had no trouble in finding, from the minute directions given to me by Juvette.

Monsieur Bardeau greeted me cordially, and made me comfortable while he read the contents of the packet. When he had finished he smiled.

"You have rendered us a great service," he said. At least, that is what he meant, for we had to talk as best we could with a mixture of the two languages and a plentiful use of signs. "Do you know what is in this?"

I shook my head.

"Nothing," was the astonishing reply. "That is, this page of writing is useless in itself, and is not the important document that you thought you were carrying. To me, who can read between the lines, it means that you have acted as a false scent. You were despatched with this document, a hint was allowed to be gleaned by the other side that a messenger, probably disguised as a girl, was taking important papers across the Channel—and the thing was done. They were on the watch for you, and while they were so occupied, another message was sent over to the proper party. That messenger has no doubt had an easy task, thanks to you. Of course, the better you defended your charge, the more they were thrown off the right scent. You have been very useful, and it gives me much pleasure to hand to you the eighty pounds promised to you."

I was nicely enraged when I managed to grasp the meaning of this. It was not pleasant to be tricked. After a while I cooled down a little, and I recognised that in my fashion I had rendered a service, and that I had at least fulfilled my mission. And I discovered that Juvette knew all about the plot.

"I told you to be careful. Now, you must be off—quick."

I took leave of Bardeau on the evening of the next day, he having cared for me and kept me in hiding for nearly twenty-four hours. I was this time disguised as an Italian workman, in clothes lent to me by Bardeau. It was understood that I should rejoin Juvette, but I was still sore at the deception practised on me, and I struck out for the coast in an entirely different direction. I never saw Madame Juvette again.

I had some difficulty in getting back to Old England, but I was not pursued, so far as I know. Anyhow, I got back safely.

I had about ninety pounds when I reached London, and this set me up in business — my adventure having satisfied me for the time.

It was nearly three years later when I ventured into France again, and I went straight to the inn where the fight in the dark had taken place. The object I had in view was immediately attained, for the first person I set eyes on was the young woman who had saved me.

After we were married—in London—we had that portrait painted. Both your grandmother and I were able to describe the dress for the guidance of the artist.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of George Griffith's "Valdar the Oft-Born" to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. Jos. Edwards, 5 Berwick Street, Burnley. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 5th. Post-cards only, please.

Worse than Killed.

A PRIVATE soldier in one of the Irish regiments engaged in South Africa in a dreadful battle cried out during the hottest part of the action:

"Och, murther! I'm kilt entirely."

"Are you wounded?" inquired an officer near him.

"Wounded is it? yer honour," replied Pat, "by the powers, I'm worse than kilt out and out. Wasn't I waiting for the last quarter of an hour for a pull at Tim Murphy's pipe, and there now, it's shot out of his mouth!"

The Men That Wanted it.

A REGIMENT of soldiers was drawn up for church parade in the barrack-square at Belfast, but the church was being repaired and could only hold half of them.

"Sergeant-major," shouted the colonel, "tell all the men who don't want to go to church to fall out on the reverse flank."

Of course, a large number quickly and gladly availed themselves of the privilege.

"Now, sergeant-major," said the colonel, "dismiss all the men who did not fall out, and march the others to church—they want it most."

What He Didn't Expect.

A BURNLEY man, who is a Reservist, got his papers for the front one day last week.

On going away he wanted his wife to accompany him to the station.

"Nay," said she, "aw shan't go to station wi' thi; but aw'll bid thee good-bye, and I hope tha'll give th' Boers as good a slugging as tha's given me, and aw'll bet they'll remember it!"

So Tommy walked away with a tear in his eye.

He Wanted to Join In.

A STRANGER once went into a London court and spent some time watching the proceedings. By-and-bye a man was brought up for contempt of court and fined, whereupon the stranger rose and said: "How much was the fine?"

"One pound," replied the clerk.

"Well," said the stranger, laying down the money, "if that's all I'd like to join in. I've had a few hours' experience of this court, and no one can feel a greater contempt for it than I do, and I am willing to pay for it."

Absorbed.

THE young man who writes verses was standing out in the night gazing at the sky when a friend ran across him.

"What are you doing? Studying astronomy?"

"Go away and don't disturb me. I am gazing into infinite distance."

"I don't see what satisfaction you find in that."

"That's because you never had any experience with editors. You don't know what a comfort it is to find some place where nothing is crowded out for lack of space."

Bow-Legged Stockings.

DURING last autumn a pitman was asked by a friend, who was very bow-legged, to purchase, when next "i' the toon," a pair of stockings for him. On the following pay Saturday the pitman entered the shop of a well-known hosier to make the purchase.

The shopman was most obligi g; but having shown the intending purchaser nearly every pair in stock, he at last thought it time to ask of the man a more minute description of what was required.

He said he had shown nearly all they had, and he was sure their shop was second to none, and as they had hitherto given satisfaction to all classes, it was strange that they could not now suit a customer. The pitman laconically replied: "What I want is a pair o' bow-legged yins."

Taking his Time for it.

THERE is a business man who is a member of a well-known firm, and who has an impediment in his speech.

He is not at all sensitive about it, however, and not only takes a joke at his own expense in good part, but often takes liberties with his friends based upon his own affliction. The other day he went to the telephone, and a conversation something like this ensued:

"H-h-hello! Is th-th-that Mr. J-J-Jones?"

"Yes; this is Mr. Jones. Who is that?"

"Why, I'm M-M-Mr. S-S-Smith."

"Ah, Mr. Smith, how are you? What can I do for you?"

"W-w-why, have y-y-you h-half an hour to s-spare?"

"Yes; I think I have."

"T-t-that's all r-r-right, then. I j-j-just want to h-h-have about t-t-two minutes' c-c-conver-sa-sation w-w-with you."

Quite Another Sort of Man.

A distinguished divine of unusually solemn and impressive appearance went to a country town to lecture. He arrived early in the afternoon, and all the town, of course, spotted him within five minutes as a very great and saintly man. He went into a chemist's shop, and in tones that froze the young blood of the shopman said:

"Young—man—do—you—smoke?"

"Y-yes, sir," said the trembling clerk. "I'm sorry, but I learned the habit young, and haven't been able to leave it off."

"Then," said the great divine, without the movement of a muscle or the abatement of a shade of the awful solemnity of his voice, "can you tell me where I can get a good cigar?"

A Bit of His Own Back.

A farmer had just given his son a sound thrashing because he had accidentally killed one of his favourite fowls, and left him in the house sobbing while he went to look after his pigs. Presently the minister came up to the door, and asked:

"Is your father in?"

"No," replied the boy sulkily.

"Where has he gone?"

"He's in the pig-pen feedin' the pigs."

"Thank you, my little man; I'll go and see him."

The minister had not got many yards away when the boy called out:

"Oi say, minister, you'll know which is 'e; 'e's got a cap on!"

His New Hat.

A well-known clergymen of somewhat arbitrary manners was engaged to preach in a fashionable district, and purchased a new hat for the occasion. His guide, after what the parson thought a rude stare and smile, said:

"I beg your pardon, sir, your hat——"

"Oh, yes, never mind the hat, but your own business," said the clergyman curtly, and the young man was silenced.

The people they met stared and smiled, too.

"Strange how many notice when one has got a new hat," thought the parson.

The vicar met him at the church door, and, hesitating, said:

"Pardon me, but why do you wear your hat so?"

The tile was doffed, and found to be still covered with the white paper, which the unconscious parson had forgotten to remove.

He Thought Aloud.

In the North of England there was a man who engaged a lawyer to conduct a case in court. As the lawyer was not talking exactly to suit him, he got up to make a few remarks himself. The magistrate, of course, made him resume his seat. He got up again, and the magistrate made him resume his seat again. A third and fourth time this happened, and finally the old farmer got up and said:

"Well, sir, if you won't let me talk, won't you let me think?"

"Yes, certainly," replied the magistrate.

"Well, sir," he said, "I think you and all these lawyers are a set of sneakin' rascals."

Gallery Wit.

A funny story of the East-end stage refers to a popular actor named Harry Simmonds. He was supposed in a melodrama of the day to have run through a fortune, and to contemplate suicide. Someone knocked at the door of his wretched garret. He hastily thrust his revolver into the drawer of the table at which he sat. An old solicitor entered.

"It is my pleasing duty," said he, "to tell you that your Uncle John is dead, and" (impressively) "has left you half a million of money."

"Half a million of money!" said the suicide, thus suddenly restrained; "what shall I do with it—what shall I do with it?"

"Well, 'Arry," said a gallery boy, "I should buy a pair of boots—first!"

Open or Shut?

First Guest: "Hi! Waiter, open that window, please. I can't stand this heat."

Waiter: "Yes, d'rectly, sir!" (Opens the window.)

Second Guest (a little later): "Waiter, there's draught enough to give one a death of cold. Do shut the window."

Waiter: "Yes, sir." (Shuts the window.)

First Guest: "Waiter, are you mad? What have you closed the window for? Open it again this minute."

Waiter: "Very good, sir." (Goes to the landlord.) "One of the gentlemen wants the window open and the other wants it shut. What am I to do, sir?"

Landlord: "Do what the gentleman says who hasn't dined yet, of course."

Englishmen as Foreign Waiters.

While in Petersburg we encountered an Englishman who was consumed with thirst.

"And I don't know the name of a single drink in their language," he said ruefully.

"Bluff it out," observed a member of our party. "Go into one of these cafés, and call for what you want as if you knew all about it."

He did so, but he tried to speak Russian, as he did French, by the natural method.

"Viski!" he said to the waiter.

"Certainly, sir. Scotch or Irish?" replied the Russian.

How She Said "Yes."

A Lancashire lady has been relating a rather pretty story about a factory girl's way of answering a marriage proposal made to her.

"The young woman could not write or read writing, and one day she brought a letter to me to read for her. It contained an offer of marriage.

"I happened to know that the writer was a deserving young artisan, so I said to her: 'Now, you must consider this matter very seriously, and if you like to come to me when you have made up your mind, I will write a reply for you.'

"A day or two afterwards I met the girl again and asked her if she wanted me to answer the letter for her. 'Oh, that is all right,' said she, looking radiant and pleased. 'I've settled it. I answered it myself.'

"'Why, how did you do it?' I asked.

"And then she told me that she could make a capital 'I,' and that she stuck on the paper a piece of wool after it for 'wull'—'I wool.'"

THE REAL AND THE COUNTERFEIT.

"AND you say that the diamonds were very valuable?" interrogated a plainly dressed man, seated at one side of the table.

"Worth £5,000, Mr.—what may I call your name?" asked Harold Brewster.

"Oh—Smith," responded the man.

"Quite a common name that, but I suppose it will suffice as well as any," said Mr. Brewster.

"Precisely."

A short interval of silence then elapsed. It is quite evident that the two are studying one another; Mr. Brewster because the man is a stranger, and the latter because it is his calling. Finally Mr. Brewster broke the silence by asking:

"You are a detective?"

Smith acknowledged this by simply bowing.

"And you think, Mr. Smith, that you can help me to recover the jewels?"

"I can try——"

"So can any one of you try," quickly interrupted Brewster.

"Let me finish, please," said Smith. "When I try I generally succeed. If you wish my services, give me some points. Tell me who the diamonds belong to. Give me some explicit idea as to their forms, number, and the like. I cannot work in the dark and blindfolded, Mr. Brewster."

"That's a fact. Well, in the first place, the jewels are only family heirlooms. They consist of a pair of bracelets, eardrops, and a necklace. Ah! by the way, I can give you a better idea by these," said Mr. Brewster, taking from a drawer a box. He took the cover off, and there, ensconsed among downy cotton, was a perfect mass of glittering, shimmering jewels. Smith uttered an ejaculation of surprise as his eyes fell upon the sparkling gems.

"You seem surprised, Smith. Well, they are pretty fair counterfeits," said Brewster, as he laid the diamonds upon the table.

"Counterfeits, did you say?" asked Smith as he bent over to examine them.

"Precisely; they are but paste representations. They are the same in size and number as the originals; were made expressly for such an occasion as this. Please examine them closely, Mr. Smith, for by these we must recover the originals."

The detective took the pieces up one by one, and examined them closely. He counted the stones, noticed, the quaint, old-fashioned setting, which was intricate delicate, and a marvel of skilled handiwork.

"And you say these are 'bogus'?"

"Yes, sir. If the originals were here you could then compare the two sets."

"Who usually wore the real ones?"

"My daughter, which was seldom; for she is an invalid, and goes in society but little. Poor Lucy! She does not even know that the diamonds are missing."

"Does not know? What do you mean, Mr. Brewster?"

"The two sets were kept in a secret drawer in my desk at home—the originals in a plain white box; these in a blue box, as you see."

"Precisely. Go on."

"If possible I would like to recover the diamonds before my daughter finds out about the matter. You may proceed in your own manner, Mr. Smith. If you succeed in recovering the jewels and punishing the thief, I shall not hesitate to reward you handsomely."

"Of course, you will allow me to take these," said Smith, pointing to the counterfeits.

"Certainly; they are only paste," said Mr. Brewster, who laid the bogus jewels back into their downy nest.

Smith took the box, rose, buttoned his coat, and turned to leave, when he suddenly asked, as he looked over his shoulder.

"Does your daughter know of the existence of these bogus jewels?"

"She does."

"Let me see—you have a son?" inquired Mr. Smith.

"I have."

"Is he a member of the firm?"

"No, sir."

"What does he do?"

"Sir, my son is a gentleman of leisure."

"That's all; good!" and the door closed behind the officer's form.

Jack Smith was one of the best men in the force. He was sharp, cunning, and knew not the meaning of the word fear. As he wended his way from Harold Brewster's office he began to cogitate, to wonder if there was no possible light ahead concerning the case in hand.

Just as he was about to pass a jewellery store a sudden thought illuminated his mind.

He stepped in, and showing the bogus diamonds to the proprietor, asked him one question.

When Jack Smith emerged from the door a strange look was upon his face, and he hugged the box more closely to his breast as he threaded the great throng.

Fred Brewster was one of those gay, petted darlings of society, of which London has a surfeit. He toiled not, neither did he spin, yet no one of the fashionable set in which he moved had finer raiment nor spent money more lavishly.

Perhaps if Fred had had some aim in life, his existence would not have been as vapid as it was. But, as the case stood, he was rapidly going to the dogs. He knew it, and his boon companions knew it; but he cared as little for his mistaken career as they did. He was petted by his mother, and sister, and his father condoned his many foibles by saying:

"Let the boy sow his wild oats; he'll settle down soon enough."

The young man gambled, was a frequenter of sporting circles of every description, and did not disdain to bet hundreds of pounds on a single race. Upon the evening following the interview between Harold Brewster and the detective, while Fred was in one of the noted gambling resorts in Soho, he found that a plainly-dressed man of middle-age was watching him closely.

It troubled him exceedingly, and made him careless in his play. The consequence was, when he rose from the table, he found that he had lost one hundred pounds. He went to the bar and called for brandy. After drinking it he took his departure. The middle-aged man who watched him so closely was at his heels.

"Look here, my man," said Fred, turning to the other when the pair had reached the street, "am I such an object of curiosity that you must needs keep your eyes upon me?"

"Be calm, Mr. Fred Brewster. I arrest you in the name of the law," said Jack Smith; for he it was, in one of his many disguises.

"Good Heavens! Arrest me! For what?" gasped the young man, starting back.

"No matter; come with me," simply returned Smith. The young man saw that it would be useless to offer resistance, and so he accompanied the officer. A strange expression of fear came over Fred Brewster's face when the officer told him to step into a pawnshop with him just off the Strand.

"The ticket, please," said Smith.

Fred trembled in every limb; his face was the picture of abject despair.

"What—what do you—mean?" he ejaculated.

"The pawn ticket for the diamonds," whispered the detective.

Fred took his pocket-book out, and extricating the slip of paper from its contents, passed it to Mr. Smith.

"Now, friend Jacob, I'll take that lot of diamonds in the white box, please," said Smith, handing the ticket to the Jew behind the counter.

"Yes, mine frent, but I must haf mine monish, five pounds, and one for de use of de monish," returned the Jew.

Smith handed him the required amount, and took the diamonds. After the pair had reached the street, the detective said to the astonished young man:

"Now, my young man, let me give you a piece of advice; mend your ways; change your manner of living, and be a man for your mother's sake."

"And am I at liberty?" asked Fred, as the other turned to leave.

"You are; go and do the right thing hereafter. But recollect there is one man who knows of your crime, and will not hesitate to use this incident against you if you ever give him occasion."

The next day, Harold Brewster was seated in his office. he was startled by the appearance of Smith, the detective.

"Ah, Smith, I see by your face that you have succeeded."

"I have; there are your diamonds," said Smith, laying the two boxes upon the table.

"I'm so happy! Are they not beauties?" asked Mr. Brewster, lifting the glittering jewels from the white box.

"They are fair," replied Smith smiling.

"Fair! What do you mean? They are worth five thousand pounds. Compare them with these," said Brewster, taking the jewels from the blue box.

"Suppose you tell me which are the originals and the genuine ones," said Smith.

Mr. Brewster looked up quickly and asked:

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this, Mr. Brewster—the real diamonds have not been stolen at all."

"Eh? not stolen? I—bless my soul! What do you mean, man?"

"It is the truth, Mr. Brewster. The boxes must have got changed, or rather the contents. You gave me the real diamonds, but I have recovered the bogus ones."

The listener was so thoroughly astonished that he could not speak at first. Finally he asked:

"How did you learn of it?"

Smith then told the astonished merchant how he had stepped into a jeweller's store and asked the proprietor to examine the jewels and tell him their value. He also told Mr. Brewster how he had found the paste gems in a pawnshop.

"And did you not capture the thief?" asked Mr. Brewster.

"Don't press that part of the case, Mr. Brewster, please. I think he has had a lesson."

After receiving remuneration for his services the detective took his departure.

Mr. Brewster never questioned his son because of his altered manner of living, but he imagined he knew the reason of Fred's change for the better.

CHAPTER LXIII. (continued).

THEY descended together to the engine-room, and meanwhile the air-ship sank through the clouds until the lights of Aberdeen lay about a thousand feet below. A lens of red glass had been fitted to the searchlight of the Ithuriel, and all that was necessary was to connect the forward engine with the dynamo.

Arnold put Natasha's hand on a little lever. As she took hold of it she thought with a shudder of the mighty forces of destruction which her next movement would let loose. Then she thought of her mother, betrayed, degraded, and murdered amidst the snows of Siberia, of her father crippled in the prime of his life, and of all the nameless horrors of the rule whose death-signal she was about to give.

As she did so her grip tightened on the lever, and when Arnold, having given his orders to the head engineer as to speed and course, put his hand on her shoulder and said, "Now!" she pulled it back with a sharp, determined motion, and the next instant a broad fan of blood-red light shot over the Ithuriel's bows.

At the same moment the air-ship's propellers began to spin round, and with the flood of red light streaming in front of her, she headed her way full speed towards Edinburgh. The signal flashed over the Scottish capital, and then the Ithuriel swerved round to the westward.

Half-an-hour later Glasgow saw it, and then away she sped southward across the border to Carlisle, and so through the long December night she flew hither and thither, eastward and westward, flashing the red battle-signal over field and village and town, and wherever it shone armed men sprang up like the fruit of the fabled dragon's teeth, companies were mustered in streets and squares and fields and marched to railway stations, and soon long trains, one after another in endless succession, got into motion, all moving towards the south and east, all converging upon London.

Last of all, after it had made a swift circuit of northern and central and western England, the red light swept along the south coast, and then swerved northward again till it flashed thrice over London, and then it vanished into the darkness of the hour before the dawn of Armageddon.

Since the ever-memorable night of Thursday, the 29th of July, 1588, three hundred and sixteen years before, when "The beacon blazed upon the roof of Edgcumbe's lofty Hall," and the answering fires sprang up "From Eddystone to Berwick bounds, from Lynn to Milford Bay," to tell that the Spanish Armada was in sight, there had been no such night in England, nor had men ever dreamed that there should be.

But great as had been the deeds done by the heroes of the sixteenth century with the pigmy means at their command, they were but the merest child's play to the awful storm of destruction which, in a few hours, was to burst over southern England. Then it was England against Spain; now it was Anglo-Saxondom against the world; and the conquering race of earth, armed with the most terrific powers of destruction that human wit had ever devised, was rising in its wrath, millions strong, to wipe out the stain of invasion from the sacred soil of the Motherland of the Anglo-Saxon nations.

CHAPTER LXIV.

THE OLD LION AT BAY.

THE morning of the 6th of December dawned grey and cold over London and the hosts that were waiting for its surrender. Scarcely any smoke rose from the myriad chimneys of the vast city, for the coal was almost all burnt, and what was left was selling at £12 a ton. Wood was so scarce that people were tearing up the wood-work of their houses to keep a little fire going.

So the steel-grey sky remained clear, for towards daybreak the clouds had been condensed by a cold north-easter into a sharp fall of fine, icy snow, and as the sun gained power it shone chilly over the whitened landscape, the innumerable roofs of London, and the miles of tents lining the hills to the north and south of the Thames valley.

The havoc wrought by the bombardment on the public buildings of the great city had been terrible. Of the Houses of Parliament only a shapeless heap of broken stones remained, the Law Courts were in ruins, what had been the Albert Hall was now a roofless ring of blackened walls, Nelson's Column lay shattered across Trafalgar Square, and the Royal Exchange, the Bank of England, and the Mansion House mingled their fragments in the heart of the almost deserted City.

Only three of the great buildings of London had suffered no damage. These were the British Museum, Westminster Abbey, and St. Paul's, which had been spared in accordance with special orders issued by the commanders of the League. The two former were spared for the same reason that the Germans had spared Strasburg Cathedral in 1870—because their destruction would have been a loss, not to Britain alone, but to the world.

The great church of the metropolis had been left untouched chiefly because it had been arranged that, on the fall of London, the Tsar was to be proclaimed Emperor of Asia under its dome, and at the same time General le Gallifet was to assume the Dictatorship of France and abolish the Republic, which for more than ten years had been the plaything of unprincipled financiers and the laughing-stock of Europe. As the sun rose the great golden cross, rising high out of the wilderness of houses, shone more and more brightly under the brightening sky, and millions of eyes looked upon it from within the City and from without with feelings far asunder as triumph and defeat.

At daybreak the last meal had been eaten by the defenders of the City. To supply it almost every animal left in London had been sacrificed, and the last drop of liquor was drunk, even to the last bottle of wine in the Royal cellars, which the King shared with his two commanders-in-chief, Lord Roberts and Lord Wolseley, in the presence of the troops on the balcony of Buckingham Palace.

At nine o'clock the King and Queen attended service in St. Paul's, and when they left the Cathedral half-an-hour later the besiegers on the heights were astounded to hear the bells of all the steeples left standing in London ring out in a triumphant series of peals which rippled away eastward and westward from St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, caught up and carried on by steeple after steeple, until from Highgate to Dulwich, and from Hammersmith to Canning Town, the beleagured and starving city might have been celebrating some great triumph or deliverance.

The astonished besiegers could only put the extraordinary manifestation down to joy on the part of the citizens at the near approaching end of the siege, but before the bells of London had been ringing for half-an-hour this fallacious idea was dispelled from their minds in a very stern and summary fashion.

Since nightfall there had been no communication with the secret agents of the League in the various towns of England and Scotland. At ten o'clock a small company of Cossacks spurred and flogged their jaded horses up the northern slope of Muswell Hill, on which the Tsar had fixed his headquarters. Nearly every man was wounded, and the horses were in the last stages of exhaustion.

Their captain was at once admitted to the presence of the Tsar, and, flinging himself on the ground before the enraged Autocrat, gasped out the dreadful tidings that his little company were the sole survivors of the army of occupation that had been left at Harwich, and which, twelve hours before, had been thirty thousand strong.

A huge fleet of strange-looking vessels flying a plain blood-red flag had just before forced the approaches to the harbour, sunk every transport and warship with guns that were fired without flame, or smoke, or report, and whose projectiles shattered everything that they struck. Immediately afterwards an immense flotilla of transports had steamed in, and, under the protection of these terrible guns, had landed a hundred thousand men, all dressed in the same plain grey uniform, with no facings or ornaments save a knot of red ribbon at the button-hole, and armed with magizine rifle and a bayonet, and a brace of revolvers. All were English by their speech, and every man appeared to know exactly what to do with very few orders from his officers.

This invading force had hunted the Russians out of Harwich like rabbits out of a warren, while the ships in the harbour had hurled their shells up into the air so that they fell back to earth on the retreating army and exploded with frightful effect. The general in command had at once telegraphed to London for a detachment of war-balloons and reinforcements, but no response had been received.

After four hours' fighting the Russian Army was in full retreat, while the attacking force was constantly increasing as transport after transport steamed into the harbour and landed her men. At Colchester the Russians had been met by another vast army which had apparently sprung from the earth, dressed and armed exactly as the invading force was. What its numbers were there was no possibility of telling.

By this time, too, treachery began to show itself in the Russian ranks, and whole companies suddenly appeared with the red knot of ribbon in their tunics, and instantly turned their weapons against their comrades, shooting them down without warning or mercy. No quarter had been given to those who did not show the ribbon. Most of them died fighting, but those who had thrown down their arms were shot down all the same.

Whoever commanded the strange army had manifestly given orders to take no prisoners, and it was equally certain that its movements were directed by the Terrorists, for everywhere the battle cries had been, "In the Master's name!" and "Slay and spare not!"

The whole of the army, save the deserters, had been destroyed, and the deserters had immediately assumed the grey uniforms of those of the Terrorist army who had fallen. The Cossack captain and his forty or fifty followers were the sole remains of a body of three thousand men who had fought their way through the second army. The whole country to the north and east seemed alive with the grey soldiery, and it was only after a hundred hair-breadth escapes that they had managed to reach the protection of the lines round London.

Such was the tale of the bringer of bad tidings to the Tsar at the moment when he was looking forward to the crowning triumph of his reign. Like the good soldier that he was, he wasted no time in thinking at a moment when everything depended on instant action.

He at once despatched a war-balloon to the French and Italian headquarters with a note containing the terrible news from Harwich, and requesting Generals le Gallifet and Cosenz to lose no time in communicating with the eastern and southern ports, and in throwing out corps of observation, supported by war-balloons. Evidently the American Government had played the League false at the last moment, and had allied herself with Britain.

As soon as he had sent off this message, the Tsar ordered a fleet of forty aerostats to proceed to the north-eastward in advance of a force of infantry and cavalry numbering three hundred thousand men, and supported by fifty batteries of field and machine-guns, which he detached to stop the progress of the Federation army towards London.

Before this force was in motion a reply came back from General le Gallifet to the effect that all communication with the south and east was stopped, and that an aerostat, which had been on scout duty during the night, had returned with the news that the whole country appeared to be up in arms from Portsmouth to Dover. Corps of observation and a fleet of thirty aerostats had been sent out, and three army corps were already on the march to the south and east.

Meanwhile, the hour for the surrender of London was drawing very near, and all the while the bells were sending their mingled melody of peals and carillons up into the clear frosty air with a defiant joyousness that seemed to speak of anything but surrender. As twelve o'clock approached the guns of all the batteries on the heights were loaded and trained on different parts of the city, and the whole of the forces left after the detachment of the armies that had been sent to engage the battalions of the Federation prepared to descend upon the devoted city from all sides after the two hours' incessant bombardment that had been ordered to precede the general attack.

It had been arranged that if the city surrendered a white flag was to be hoisted on the cross of St. Paul's.

Within a few minutes of twelve the Tsar ascended to the roof of the Alexandra Palace on Muswell Hill, and turned his field glasses on the towering dome. His face and lips were bloodless with repressed but intense anxiety, but the hands that held the glasses to his eyes were as steady as though he had been watching a review of his own troops.

It was the supreme moment of his victorious career. He was practically master of Europe. Only Britain held out. The relieving forces would be rent in fragments by his war-balloons, and then decimated by his troops as the legions of Germany and Austria had been. The capital of the English-speaking world lay starving at his feet, and a few minutes would see——

Ha! there goes the flag at last. A little ball of white bunting creeps up from the gallery over the dark dome. It clears the railing under the pedestal, and climbs to the apex of the shining cross. As it does so the wild chorus of the bells suddenly ceases, and out of the silence that follows some the deep booming strokes of the great bell of St. Paul's sounding the hour of twelve.

As the last stroke dies away the ball bursts, and the White Ensign of Britain crossed by the red cross of St. George, and with the Jack in the corner, floats out defiantly on the breeze, greeted by the re-awakening clamour of the bells, and a deep hoarse cry from millions of throats, that rolls like a vast sea of sound up the slopes to the encampments of the League.

With an irrepressible cry of rage, Alexander dashed his field-glass to the ground, and shouted, in a voice broken with passion:

"So! They have tricked us. Let the bombardment begin at once, and bring that flag down with the first shots!"

But before the words were out of his mouth the bombardment had already commenced in a very different fashion from that in which he had intended that it should begin. So intense had been the interest with which all eyes had been turned on the Cross of St. Paul's that no one had noticed twelve little points of shining light hanging high in air over the batteries of the besiegers, six to the north and six to the south.

But the moment that the Ensign of St. George floated from the summit of St. Paul's a rapid series of explosions roared out like a succession of thunderclaps along the lines of the batteries. The hills of Surrey, and Kent, and Middlesex were suddenly transformed into volcanoes spouting flame and thick black smoke, and flinging clouds of dust and fragments of darker objects high into the air.

The order of the Tsar was obeyed in part only, for by the time that the word to recommence the bombardment had been flashed round the circuit of the entrenchments more than half the batteries had been put out of action. The twelve air-ships stationed at equal intervals round the vast ellipse, and discharging their No. 3 shell from their four guns ahead and astern, from an elevation of four thousand feet, had simultaneously wrecked half the batteries of the besiegers before their occupants had any clear idea of what was really happening.

Wherever one of those shells fell and burst, earth, and stone, and iron melted into dust under the terrific force of the exploding gases, and the air-ships, moving with a velocity compared with which the utmost speed of the aerostats was as a snail's pace, flitted hither and thither wherever a battery got into action and destroyed it before the second round had been fired.

There were still twenty-five aerostats at the command of the Tsar which had not been sent against the relieving forces, and as soon as it was realised that the aeriel bombardment of the batteries came from the air-ships of the Terrorist fleet they were sent into the air to engage them at all hazards. They outnumbered them two to one, but there was no comparison between the manœuvring powers of the two aerial squadrons.

As soon as the aerostats rose into the air the Terrorist fleet receded northward and southward from the batteries. Their guns had a six-mile range, and it did not matter to them which side of the assailed area they lay. They could still hurl their explosives with the same deadly precision on the appointed mark. But with the aerostats it was a very different matter. They could only drop their shells vertically, and where they were not exactly above the object of attack, their shells exploded with comparative harmlessness.

Thus the Terrorist fleet, sweeping hither and thither, in wide and ever-changing curves, lured the most dangerous foes of the beleagured city farther and farther away from the real scene of action at the very time when they were most urgently needed to support the attacking forces which at that moment were being poured into London.

To destroy the air-ships seemed an impossibility, since they could move at five times the speed of the swiftest aerostat, and yet to return to the bombardment of the city was to leave them free to commit what havoc they pleased upon the encampments of the armies of the League. So they were drawn farther and farther away, while their agile enemies, still keeping within their six-mile range, evaded their shells, and yet kept up a constant discharge of their own projectiles upon the salient points of the attack on London.

By four o'clock in the afternoon all the batteries of the besiegers had been put out of action by the aerial bombardment. It was now a matter of man to man and steel to steel, and so the gauge of final battle was accepted, and as dusk began to fall over the beleagured city the Russian, French, and Italian hosts left their lines and descended from their vantage ground to the assault on London, where the old Lion at bay was waiting for them with claws bared and teeth grinning defiance.

CHAPTER LXV.

The Turn of the Battle-Tide.

The force which the Tsar had detached to operate against the Federation Army of the North left the headquarters at eleven o'clock and proceeded in four main divisions by Edmonton, Chingford, Chigwell, and Romford. The aerostats, regulating their speed so as to keep touch with the land force, maintained a position two miles ahead of it at three thousand feet elevation.

Strict orders had been given to press on at the utmost speed and to use every means to discover the Federationists and bring them to an engagement with as little delay as possible, but they marched on hour after hour into the dusk of the early winter evening with the sounds of battle growing fainter in their rear without meeting with a sign of the enemy.

As it would have been the height of imprudence to have advanced in the dark into a hostile country occupied by an enemy of great but unknown strength, General Pralitzin, the Commander of the Russian force, decided to bring his men to a halt at nightfall, and therefore took up a series of positions between Cheshunt, Epping, Chipping Ongar, and Ingatestone. From these points squadrons of Cossacks scoured the country in all directions, north, east, and west, in search of the so far invisible enemy; and at the same time he sent mounted messengers back to headquarters to report that no enemy had been found, and to ask for further orders.

The aerostats slowed down their engines until their propellers just counteracted the force of the wind, and they hung motionless at a height of a thousand feet, ranged in a semi-circle about fifteen miles long over the heads of the columns.

All this time the motions of the Russian army had been watched by the captain of the Ithuriel from an elevation of eight thousand feet five miles to the rear. As soon as he saw them making preparations for a halt, and had noticed the disposition of the aerostats, he left the conning-tower which he had occupied nearly all day, and went into the after-saloon, where he found Natas and Natasha examining a large plan of London and its environs.

"They have come to a halt at last," he said, "and if they only remain where they are for three hours longer, we have the whole army like rats in a trap, war-balloons and all. They have not seen us so far, for if they had they would certainly have sent an aerostat aloft to reconnoitre, and, of course, I must have destroyed it. The whole forty are arranged in a semi-circle over the heads of the four main columns in divisions of ten."

"And what do you propose to do with them now you have got them?" said Natasha, looking up with a welcoming smile.

"Give me a cup of coffee first, for I am cold to the marrow, and then I'll tell you," replied Arnold, seating himself at the table, on which stood a coffee-urn with a spirit lamp beneath it, something after the style of a Russian samovar.

Natasha filled a cup and passed it to him, and he went on:

"You remember what I said to Tremayne in the Princess's sitting-room at Petersburg about the eagle and the crows just before the trial of the Tsar's first war-balloons. Well, if you like to spend a couple of hours with me in the conning-tower as soon as it is dark enough for us to descend I will show you what I meant then. I suppose the original general orders stand good?" he said, turning to Natas.

"Yes," replied the Master gravely. "They must all be destroyed. This is the day of vengeance and not of mercy. If my orders have been obeyed, all the men belonging to the International in this force will have managed to get to the ear by nightfall. They can be left to take care of themselves. Mazanoff assured me that all the members in the armies of the League fully understood what they are to do. Some of the war-balloons have been taken possession of by our men, and we don't know how many. As soon as you destroy the first of the fleet, these will rise and commence operations on the army, and they will also fly the red flag, so there will be no fear of your mistaking them."

"Very well," said Arnold, who had been quietly sipping his coffee while he listened to the utterance of this death sentence on more than a quarter of a million of men. "If our fellows to the northward only obey orders promptly, there will not be many of the Russians left by sunrise. Now, Natasha, you had better put on your furs and come to the conning-tower; it's about time to begin."

It did not take her many moments to wrap up, and within five minutes she and Arnold were standing in the conning-tower watching the camp fires of the Russian host coming nearer and nearer as the Ithuriel sank down through the rapidly increasing darkness towards the long dotted line which marked the position of the aerostats, whose great gas-holders stood out black and distinct against the whitened earth beneath them.

By means of electric signals to the engineers the captain of the Ithuriel was able to regulate both the speed and the elevation of the air-ship as readily as though he had himself been in charge of the engine-room. Giving Natasha a pair of night glasses, and telling her to keep a bright look-out ahead, he brought the Ithuriel round by the westward to a position about five miles west of the extremity of the line of war-balloons, and as soon as he got on a level with it he advanced comparatively slowly until Natasha was able to make it out distinctly with the night glass.

Then he signalled to the wheel-house aft to disconnect the after-wheel, and at the same moment he took hold of the spokes of the forward wheel in the conning-tower. The next signal was "Full speed ahead," and as the Ithuriel gathered way and rushed forward on her errand of destruction he said hurriedly to Natasha:

"Now don't speak till it's over. I want all my wits for this work, and you'll want all your eyes."

Without speaking Natasha glanced up at his face, and saw on it somewhat of the same expression that she had seen at the moment when he put the Ariel at the rock-wall which barred the entrance to Aeria. His face was pale, and his lips were set, and his eyes looked straight out from under his frowning brows with an angry gleam in them that boded ill for the fate of those against whom he was about to use the irresistible engine of destruction under his command.

Twenty feet in front of them stretched out the long keen ram of the air-ship, edged and pointed like a knife. This was the sole weapon that he intended to use. It was impossible to train the guns at the tremendous speed at which the Ithuriel was travelling, but under the circumstance the ram was the deadliest weapon that could have been employed.

In four minutes from the time the Ithuriel started on her eastward course the nearest war-balloon was only fifty yards away. The air-ship, travelling at a speed of nearly two hundred miles an hour, leapt out of the dusk like a flash of white light. In ten seconds more her ram had passed completely through the gasholder without so much as a shock being felt. The next one was only five hundred yards away. Obedient to her rudder the Ithuriel swerved, ripped her gasholder from end to end, and then darted upon the next one even before a terrific explosion in their rear told that the car of the first one had struck the earth.

So she sped along the whole line, darting hither and thither in obedience to the guiding hand that controlled her, with such inconceivable rapidity that before any of the unwieldy machines, saving only those whose occupants had been prepared for the assault, had time to get out of the way of the destroying ram, she had rent her way through the gas-holders of twenty-eight out of the forty balloons and flung them to the earth to explode and spread consternation and destruction all along the van of the army encamped below.

From beginning to end the attack had not lasted ten minutes. When the last of the aerostats had gone down under his terrible ram Arnold signalled "Stop and ascend," to the engine-room. A second signal turned on the search-light in the bow, and from this a rapid series of flashes were sent up to the sky to the northward and eastward.

The effect was as fearful as it was instantaneous. The twelve war-balloons which had escaped by flying the red flag took up their positions above the Russian lines, and began to drop their fire-shell and cyanogen bombs upon the masses of men below. The air-ship, swerving round again to the westward, with her fan wheels aloft, moved slowly across the wild area over which men and horses were wildly rushing hither and thither in vain attempts to escape the rain of death that was falling upon them from the sky.

Her search-light, turned downwards to the earth, sought out the spots where they were crowded most thickly together, and then the air-ship's guns came into play also. Arnold had given orders to use the new fire-shell exclusively, and its effects proved to be frightful beyond description. Wherever one fell a blaze of intense light shone for an instant upon the earth. Then this burst into a thousand fragments, which leapt into the air and spread themselves far and wide in all directions, burning with inextinguishable fury for several minutes, and driving men and horses mad with agony and terror.

No human fortitude or discipline could withstand the fearful rain of fire, in comparison with which even the deadly hail from the aerostats seemed insignificant. For half-an-hour the eight guns of the Ithuriel hurled these awful projectiles in all directions, scattering death and hopeless confusion wherever they alighted, until the whole field of carnage seemed ablaze with them.

At the end of this time three rockets soared up from her deck into the dark sky, and burst into myriads of brilliant white stars, which for a few moments shed an unearthly light upon the scene of indescribable confusion and destruction below. But they made more than this visible, for by their momentary light could be seen seemingly interminable lines of grey-clad figures swiftly closing in from all sides, chasing the Cossack scouts before them in upon the completely disorganised Russian host.

A few minutes later a continuous roll of musketry burst out on front, flank, and rear, and a ceaseless hail of rifle bullets began to plough its way through the helpless masses of the soldiers of the Tsar. They formed as well as they could to confront these new enemies, but the moment that the search-light of the air-ship, constantly sweeping the field, fell upon a company in anything like order a shell descended in the midst of it and broke it up again.

All night long the work of death and vengeance went on, the grey lines ever closing nearer and nearer upon the dwindling remnants of the Russian army. Hour after hour the hail of bullets never slackened. There was no random firing on the part of the Federation soldiers. Every man had been trained to use his rifle rapidly but deliberately, and never to fire until he had found his mark; and the consequence was that the long nickel-tipped bullets, fired point-blank into the dense masses of men, rent their way through half-a-dozen bodies before they were spent.

At last the grey light began to break over such a scene of carnage as human eyes had never before gazed upon. Scarcely ten thousand men remained of the three hundred thousand who had started the day before in obedience to the order of the Tsar; and these were split up into formless squads and ragged companies fighting desperately, amidst heaps of corpses, for dear life, without any pretence at order or formation.

The cannonade from the air had ceased, and the last scene in the drama of death had come. With bayonets fixed and rifles lowered to the charge, the long grey lines closed up, and, as the bugles rang out the long-awaited order, they swept forward at the double, horses and men went down like a field of standing corn under the irresistible rush of half a million bayonets, and in twenty minutes all was over. Not a man of the whole Russian army was left alive, save those whose knot of red ribbon at the button-hole proclaimed them members of the International.

As soon as it was light enough for Arnold to see clearly that the fate of the Russians was finally decided, he descended to the earth, and, after complimenting the commander and officers of the Federation troops on the splendid effectiveness of their force, and their admirable discipline and coolness, he gave orders for a two hours' rest and then a march on the Russian headquarters at Muswell Hill with every available man. The Tsar and his staff were to be taken alive at all hazards; every other Russian who did not wear the International ribbon was to be shot down without mercy.

These orders given, the Ithuriel mounted into the air again and disappeared in the direction of London. She passed over the now shattered and silent entrenchments of the Russians at a speed which made it possible to remain on deck without discomfort or danger and at an elevation of two thousand feet. Natas was below in the saloon, alone with his own thoughts, the thoughts of twenty-five years of waiting and working and gradual approach to the hour of vengeance which was now so near. Andrew Smith was steering in the wheel-house, Lieutenant Marston was taking his watch below, after being on deck nearly the whole of the previous night, and Arnold and Natasha, wrapped in their warm furs, were pacing up and down the deck engaged in conversation which had not altogether to do with the war.

The sun had risen before the Ithuriel passed over London, and through the clear, cold air they could see with their field-glasses signs of carnage and destruction which made Natasha's soul sicken within her to gaze upon them, and even shook Arnold's now hardened nerves.

All the main thoroughfares leading into London from the north and south were choked with heaps of dead bodies in Russian, French, and Italian uniforms, in the midst of which those who still survived were being forced forward by the pressure of those behind. Every house that remained standing was spouting flames upon them from its windows, and where the streets opened into squares and wider streets there were barricades manned by British and Federation troops, and from their summits and loopholes the quick-firing guns were raining an incessant hail of shot and shell upon the struggling masses pent up in the streets.

A horrible chorus of the rattle of small arms, the harsh, grinding roar of the machine guns, the hurrahs of the defenders, and the cries of rage and agony from the baffled and decimated assailants rose unceasingly to their ears as they passed over the last battlefield of the western nations, where the Anglo-Saxon, the Russ, and the Gaul, were locked in the death struggle.

"There is some awful work going on down there," said Arnold, as they headed away towards the south, where, from behind the Surrey hills soon came the sound of some tremendous conflict. "For the present we must leave them to fight it out. They don't seem to have had such easy work of it to the south as we have had to the north, but I didn't expect they would, for they have probably detached a very much larger force of French and Italians to attack the Army of the South than the Russian lot we had to deal with."

"Is all this frightful slaughter really necessary?" asked Natasha, slipping her arm through his and looking up at him with eyes which for the first time were moistened by the tears of pity for her enemies.

"Necessary or not," replied Arnold, "it is the Master's orders, and I have only to obey them. This is the day of vengeance for which he has waited so long, and you can hardly expect him to show much mercy. It lies between him and Tremayne. For my part I will stay my hand only when I am ordered to do so.

"Still, if anyone can influence Natas to mercy, you can. Nothing can now stop the slaughter on the north, I'm afraid, for the Russians are caught in a hopeless trap. The Londoners are enraged beyond control, and if the men spared them I believe the women would tear them to pieces. But there are two millions of lives or so to be saved at the south, and perhaps there is still time to do it. It would be a task worthy of the Angel of the Revolution; why should you not try it?"

"I will do so," said Natasha, and without another word she turned away and walked quickly towards the entrance to the saloon.

Said One Shopper: "Oh, I saw just the loveliest, sweetest, prettiest baby a minute ago."

Said the Other Shopper: "What! Do you mean to tell me that stupid nurse has dared to bring out my little darling such a day as this?"

"Did you know that I passed your door last evening?" said the young man tenderly.

"Of course," replied the beautiful girl, with reproach in her glistening eyes. "Do you think I would not know your step?"

"Certainly," said the happy young man, as he directed the conversation away from the subject, and avoided remarking that he had passed the door in a cab.

The Brain Gymnasium.

On this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set will be comparatively easy of solution, while others will be designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the sender of the greatest number of correct solutions, and to the senders of the ten next highest number of c rrect ones will be presented either one of our silver-plated pencil cases or a copy of a popular six-shilling novel. Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, February 5th, 1900.

With a MACFADDEN

WRIST MACHINE

Physicians and Athletes have generally concurred that the wrist is the weakest portion of the human frame. It is the portion of the anatomy where strength is measured.

A person with weak wrists is a weak person constitutionally. When the wrists are strengthened the entire muscular system is made stronger.

There is no point in a man's anatomy where lack of strength is felt so much as in the wrist, nor where great strength is so useful, often seriously affecting his bread-winning power. With a systematic use of this machine only ten minutes twice a day you can double the strength of your hand in one month, and increase the size of your forearm very materially.

Purchasing and using a pair of Macfadden Wrist Machines—one in each hand—saves half the time occupied in exercising both hands with one machine, and also ensures a more equal development of strength in the two hands.

SHORT STORIES

No. 580.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending February 10th, 1900.

THE IRON OF REMORSE.

It is never well to be too sure what you would do under given circumstances, until you have tried and found out. A course of action which you know to be absolutely foreign to every instinct within you—when you sit down to reason about it, after the manner of the age—may be the very one you will follow when there is no time for reason. If any one had told Mackworth that under fire he would be a coward, Mackworth would have knocked the informant down then and there, and have reflected upon the danger to his commission afterwards.

Mackworth had passed though his course with credit and took a commission in the Canadian Mounted Police.

Excepted after the manner of cadets—which is not to be taken seriously—Mackworth had not let women enter into his scheme of existence. His ideals were of another sort just then. He was young and full of belief and things, and he thought that the way to win approval of his superiors and the gratitude of his country, was to avoid wirepulling and to kill the enemies of his Queen.

Therefore, he rejoiced greatly when, after only six weeks of his thoroughly undesirable garrison, he was ordered out in the field to suppress a rebellious tribe of Indians under their chief, Chatta. He had had his kit all rolled in a rubber poncho, and his mess chest pretty well stocked for the whole of the six weeks. He believed that a soldier should be always in readiness. He believed so many things then—though before long the bottom fell out of his universe, and he was filled with an enduring scepticism. And this was how it came about:

The first time he was under fire was when they were caught at rather a disadvantage by the Indians in a difficult pass. The fight began about dusk and lasted well into the night. It may have been the result of some bugaboo stories of his babyhood, which had fostered an unconquerable fear of the dark; it may have been some lurking instinct, or it may have been just blue funk which overcame him. Whatever it was, he hid behind a boulder, crouched and cowered there, trembling so that his revolver fell from his hands.

And Morley, his captain, found him so.

"What are you doing?" he demanded. He was an Irishman and a soldier of the old school, but he did not swear.

Mackworth knew, from that, how bad it was. He scrambled up and babbled.

"Get out of there!" the captain said. He would have used a better tone to one of the troop curs.

Mackworth felt for his revolver and got out, staggering, but no longer afraid, only ashamed—sickeningly ashamed—beyond all endurance.

He tried hard to get himself killed after that. He walked up and down in front of his men, giving orders and smoking cigarettes, and doing his best to serve as a target.

The captain watched him and began to understand. His frown relaxed.

"You'd better get under cover," he suggested; "you are taking needless risks."

Mackworth looked at him with wide, blank eyes, and did not answer. His face was not only white now: it was grey and set, like the face of a corpse.

Morley's heart softened.

"It's only a baby, anyway," he said to himself, "and it is unhappy out of all proportion." And presently he went to him again. "Will you get under cover, Mackworth?" he insisted.

"No," said the lieutenant, "I won't."

The captain did not mince his words now, and spoke fiercely:

"I order you back under cover, sir!"

Mackworth glanced at him and went on smoking. Morley did not fancy his own position, arguing with a green boy, fully exposed to an invisible enemy. He knew that wasting officers is pretty, but it is not war.

"I shall order you to the rear, under arrest, unless you get back there with the men immediately!"

Mackworth retired, with a look at his superior officer for which he should have been court-martialled. After that, the work of the Police became a chase after the intangible, up mountain slopes, when you pulled your horse after you; down them, when he slid atop of you.

Chatta's band was at the north, to the south, to the east and west; but when the troops got to the spot, after forced marching, all signs of them had disappeared.

It went on for two months, and all the while Mackworth's despondency grew. The weight of years was upon his yet barely squared shoulders, the troubles of a lifetime were written upon his face. And it was a pitiably young face, despit the growth of yellow beard. He would not be comforted. He was silent and morose. He would not lift up his beautiful baritone in song, be the camp ever so dull. Only his captain knew why, of course — and he didn't tell. Neither did he attempt consolation. He thought the remorse healthful, and he knew, besides, that in such cases a man has to work out his own conclusions and salvation. This is the way Mackworth eventually tried to work out his:

There came one day a runner from the hostiles—a dish-faced, straight-locked creature of sinews—who spoke through the White Mountain interpreter of the Police, and said that his chief was ready to go back to the reservation, but that he must go upon his own terms. And the chief stipulated, moreover, that one white man—one, alone and unguarded—should go to the hostile camp and discuss those terms. If a force attempted to come, he would retreat with his braves and the trouble would continue.

Morley made answer that none of his men had any intention whatever of walking into a death trap of the sort.

Then Mackworth spoke up. "I have," he said.

"Get out," said the captain incredulously.

"I mean what I say," said Mackworth, "and I shall consider your permission to go the greatest and the only favour you can do me. Something may be effected by it."

"Your death, that's all; and a little preliminary torture."

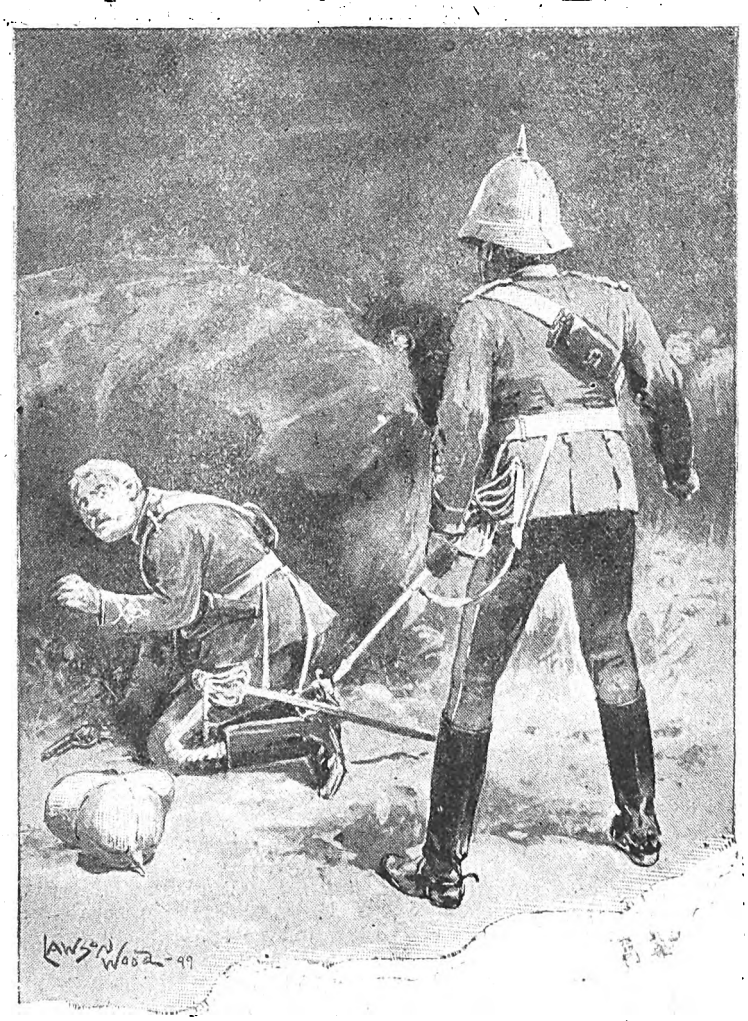
The lieutenant shrugged his shoulders. "Shall you let me go?" he insisted.

"Not by a long sight."

"I wish to go, Captain Morley."

Morley considered, and he decided that it might not be wise to refuse. There was no knowing just what the set-faced boy might do. So they parleyed together for a time, then Mackworth mounted his horse and went. He did not expect to come back, and the officers and men did not expect to see him again. They watched him go off into the distance of the plain, toward the mountains, following his guide, who swung on at the long, untiring dog trot.

After four hours they came to the mouth of a narrow canyon. The runner had given no sign or sound, and the fixed look had not gone from



He hid behind a boulder, crouched and cowered there, trembling so that his revolver fell from his hands.

Mackworth's face. Well within the canyon the hostiles were in camp. They had hobbled their lean little ponies, the squaws were gathering wood, and the bucks were squatting upon the ground or playing monte with cards of painted hide around a cowskin spread under a cedar tree. Four of them rose and slouched forward. There was a prolonged scrutiny upon both sides.

The chief waited for Mackworth to begin; but the white man's instincts were good. He beat the sullenly silent redskin at his own game, and in the end the chief spoke. The guide displayed for the first time his understanding, and interpreted. Mackworth made answer with decision, stating his own terms. The bucks scowled, and the chief began to argue.

The white man, with the unflinching eyes, would not compromise. "Tell him," Mackworth said, "that this is my will. If he will not do this I go back to the soldiers, and we follow you and kill you all, man and woman." The face of the chief grew black, a growl rose from the crowding bucks, and the watching squaws began to chatter in voices sweet as the tinkle of glass bells.

The chief stepped suddenly forward and caught the bridle above the curb. Not so much as an eyelash of the stern, white young face quivered, and the heart of the red man was filled with admiration. One movement of fear would have cost Mackworth his life then; but he was not afraid, not though he know that torture might await him. He sat looking coolly down at the lowering, cruel faces. The chief turned and spoke to the bucks, and there was a growl of protest; the squaws joined with a shrill little chorus scream. But the chief flung away the bridle with a force which made the horse back.

"He do same you say. He go back to homes to-day. He say you ukishee quick," said the interpreter. Mackworth turned deliberately and "ukisheed" with no show of haste and without a backward look.

He reported his success and went to his tent. His look of stolid wretchedness was unchanged. Morley began to be nervous. He went to the tent himself and found the lieutenant writing a letter by lantern light. It was not a normal opportunity to take for that, so the captain, being filled with misgivings, trumped up an errand and sent him off on it.

He placed the barrel well in his mouth and pulled the trigger.

Then he looked at the letter. It was to Mackworth's mother. Morley did not read it, but he guessed the whole thing in a flash. He took up Mackworth's carbine and slid it under the tent flags into the outer darkness. Also he broke the Colt's, which had been thrown down upon the bedding, and put the cartridges in his pocket. Then he replaced it in the holster, and going out picked up the carbine and hid it in the brush.

After the camp was all asleep and Morley snoring loudly across the tent, Mackworth groped under his pillow and brought out the revolver. He cocked it and waited a moment; then he placed the barrel well in his mouth and pulled the trigger once—and then again and again.

At first call for reveille Morley awoke. Mackworth was already up, and turning he studied his captain's face with the faintest and most unwilling of smiles twitching the corners of his mouth. It was the most natural look his face had worn in weeks.

"Well?" said Morley.

"Well," answered Mackworth, "I should like my carbine and the cartridges of my revolver, please."

Morley's face broke into a broad grin. "Will you be good if I let you have them?" he asked.

"I'll be good," promised the lieutenant.

AN AUSTRALIAN STORY.

"GIRLS," said Lance, "you had better fly round like two-year olds. I've asked Lieutenant Feveral to tea."

"To tea," screamed Leonie, tossing back her mane of red-brown hair. "There isn't a clean dinner-napkin in the house. You know to-morrow is washing day."

"Well, it is Barbara's fault, not mine. The fellow met her in Sydney, and must be dead nuts on her, for he played billiards with me at Cray's to-day, and just let me win. Then he fished so that I had to ask him to the Priory. Where is Barbara?"

"Out; giving a music-lesson in the town. What on earth is the man doing in Waveny?"

"He has been staying at Werrimu with the Hills, on a short holiday to see bush life, and reckoned his nearest way home was by Waveny—as if Hendra wasn't quite fifty miles nearer. He must take the train to-morrow, so can't drop in to any more meals. Just 'buck in,' like a good girl, and give us something decent."

"Barbara says they cook so beautifully on the gunboat," said Leonie. "He will expect everything so nice."

"Oh, here is Gracie," as the elder Miss Wycherley strolled in from the garden, carrying a dilapidated basket full of pink and yellow roses. Her face fell when Lance repeated his news.

"There's absolutely nothing for tea," she said. "The twins finished the stewed peaches when they came back from school, and we have only six decent small knives. Of course the small fry can dine in the kitchen, and mother is spending the day at the Cedars. Lance, Tom, Leonie, Barbara, self, and the man. Yes, the six knives will just do. What a dreadful nuisance Barbara's admirers are becoming."

"But none so bad as this one," sighed Leonie, who, though still in her early "teens," seemed the most responsible person in the happy-go-lucky family.

"I don't mind the ones from the stations, but a sailor and a town man is different. The tablecloth was clean yesterday, but Tom spilt cocoa all over it."

"No, only down the centre, luckily. Run up and fetch me your yellow sash, Leonie. I will drape it with these roses, and put the pink shade over the lamp—the glass is cracked. Be quick, like a good child."

"I really don't see why," began Leonie rebelliously. "Sailors are always clumsy, and what am I to do for a sash when I wear my white frock on Sunday, if he spills his tea, or anything?"

"Rubbish. He is sure to be careful. Run quickly, it is nearly six now. Go to the gate, Lance, and wait for him, and take him to see the grape vines; there is so little for tea, and he might be tempted to eat some grapes."

Lance strolled away down the grass-grown drive, and Leonie returned with the sash, which Grace draped artistically. In old days, when the Wycherleys, of Reedy Creek, where a power in the land, Gracie had always arranged the table centres. She thought of those palmy days, and sighed a little as she put on the silver knife-rests and the spoons, where the Wycherley lion was still rampant.

It was all the plate they had left from the wreck and did not match very well with the common-looking knives and stone china. Still when the tall lamp threw a rosy glow through its pink shade on the soft yellow silk, and the shell-tinted La France roses nestling lovingly against their amber cloth of gold sisters, Gracie decided that "even Barbara would be satisfied."

Leonie was the only really tidy one in an untidy family, and so was foredoomed to the usual fate. If scissors were wanted, "Oh, look in Leonie's basket." A clean handkerchief. "In Leonie's left-hand drawer," and so on. But Leonie continued to keep thimble, scissors, etc. in her work-basket, and ironed up her stock of handkerchiefs every Monday morning, after gathering them from the uttermost parts of the earth, viz., from garden seats or skirt pockets, or (favourite haunt of all) the flat-iron shelf in the laundry, resting in oblivion after doing duty as ironholders!

"Where are the bellows?" cried Grace. "Tom, do put down that book, and look for them. You horrid boy, to use all the small wood making bullets—the kettle will never boil."

Digitized by Google

Leonie looked hopelessly round. "The bellows are always lost," she said. "So are the hot-water jugs, and the toasting-fork. As long as I live, I shall believe that kitchen things have souls, and minds, and characters. Look at the kerosene holder; put it where you like, it always gets into passages, and loves being knocked over. As for the toasting fork, it positively hides."

Her remarks woke dreaming Tom to reflection. "Awfully true what you say, 'spring chicken,'" he said. "Now, there's the little boiler, it has a down on everyone. The spiteful way it sticks out from under the table, and barks one's shins, proves that. As for the teapot, clean it out as often as you like, when you want it, it is always full of tea-leaves. They are a lot of bad characters, anyway."

"Oh! no, not at all." said Leonie. "Just look at the hearth-brush; we use it for everything—cleaning out ashes, dusting furniture, hunting cobwebs, and yet it is always just handy when it is wanted."

"For goodness' sake, stop chattering," said Grace; her fair face crimson from stooping over the refractory fire. "The man is in the garden now, and Lance is talking to him. Remember, Tom, you are not to take butter at tea. I gave quite half a cupful to a tramp this morning, and Barbara is sure to forget to bring in more."

"More fool you," said Tom. "Here are the bellows, sneaking into the flour-bin. I'll give the fire a blow for you."

Leonie flew hither and thither, "tracking the tea-cups," and returned triumphantly at last to wash them up. One contained a tadpole, belonging to the twins; another—unearthed from Lance's room—was half-full of shaving soap; and a third held a dark and deadly mixture of rose leaves and salt, owned by the twins, and called "Attar of roses." but Leonie impartially emptied all treasures into the waste-bucket.

"Such a house I never did see," cried Grace. "Oh! bother, there, that horrid little boiler has gone and rubbed itself all over my clean frock; hateful thing."

"You should wear an apron," sighed Leonie. "I've always told you so."

"An apron. As if I ever had a moment's time to put an apron on."

"You are too big, and this kitchen is too small," said Tom. "No fellow would marry you, Gracie, unless he was a millionaire. Six-foot girls are luxuries, and men nowadays can't afford luxuries. Give me a neat little nugget for genuine hard work!"

Grace, whose stature and build were those of a tall Greek goddess, took no notice of this brotherly remark, but ran over to a silver-backed hand-glass that hung behind the kitchen door, and patted her smooth flaxen hair with her shapely, white hands.

"I think I'll do," she said. "Lance will be cross if he is left too long. Help the 'spring chicken,' all you can, Tom, and be sure not to let the twins get at the buttered toast. Oh! and you might fish Browning out of the bread-crock; it fell in this morning when I was shelling peas. It's Barbara's blue and gold copy, so you had better put it back in her room for me;" with which parting injunction Miss Wycherley left the kitchen and went out into the garden to talk to her sister's friend.

"I suppose he has come to ask Barbara to marry him," said Tom. "Gracie ought to marry first, being the eldest. She's more reliable, too. One never knows what bee is humming in Bab's bonnet."

"You mean that Barbara might say 'No,'" said Leonie. "I don't think so. If she likes him at all, she will take him. You see Barbara hates poverty and muddle and trouble. It would be such a good thing. We must keep the twins away this evening and give him a chance to propose."

"You've got a good head on you," said Tom, admiringly, "though you are no beauty," gazing critically at his sister's many angles and sharp, anxious little face.

"Neither are you, for the matter of that," said the owner of the "good head," busily buttering toast. "We are the plain ones in a good-looking family, though you will grow a moustache, some day that will cover your awful mouth."

Tom glanced at the looking-glass. "It's a generous mouth, anyway," he said. "None of your mean little button-holes. I'm your man if you want the stupid, handsome ones kept out of the way. You must fix Grace up. She is just the sort to think she is entertaining when she is playing third. I can manage the twins."

And so the two arch-plotters combined to take the threads of two lives from the hands of Fate into their own.

Ralph Feveral was a clean-shaven, sturdy, blue-eyed sailor. He had met Barbara when she was on a visit to relatives in Sydney when his ship was stationed there. He was navigating lieutenant on H. M. S. Blackadder, but, unlike the usual run of naval officers, was exceptionally well endowed with the good things of this world, being a younger son with a fortune of his own and a love of the sea for its own sake, which alone kept him chained to the service.

He might have married more than one of the many girls who fluttered, butterfly-like, through Sydney society, but Barbara's strange individuality had left a lasting impression, and Ralph had obtained leave and accepted the Hill's invite, chiefly because Werrimu Station was in the Waveny district, for he had heard of the downfall of Reedy Creek, and that the family with their fallen fortunes, had settled in the mountain town.

The old house, in its romantic garden, seemed a fit setting for Barbara's unusual and half-mysterious beauty. The luxuriant creepers and climbing roses hid the ant-eaten, unpainted walls, just as the good looks and unfailing good spirits of its inmates created a glamour that hid the fact of the sordidness and discomfort of their poverty from all but themselves. And the lieutenant thought he had never seen a happier household, and he certainly enjoyed his tea, in spite of the fact that there were moths in the honey and that Leonie's hastily made scones were like so many bullets!

While he was washing his hands in Lance's bedroom a small boy with a shock of thick but white hair had entered with a clean towel. He lingered gazing at Feveral intently, and then had innocently asked his name.

"Mine is Tom Wycherley," he said. "What is your name?"

"Feveral—Ralph Feveral," said the sailor. Whereupon Tom had given a most dramatic start.

"Then it is your photo that Bab keeps in her room? I often wondered whose it was. My sister Barbara is not like other girls, you know—does not care about photos, at all—lets 'em lie about anywhere. So it's yours, is it?"

With which statement Master Tom had made a rapid exit, leaving Feveral to the pleasing fancy that his photo alone, was favoured by a place in Barbara's bedroom, and the thought created a chain of others.

As a matter of fact, it was there with half a score of photos, tucked away in a forgotten drawer and hidden by faded ribbons and crushed flowers, old programmes, and other mementoes of her Sydney days.

One of her cousins had slipped it into her box when she was going, "for a joke," she said because Barbara had not any particular delight in Feveral's attentions; but of course the lieutenant could not know this, therefore Tom's timely information decided a half-formed plan in his mind. He had not meant to propose to the girl this time, fearing to hurry matters, for it had not seemed to him that she returned his affection at all. He knew that she was going to Sydney again shortly, and that the Blackadder would still be in Port Jackson —time enough then—but if, after all, she did care for him, there was no time like the present, and he would try his fate to-night.

And when Barbara came in from her quick walk through the sharp mountain air, with the dusky hair ruffled by the night wind, and her olive cheeks aglow with the exercise, and seemed graciously pleased to see an old friend, the lieutenant made up his mind to act at once.

"Surely," he thought, "I will be able to get her alone for a moment or two in this vast old garden."

However, after tea the whole family, including several little girls and boys of various heights and ages, seemed inclined to congregate round Ralph on the veranda. Grace and Barbara decided not to wash up until the morning, and Lance was quite content to stay at home and listen to this traveller from strange countries, talking.

The rule in the Wycherley family was, "share and share alike," and Feveral was suffering the penalty of being amusing. Brian and Betty, the twins, who were of an uncomfortably demonstrative nature, clung especially close to him, and separated him entirely from the canvas chair in which Barbara was resting.

At last Lance dragged himself unwillingly away to go to The Cedars to bring his mother home, and then Tom whispered a mysterious message to the twins, which caused them to rush off kitchenwards like mad things, for the twins were always hungry, and Tom had promised to let them make toffee, reckless of the wrath to come in the morning when the only enamelled saucepan would be found full of burnt sugar.

Leonie hunted the other children to bed, and Feveral was left with the two girls, and Gracie seemed very happy, indeed, like the serene young goddess she was, swinging in the string hammock, and asking Ralph many questions, and she felt slightly annoyed when Leonie insisted upon her presence in the children's nursery to inspect an "awful rash," which had appeared on the baby's arm, and it was some time before she discovered that red ink had more to do with the disfigurement than anything else.

She went back to the veranda to enjoy some more of the lieutenant's conversation, and found that the birds had flown. In fact, Ralph had seized the opportunity, and taken Barbara off to show him how the lower garden looked by moonlight.

In after days Barbara never could remember all the words of her first proposal—only one sentence, "and as I love you so I cannot live without you. Will you marry me, Barbara?" And looking into the brave blue eyes, she knew that in very truth he did love her, and yet she said, "No, no, I cannot."

"Why, Barbara; why? Is it that you love someone else?"

"No, indeed; it is not that. I have never cared for anyone. I don't believe I can. I like you very much, indeed—better than anyone I know—but I do not love you."

"But the love will come in time," said the man, using the same false platitude, and believing it, as other men have done before him. "I won't hurry you in any way, sweetheart. You shall have as long as you like to get used to me, but if you do not care for anyone else I am not afraid that you will not love me; such love as mine must bring an answering affection."

"I would like to marry you," said the girl calmly. "You could give me the life I like—you could take me from all this misery and poverty, but is it fair to you—as far as I know myself I am not capable of caring for anyone more than I do for you (I always liked you in those Sydney days better than the other men I met), but is it possible that I do not know myself. I wish—oh, I wish you had waited before you asked this."

"But you are not going to refuse me, Barbara. I will not press you for an answer. I love you with my whole heart and soul, and I am willing to take the risk you speak of. It is only because this is all so unexpected that you feel like that. Say 'yes' my dear one."

His strong arms were around her, his strong will seemed to dominate hers, and there is no doubt that her inclinations were all in his favour, and so Barbara said:

"Yes!"

She liked and admired the man immensely, and she thoroughly believed that she was incapable of any stronger feeling for anyone. She had had many admirers, and had been brought up, as most bush girls are, in the society of men, and at the age of twenty she considered that it was impossible to love in the future, because she had not done so in the past.

Perhaps her nature was, after all, a cold one, and the latent fire in her blue-black Irish eyes meant nothing, and many happy marriages have been based on love and esteem, instead of love and love. These pages have only to do with tea at the Priory, and the consequences thereof; and the subsequent history of Ralph and Barbara are quite another story.

* * * * *

Tom crept to Leonie's window some hours later, and invited her to come out on the roof, which she immediately did, meeting him on the sloping shingles between the dormer windows.

"It's all right," whispered the boy. "He is coming to see mother in the morning, and I'm going to ask him to beg us off about the burnt saucepan."

"Of course it's all right," said Leonie. "Barbara's cheeks are red as can be, and she is in Grace's room, laughing and crying at the same time; girls always do that when they are engaged. Still" (with one of her anxious sighs), "I wish it was Gracie we had helped instead of Bab; none of us really know her."

"How could we," said the youth contemptuously, "when she does not know herself. Anyway, he is deep enough in love for anything."

"Poor man," said the gentle Leonie pityingly. "I should think he was. He took a scone every time you passed the dish, and never noticed that no one else did."

"Oh, that will be all right," said Tom hopefully. "When a fellow has got an attack of love as bad as that chap has even a ton of your scones couldn't hurt him."

THE BITE of the PICHU-GUATE.

CLEARLY Claudio was tired, and it took a good deal to tire this big, rough-headed young Mexican. But it was not to be wondered at after his morning's work. The lambs in his barn were now five days old, and at that age a New Mexican lamb is smart enough in body and impish enough in mind to upset the most patient-minded man.

Then the mothers, whose age might have been expected to give them discretion, were as crazy as the lambs. To add to the worry, the snakes were beginning to come out of their winter nap.

The opening of May at the 8,000 feet altitude of San Miguel is rather early for these long sleepers; but the spring was unusually warm, and though none had been seen, yet there was no doubting their presence. The hungry sheep were wild for the tender blades of grass that began to show about the mouths of the prairie dog's burrows, and nowhere else.

But in some burrows were other tenants than prairie dogs lying in the sunny mouths of the holes, and savagely resentful of interruption. Already that day Claudio had found three dead ewes, lying close beside a burrow, fearfully swollen, and upon the nose of each were two tiny black marks such as might be made with a tattooing needle.

Late in the afternoon the ewes, with a chorus of strange whistles, went tearing and galloping over the hillside and disappeared over the brow of the ridge, as if the very wolves were after them.

Claudio started in pursuit, but the lambs hung at his heels, in spite of a bombardment of words and pebbles that he directed at them, and whenever he paused they pranced up to him and snuggled against his legs, and dropped contentedly at his very feet.

Pulling off his coat, Claudio swung it vigorously about him to clear a space, leaped over the backs of a few loiterers, and went running up the slope at a pace it was a wonder to see.

The coat dropped from his hand as he jumped a gully, and as the lambs came stumbling along several tripped on it, and finding it warm promptly sprawled upon their knees and began to nurse at whatever rag or tag they first found. And the others, fancying that they were being robbed of their dinner, crowded and jostled about, butting, falling down, and clambering over one another.

Claudio might have laughed at the sight; but when he came back, fifteen minutes later, he saw about the coat only a lot of little white patches, smeared with blood. Here and there a lamb was to be seen, wandering disconsolately about or fallen exhausted over a shrub. And over the further hillside was just disappearing a big dark shambling figure with two white objects shining on it.

It was all plain enough. The ewes, scenting the bear from afar as he sneaked through the woods, had fled incontinently; for the actual presence of no other wild beast so terrifies sheep as the mere smell of a bear. And taking advantage of Claudio's brief absence, Bruin had sallied from the junipers, played havoc among the lambs (which were too stupid to fear even him), and was now making off with a couple "for future reference."

The bear, like bears always, was only anxious to get away if he decently could, and ran his best. Ordinarily that would have been far better than Claudio's best—or a very fair horse's best, for that matter. But greediness is costly, even for bears. The lamb in his mouth was no handicap whatever; and having eaten two or three besides, he might have been contented with that.

But the one he persisted in carrying hugged under his forearm did seriously impede him. Even then, in the long run, he was more than a match for his pursuer. When Claudio came in full view of him and only a hundred yards behind, he whipped from his belt the revolver he carried in lieu of a rifle.

"Throwing down" in the swift, instinctive motion of those who really know how to use a revolver, and never stop to ask whether it has sights or not, he sent a leaden proxy running for him. It was a good shot, tired and out of breath as he was, the kind of shooting one has to learn on the frontier, and cannot learn in a gallery.

The bear turned a complete somersault, and, gathering itself again, began biting viciously at its rump.

Claudio had not stopped at all; but now, when he was within thirty yards, he halted and watched the brute so as to give him a shot at a vital part. But at that very instant the bear, with a snuffle of rage, wheeled and came galloping at his late pursuer.

Claudio sent a square shot at the skull—not by any means under the impression that he could bore that sloping forehead, but hoping the rap might startle the beast into rising, so that he could get a chance at the throat, the best of all shots at a bear. But the heavy ball merely ploughed a red furrow up the skull, and the bear came lurching on. It was worse than useless to run. Slender as was the chance of life now, it all lay in standing firm as Claudio well knew.

When it was within six feet, the huge brute reared upon his haunches, and, springing back a step, Claudio was bringing back his weapon like lightning to "let go" when it should be on a level with that mighty throat, now fully exposed. But the bear was no innocent, and, cleverly judged as was Claudio's move, he had met his match in quick wit. Even the sweep of his swift arm was slow beside the flash of that great paw, as it swooped far forward, met his descending hand with a calculation an Indian eye might have envied, and sent the heavy revolver spinning forty feet, going off as it flew. And in another instant the shepherd was on his back, and the bear upon him.

The great claws had struck only the revolver, and Claudio's hand was unhurt, save where the violent wrenching of the trigger had cut and twisted his fingers; and instinctively he gripped deep in the thick fur where his hands first lighted. Neither had he been hurt by the fall, for here was soft grey sand—which a little relieved, too, the fearful pressure upon his legs. But none of these things comforted Claudio; and he fought only as a man fights blindly to the end. His last faint hope had gone when the revolver went whirling far beyond his reach.

The bear, which had gone to bed in his cave in the canyon of Acebache, rolling fat, in November, had but a few days ago come forth from that long nap, the shadow of his proper self. His long heavy fur was sadly rusty, and his huge frame lean as a rail. He had been interrupted in the first square meal he had enjoyed in five months, and from that long fast came two strange results.

One was, that he was not half himself in strength, and that the powerful young Mexican was, therefore, something more than a puppet in his paws.

Of the end, certainly, there could be no doubt; but meantime Claudio wrestled mightily, and even succeeded in struggling to his feet hugging close, to give those paws no chance for one of the swipes that would make an egg-shell of his head. His face he snuggled into the bear's chest, and so kept clear of the dripping jaws. And despite the fearful pressure under which his ribs creaked and swung, he hunched and tugged and swayed blindly and desperately, as if he were wrestling with some tall man whom he might hope to pitch at last. But it was not for long.

Finding these close quarters unsatisfactory, the bear brought up its muscular arm, and clapping its paw upon Claudio's mat of hair, forced his head resistlessly back. The great claws were buried in his scalp, and little streams of red spurted out. The bear's left arm was round his waist, while the right was giving him the "break hold" as scientifically as any wrestler could have done.

And now a villainous, warm breath came sickening in his face, and he could see the red jaws and white teeth within six inches. He even noticed, with that strange inconsequence which come upon one in these moments, that blood from the scalp wound had run down and tinged the froth which dripped from that great mouth.

In a frenzy of terror he made a clutch under the throat, to hold back that terrible head, and the strongest man could scarce have bent against Claudio's desperate arms; but the big jaws, working grimly, drew nearer. A deadly faintness began to spread over him, and Claudio shut his eyes.

Just then a sudden jerk ran through the body of the bear. and there was a sharp snort as of rage or pain. Claudio opened his eyes. He could see nothing but the demoniac face, but in it he fancied there was a new expression.

Then there was a sickening movement of the great claws which had sunk deep into his back and scalp. Surely they were relaxing!

Their withdrawal was far more painful than their entrance had been; but even with the faintness of the new pain, a sudden wave of joy swept through the shepherd—for the first time, now, he hoped, though he knew not why.

He shook his head savagely to clear the blood which streamed down over his eyes (the paw had dropped from his scalp), and dug his fists into the deep furred throat, and fought with the strength of two Claudios—fighting no longer like a dying rat fights, but like a man for hope of life.

Then a very wonderful thing befel. The bear was groaning and panting heavily; and suddenly it lurched and fell to the ground, carrying Claudio with it. But it was no longer trying to get his head between its jaws. For a moment it lay upon him, writhing and grinding its teeth, and then flung itself to one side biting up a great mouthful of sand.

Claudio leaped to his feet, ran to his revolver, and fell upon it, crying like a child. It was ten minutes before he could get up, for loss of blood—and, more than all, the frightful strain—had left him limp as a rag. At last he staggered to his feet, clutching the weapon, and walked unsteadily towards the bear.

Laying down his revolver he caught the heavy fur of the rump, to turn the bear over. Ordinarily he would have succeeded. Four hundredweight is no small lump, but Claudio, as you have seen, was an uncommonly powerful young man. Now, however, worn out with his fearful struggle, and with nerves so unstrung that he trembled all over, it was too much for him.

Still the mystery would not let him rest; and hunching his shoulder against the bear's back, he ran his hand under, feeling for the wound. He groped and groped, but suddenly in a hollow felt the touch of something very different from fur or sand, and in the same instant an inconceivable pang. And when he jerked his arm away a tiny snake less than a foot long, grey-backed and coppery on the stomach, was hanging from his thumb.

The last vestige of colour faded from the brown face and left it as grey as ashes between the drying streaks of blood—for Claudio knew the pichu-guate, the only real asp in the New World, the deadliest snake in North America.

So he had escaped the bear only to die by this tiny foe—for never yet had one been known to recover from the bite of the pichu-guate. A rattlesnake was nothing; but this, well, see what it had done for such a monster as the bear, and in the space of less than a minute!

Evidently, in their struggle, Bruin had stepped too close to this unsuspecting danger—that great lump on his hind leg explained all. Had he carried his usual coat of fat, the venom would have taken far longer to operate, and he would have had abundant time to settle accounts with Claudio. But he no longer looked gaunt He was still swelling—already he looked plump and fat, as if July with all its glory were here.

Claudio was reeling. Fearful pains shot up his arm and went forking through his body. Upon the thumb were only two black dots, right at the tip, but the hand in these five seconds had become double its size. If he could only cut it off! But alas! his knife was in his coat—and before he could get half-way to that he would be a dead shepherd.

All this had taken not so long as it has for you to read it—nay, scarce the time in which one might spell the longest word in it; for in these crises things and thoughts move swiftly, and one lives fast.

Claudio was still squeezing his thumb and crying aloud for a knife, when his eye lit on the revolver. Quick as a flash he sprang and caught it up and cocked it. There was just one cartridge left!

His nerves were steady now. He held his hand arm's-length before him, the wounded thumb erect, drew the revolver right back up to his eye, that the ball might not mangle too much, and thus stop the blood, which must flow; and with a hand as firm as if it had been carved of stone, pulled the trigger.

There was a dull, numb sensation, hardly a pain in all that side, and when the smoke cleared from his eyes, his right hand was black and bleeding. The thumb was gone clean at the lower joint.

There is one man in New Mexico who has been bitten by the pichu-guate and lives to tell of it—a tall, powerful, good-natured shepherd, with four grim grey furrows in his hair, and the thumb of the right hand missing. But Claudio seems rather proud of these disfigurements, and often says:

"Who talks of bargains? For so cheaply I bought my life twice in one hour."

A. BALDWIN.

THE WAR HORSE.

WHEN M. de Bossué returned to the court in France hewas most coldly received. The king refused to see him and the king's courtiers were quite uncivil. At his sweetheart's house, in the Rue des Saints Pères, the door was closed in his face. He was filled with astonishment and grief, both of which were increased when he went to see his friends. All looked askance at him, few deigned even to speak to him, and none accorded him the explanation he sought.

Too proud to question strangers, and yet sensitive enough to suffer keenly under the treatment he had received, he went to his room to brood alone.

There was a mirror here, and in this he surveyed himself. The hardships of war had deprived him of his good looks; his face was drawn and haggard, his skin wrinkled; his eyes were dull and sad; while across his left cheek a long, disfiguring scar told where a sabre had cut deep.

He left the mirror and sat down dejectedly. "I am grown ugly," he said, "and poor, and therefore they shun me." He thought of his life, offered to his country and to glory; of his hard campaigns in America and the Indies; of the famous battles in which he had done his part under Montcalm and Vaudreuil—"but all this," he told himself, "has been in vain. The king, my love, my friends, they are none of them left to me. The only faithful one of them all—my horse, who used to lick my hand and neigh gladly at my coming—he, too, is gone, for I have sold him. No one—nothing is left to me!"

One black thought was succeeded by another, and his gloom and melancholy increased till life seemed but a burden to be got rid of. He was a man of promptitude and decision, and, having come to this conclusion, he did not procrastinate. His pistol lay ready to his hand—one shot and the deed was done.

At court they said, "M. de Bossué had the fever." Weeks and months passed, and they spoke of him no more.

But there remained to Bossué an old-time friend. After serving in Spain for some ten years, and growing discontented with his work, M. le Comte de la Puysaye returned to France and to the court. He gained prestige at Mesdames de Boufless's, de Chauvelin's, de Surgere's, and Luxembourg; asked new service of the king, and solicited a regiment. He called himself a friend of Bossué's. "Poor fellow!" he said, "only thirty years old. What could have made him leave us in that way?"

His face clouded when he heard the story, for he was a brave man himself. "A coward!" he cried; "impossible!"

"But yes!" said his informer; "we repeat only what the reports said—reports which were sent to the king direct. M. de Bossué, it seems, disliked the enemy too greatly—so much so, in fact, that he could never bring himself to approach him."

"Bossué a coward!" cried the count; "he must have changed greatly, then. May not those reports have been false?"

"Well, the marshal himself——" and so on. La

Digitized by Google

Puysaye heard the story repeated a score of times, and found that the mention of Bossué's name brought forth only curses or reproaches. He ended by renouncing him.

"But," he said to himself one day, "I can't forget him. I loved him well, and I believe I love him still. Very well, I shall allow myself this little eccentricity—that of loving a dishonoured wretch. Bossué remains my friend, and of all the world I alone shall recall him with something other than disdain."

He hung the dead man's portrait on his wall once more. But the portrait was an old one, and no longer resembled anybody. La Puysaye, discontented, wished for some other souvenir—something which Bossué had used. He thought of the horse: "Where is he now? They tell me that he sold him. That horse carried poor Bossué for ten years. I must find him."

Once, while his friend still served with him, he had seen the horse—a curious beast, of a dark-yellowish colour, the product of a cross between a Spanish barb and an Indian pony. He was able to furnish descriptions of the animal to certain men whom he sent in search of it.

The men were away three months.

One day, La Puysaye received notice that a horse answering to the description given had been found in a field in Artois.

He went to the place and bought the animal at once.

It was indeed, Bossué's extraordinary beast, the friend of his friend, old and thin, worn by the hard service before the plough and the ill-treatment of the farm-hands. There were the white legs, still fine as those of a racer, the long, black tail and mane, and those eyes, dark, cold, clear, and fixed, that made one uneasy. "Strange animal!" thought La Puysaye.

He had it fed, groomed, and saddled, and set out for Paris at a rather halting gallop. Much fatigued he arrived at length. But tired as he was, there was to be little rest for him. A note from the Bureau of War awaited him, informing him that his request for a regiment had been granted; that it was to be known as the "Grenadiers Puysaye;" and that he must join it near Fribourg as soon as possible. Taking hardly time for the writing of a letter and the saying of an adieu, he departed for that place; and, gratifying his own wish, he went there on Bossué's horse.

His new grenadiers grumbled among themselves. "Is it with that plug," they said, "that he means to lead us?"

La Puysaye's friends looked at the beast critically. An ensign lifted its lip. "No use," said the count, "he's an old horse, and his teeth no longer mark his age."

"But why didn't you come on your black fellow?"

"Oh, Constantine broke his leg, and—but do not laugh, messieurs; poor and old as is this charger, he is good enough for the campaign. I judged that we should be only amusing ourselves here, and I did not wish to honour the enemy by riding too fine a horse."

The officers saluted smilingly, and the colonel, wishing to see the marshal, M. de Coigny, inquired the way to his quarters. Before going thither, he left his horse with his orderly, who was going towards the trenches.

"Bring him back to me to-night," said the count, and the man departed with the horse.

But not more than an hour had passed, and La Puysaye was just leaving the marshal's quarters, when an attack was ordered on a strong point where eighteen hundred men had been killed the night before. The trumpets sounded and the army hastened to respond. All other tasks were abandoned, and, with others, their uniforms into order, their arms in readiness, the grenadiers fell into line.

Being ordered to hold his regiment in reserve, M. de la Puysaye conducted it behind a certain embankment, then sought to go after his horse. But his friends stopped him.

"Not now," they said; "the place is exposed; you would be risking your life needlessly."

La Puysaye returned to his place, and gave vent to his vexation. "Miserable orderly!" he cried—"my horse! See what he has done with my horse!"

"Ciel!" exclaimed a captain in astonishment, "why are you so concerned about the beast? From whom did you get him?"

La Puysaye, tired of keeping his secret, revealed it. "From De Bossué. He was, alas, one of my old friends."

The news was murmured through the ranks, while the officers marvelled audibly. "What an idea!" they said. "Where is he, that we may observe him again?"

"In that trench over there, which is so exposed. My orderly must have been drunk to leave him in such a place."

"Oh," cried an officer, "have no fear." Bossué's horse! The horse of a coward! He'll crouch when the bullets fly; you'll find him again safe and sound."

"After all," said another, "the trench covers him; he's satisfied to stay in it; he won't come out."

At that moment a bomb came singing through the air, and from the trench, calmly, proudly, defiantly, a horse emerged. He stood alone in the middle of the field, in a great open place—alone. The saddle was on his back, the bit in his mouth; and though he had lowered his neck in the silence following the first bomb, he seemed waiting only for a signal on his bridle.

"The coward's horse!" thought the army.

Just then the place seemed to fill with smoke, while the city beyond trembled as with an earthquake shock; three more bombs in the ranks of France, and fifteen files were cut down like so much grain.

The trumpets sounded the attack; and at that moment, suddenly, magnificently, the last rays of the setting sun clothed the horse in gold. He raised his head, as the brave steed does when the battle is on and the rider encourages him to advance; then, boldly, eagerly, joyously, he charged on the city at a gallop. Deaf to the thunder of the cannon, indifferent to the shot that whistled about him, glad to sniff again the smoke of powder, to feel once more the excitement of the combat, the gallant horse dashed on and on—a sublime spectacle for a whole army to witness.

What moved him to rush on the enemy so madly, to affront death so grandly? Was it the memory of Bossué's glorious battles? Was it the force of a habit acquired after a score of engagements—the result of a lesson learned on many fields?

They who followed swiftly after him did not know; but they swore afterwards that they had seen a hand on his bridle, feet pressing his sides, a shadowy form on his back, and for one brief instant a face, with a long scar on its left cheek and a look such as no coward ever wore.

The poor beast at length fell, bleeding from a score of wounds, but he had done enough; in the eyes of the army, he whose horse this had been was vindicated. Bossué was not a coward.

"I WONDER where you'll be this time next week. I think if I were a man I couldn't stop here. I suppose my saying that shows that one does not realise how awful war can be."

"Oh! I don't know. War must come sometimes. Do you really wish you were going out?"

"Yes, just to help look after you all, if anything—— But there, nothing will happen to you."

A little catch in her voice made the man look with still more interest into her pretty face.

Leaning over he said cheerily:

"Oh, well, a few may fall—probably some will—must, in fact——"

He hesitated.

As his face grew pale the thought seemed to force itself upon him more even than it had so often lately—the thought that he might never see the girl again.

He had felt somehow it would be better to postpone telling her till his return—but, he might never return. It would be better, then, that he had never spoken. Yet the desire was greater, grew overwhelming to tell her, and to feel sure that she loved him.

"Will you wait for me. I cannot go without telling you, dear. I love you. Say yes, and no bullet will find me, please Heaven."

No more words would come, as in feverish hope—or uncertainty—he awaited her answer.

Then he saw she no longer looked at him.

Following her eyes, he found another man gazing, with brows lifted satirically at him.

"My dance, Miss Serle! Excuse me, Nardon, won't you. I'm sorry to interrupt the piling on of the agony. Miss Serle is, I know, going to follow the doings of the Bromshires with the greatest interest."

As Nardon saw the girl he loved walk out of the conservatory with his superior officer and—he knew too well—rival, he seemed unable to say more, though he could have knocked the man down for his jeering.

Had the girl heard his declaration? Was there really any truth in the rumour that Major Flecter would after all win her?

No other dance with her. And to-morrow he would be getting well on his way down Channel. No chance of seeing her alone.

Ah! the music had ceased for good—the last dance was over. Everybody was going home.

As he came out of the conservatory, there she was on Flecter's arm evidently going down to her carriage. Flecter's look of cool possession exasperated him.

As she passed him, however, she turned to him.

"Good-bye, Captain Nardon, and the best of all luck." And as she shook hands with him she left her programme in his hand.

Mumbling out his good-bye, he watched the carriage roll off.

She was gone now.

Banishing thought he rushed home to complete his preparations for leaving.

And there he gazed on the programme at three scrawled words:

"Yes! Good-bye."

* * * * *

The Bromshire Regiment was distinguishing itself, but they were in a well nigh hopeless case.

By some awful mishap they had lost communication with the main body, and, only 800 strong, were keeping at bay 2000 Boers.

The Colonel, albeit with anxious face, was rushing hither and thither cheering his men on to withstand the attack long enough for support to be sent.

A galloper came up.

"The reserve ammunition has gone, sir. The mules got loose and could not be held."

The Colonel could not withold the words "My God!" as he heard the news.

Then summoning superhuman courage he shouted:

"Order the three left flank companies to retire two or three hundred yards and then gain the top of that hill to draw the Boer fire. The main body will retire at once."

One minute later, Major Flecter dashed up to the left of the battalion.

"Companies B, C, and D wheel about, and take possession of that kopje."

As he indicated the hill, his eyes lighted on Captain Nardon, waiting for the remaining order.

A look of malignant hatred swept over Flecter's face.

"As you were!" he thundered. "Companies C and D will carry out the first movement. Company B will descend into the valley to attract the enemy's attention."

The heat and hurry of the moment prevented Nardon attaching full meaning to Flecter's last order. His men were preparing to take up the new position. Everything depended on speed.

Nardon saw practically certain death for himself and his men in advancing to the spot most exposed to the raking shell fire of the Boers, but though he seemed to feel there was something wrong in the order, the movement seemed likely to effect a safe passing for the main body.

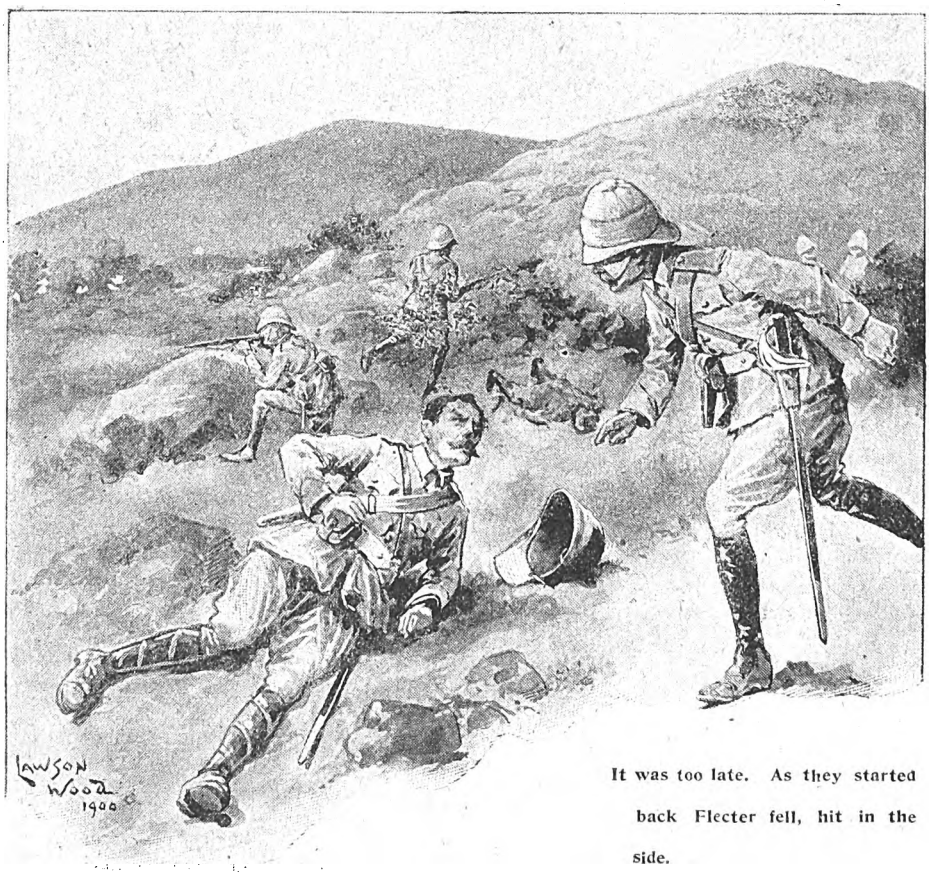
Flecter had retired to the centre. There, with gleaming face, in comparative cover, he had time to gloat over his work.

"Now he'll die. She was always fond of me before he came; curse him. She'll mourn him perhaps, but she'll marry me."

And as he watched the Boer fire suddenly directed at the gap in the valley, he felt all would soon be over with Company B and its captain.

It was then he suddenly blanched. How about himself. Would anybody survive?



It was too late. As they started back Flecter fell, hit in the side.

The order for retreat was given. They were to seize every bit of cover, and the direction was to be first along the left, into the back of the gap whose front Nardon and his men were guarding, and then behind the hill occupied by the other two companies.

In the front of the gap Nardon and his men, who were apparently not suffering much from the shell fire, were gallantly returning volley after volley.

Flecter, with the main body, rushed across the gap. As they crossed, the Colonel caught sight of Company B.

"Good Heavens," he shouted, "they will be cut to bits. They must retire. We shall get behind the kopje, and once there we are comparatively safe."

Close touch with death was having its effect on Flecter, and his horrible sacrifice of Nardon was not pleasing him so much. There he could see, a couple of hundred yards in front, as he clambered down, Nardon coolly directing his men in a biting rifle attack on the opposite hills, ever and anon glancing back to see how far the main body were from safety.

Nardon felt it was touch and go, his men were falling by twos and threes; yet perhaps he could gain the few minutes necessary.

The Boers were advancing in great numbers. In five minutes they would be within a hundred yards. Nardon glanced round and met Flecter's gaze. Mingled scorn and determination swept over the former's face.

Flecter stood dumfounded.

Nardon was coolly sacrificing himself to save his fellows in the rear, and now did not mean to give in.

"No! it must not be, I'll go, sir."

Flecter rushed into the wider opening of the gap, fully exposed to the enemy's fire.

"Back, Nardon," he shouted, "back. There's time yet."

Nardon turned, but returned to his charge.

"Back, we're safe," again shouted Flecter, who was now with the noble little company.

Only then did Nardon turn full round to see the main body disappearing behind the hill.

They were safe. Nardon gave the order to retreat at the double. It was too late. As they started back, Flecter fell, hit in the side.

Nardon rushed to his side.

"Don't wait, Nardon. You'll be safe now, thank God. Forgive me, Nardon," he gasped, "forgive me," and he sank back.

Nardon saw that nothing could be done.

Ah! What was that. Reinforcements, thank goodness. They were saved.

But scarcely twenty of Company B had escaped. With their dead lay an officer, but it was not Captain Nardon.

Major Flecter had made his repentance at the cost of his life.

JESSIE TAURION was alone, with a curious ache in her heart, and the sounds of retreating footsteps beating wearily in her brain.

The footsteps ceased for a moment, a door banged, and then they echoed through the open window, slowly, firmly, and distinctly. There was something appealing in their slowness, but Jessie crushed down her rising pity, and taking up her brushes, began to paint steadily.

But the line between her brows grew deeper, the strokes of her brush slower and slower, until it dropped from her hand, making a smudge of bright red across the leg of the easel and on the floor in its fall. She put her hands up to her face and sat silently for a moment or two.

"I must learn to live without him," she said drearily. "It will be hard, but it is best. Oh! the greyness and loneliness of it." She sobbed, then with womanish inconsistency burst out, "Why didn't he explain? Why didn't he say he was sorry? He stood and blinked like an owl with a white face, and never said a word. The dolt. Why did he get so angry and say 'If a woman cannot trust she does not love.' Why did I say my love was dead? It isn't, Jack, it isn't, come back to me, come back."

She turned to the door, but there was no sound of footsteps, no answer. Sinking on the floor she buried her face in her arms, and tried with surging brain to realise the cost of the uprooting from her heart of a love she had deemed unworthily received.

Jessie Taurion was an artist, a woman full of poetry, common sense, and affection—but a woman. In giving her love to Jack Brayworth she had considered the possibilities before acknowledging to him the motive force his love was to her, and the strength she had gained since to him she had become one of the world's dearest women. It meant giving up her independence; and to a successful woman, a woman whose pictures were rapidly bringing wide fame to their painter, this is no small thing. But she gave it up cheerfully. It meant unlocking the doors of a barred world; it meant the merging of her life into that of another; it meant another state of existence. She had character, and treasuring this strong man's love, considered no sacrifice too great.

"Does he understand," she had often asked herself, "what marriage will mean to me?" and her heart and her common sense had answered "No."

She had not told him, had given him no hint, but, woman-like, was angry at his ignorance, and, lover-like, resented it. "Did his lack of perception or of thought betoken selfishness?"

Perhaps she was too analytical. It was not sufficient for her to know that Jack loved her because he loved her, or that she loved him because she did love him. She wanted reasons, almost to the chapter and verse, and in seeking the causes for it lost her love.

"Know thyself," is, doubtless, an excellent axiom, but it is infinitely better to know other people. Jessie Taurion knew herself so well that she hardly had time to know her lover.

Consequently she attributed entirely wrong motives to him, and he, instead of being greeted as was her custom, by a caress, on his appearance this morning received only coldness which he naturally resented.

His resentment angered her, and she lost her temper, accusing him of flirtation on the flimsiest pretext.

Bitterly hurt at her lack of trust, he had kept perfect silence, which annoyed her further, and then she had told him her love for him had died out of her heart.

Too proud, too hurt to ask explanation, he had merely said:

"It is only right. If a woman cannot trust, she does not love," and had left her.

Jessie crouched in her misery on the floor until the sun burning on her hair reminded her it was afternoon.

Then she rose and tried to work. But it was impossible. She had no heart. Colour she had gloried in meant nothing; it might have been black, and sadly she turned the easel to the wall and rang the bell.

A thought had occurred to her. Jack and she had been going to a gallery that afternoon, perhaps he had left a message with the maid. But she did not know Jack. There was no message.

Furious with herself for having thought his anger would relent, and vowing never to see him again, she packed up the dainty trifles he had given her; a piece of enamel, a quaint box covered with wrought-iron; a vestment of red brocade; a scent-bottle, the lid encrusted with turquoises; her engagement ring, an Egyptian signet, thousands of years old, which he had given her because it was his choicest treasure; a beaten silver bowl which he had filled every day with flowers; rich laces, pictures, photographs, a miniature of La Pompadour, were all heaped into a brass-mounted coffer, his gift also, and sent to his home.

Her studio was bare when she had stripped it of his gifts, but the anger was still in her heart, hot and fierce against him, and she scarcely felt the wrench. The past was better uprooted at once she felt, but her conscience told her that this step made its return impossible.

Jessie went away to Devonshire, leaving the easel with its picture to the wall, and worked steadily for a couple of months. An exhibition of her pictures brought her to London again, but only for a few weeks. In spite of the growing appreciation of her painting, she could not forget what had been. Her studio made her desperate. She could not bear to sit in it alone. All through the lonely weeks in the country she had felt that she alone was to blame, but pride and shame forbade her making the first advances.

In September she came back again, impelled by a reason she did not stop to fathom, and whilst all London was in the country or by the sea, she, the beggars and the cats shared the deserted squares and streets between them. Jessie would walk for hours at night through street after street, so that she might sleep through sheer physical weariness, and began a series of night scenes in London in September, which reflected the agony of mind and distress she was undergoing.

One night she had wandered far into the dreary outskirts of Bayswater, and suddenly discovered she had lost her way. It was bright moonlight, and she saw a man leaning against a wall near the end of the street. Running up to him she inquired the way, and to her horror found he was drunk. In answer to her question the drunkard turned round and leered at her, at the same time catching hold of her arm.

"You come along with me, Missie," he said, "I'll show yer the way proper."

Jessie gave a little scream of terror, and struggled to free herself. The sight of two men at the other end of the street gave her fresh courage, and she screamed louder still.

They ran up, the drunkard was knocked into the road, and then Jessie saw that one of them was Jack Brayworth. He made no sign. She felt paralysed, and with broken words of thanks walked away quickly.

About a week later, as she was driving home from a dinner at her sister's, she recognised a well-known figure standing near the gas-lamp at the end of the row of houses in which she lived. It was Jack Brayworth.

Flinging herself back in the cab, she passionately asked herself why he was there?

Then she remembered her maid had spoken of a man who was always hanging about the studios at night. Was it Jack, and was he always watching over her.

For the first time since she had driven her lover away, Jessie Taurion wept and wept bitterly. The tears bore away the barriers pride and womanly perverseness had builded over her heart, and after a sleepless night with the grey of the early dawn about her she wrote to Jack Brayworth.

"I cannot ask you to forgive me, since I have sinned too deeply against you. But I implore you to come to me. Your love was the strong arm on which I leant; it helped me to surmount all obstacles, and I cannot live without its support. I am entirely to blame, and I was utterly mad to speak to you as I did. I am very tired. Come to me."

In the dusk of the evening he came to her, and that night the rustling of the creeper over the window had a new meaning, and the distant hum of life a fuller sound of gladness to Jessie Taurion. A. Stockport.

The Romance of a Chemist's Shop.

When Theodore Burton first came to Banford, as manager of the little chemist's shop in the High Street, he thought he should have a dull time of it, but he soon changed his mind. Not that he knew many more people at the end of six months, than he had done at first, but he knew one, and that one comprised all Banford for him.

She came to the shop very often, as much as three times a week, and she always stayed for ten minutes or more, chatting gaily in her cheery cultivated voice. She was very pretty, too—or at least so thought Theodore—dark, with a bright, vivacious face, and such dancing, mischievous, blue eyes. But she had not been to the shop for nearly a week now, and Theodore was getting anxious, anxious about another matter too.

He had met her one evening, walking with a tall, dark man—a conceited looking fellow, Theodore thought—with whom she seemed to be on the best of terms, and he wondered who he was, and had been wondering ever since. Not that it mattered much to him, but he liked finding out things that puzzled him, so he resolved to discover who this fellow was. He hardly owned to himself how much he missed her, and how eagerly he looked forward to her next visit.

These visits were pleasant episodes in his monotonous life, he assured himself; her bright witty conversation cheered and amused him, and that was all. She could be nothing but a mere acquaintance to him, as he had been engaged for more than two years to Miss Clara Smith, a plain angular young woman in Leicester, but who possessed a neat little income.

Despite the fact of his engagement, however, Theodore saw no harm in a mild flirtation with his newly-formed acquaintance.

He had discovered that her name was Dorothy Williams, and she was not more than twenty-three he felt sure. But he must be careful, very, very careful.

It would never do for her to get fond of him, which was more than likely she would do, seeing how handsome and fascinating he was, and he smiled complacently, and stroked his long golden moustache, as he caught a glimpse of his face in a strip of mirror which adorned the top of a fancy box of perfume.

But—ting, went the door bell and there she was, fair, smiling, and lovely as ever.

Theodore's heart seemed to leap to his mouth, and he actually blushed to the roots of his fair, luxuriant curls.

"Oh! Ah! Good morning, what may I have the pleasure of doing for you?" he stammered, trying hard to assume his wonted demeanour.

"Those dear little bottles in the window; I wish to know the price of each one so that I can choose," she answered smilingly. "I want a very pretty and yet inexpensive one, as the contents of my purse are limited."

"Suppose you take one now as a sample," Theodore suggested gallantly, "and then if you like the perfume you can always get another."

"Thank you, you are very kind," she replied a trifle primly, "but I think I would rather pay for it now."

She selected one and paid for it, but seemed in no hurry to go. Instead—to his great delight—she chatted pleasantly for quite a quarter of an hour, questioning the young chemist as to how he could afford to sell some articles so cheaply, and why others were so expensive; and expressing her opinions freely, relative to the merits and demerits of various toilet requisites. Theodore wished the conversation would change, and that she would talk of herself, but he was not bored by her questions and gave all the information in his power. After all, it showed how intellectual she was, and that she could take an interest in something other than a new dress, or pretty hat, though these latter evidently found favour in her eyes.

"I am so fond of the science of chemistry and drugs," she explained apologetically. "My brothers tease me about it, and say that I should belong to the pill-making fraternity; but you don't mind my tiresome questions, I know, you are so kind."

Mind! He would have gone on answering her questions for ever, as he hastened to assure her in somewhat modified terms. But alas! Pleasant moments come to an end all too soon. Another customer entered the shop, and having no further excuse for staying she took her deparure, thought not without reluctance, Theodore told himself triumphantly. When his other customer had gone, he found himself dwelling on his fair questioner's looks and words, with a persistence he could not shake off!

"I really believe I am in love with the girl," he muttered to himself, "and I'm positive she likes me too, or why does she come here so often? She doesn't buy anything much, it is only an excuse to get here to talk to me. Deuced awkward thing! What am I to do? If I throw over Clara she'll break her heart—and there's that money, too—but then, I can't have my lovely Dorothy break hers. Bother the girls! Why did the two of them fall in love with the same man? That's one of the penalties of being good looking. I must find out if Dorothy loves me, and if she does, well, Clara must go to the wall, money and all; and if she doesn't, why then, I can fall back on Clara, and no one any the wiser."

And having arrived at this satisfactory conclusion Theodore betook himself to his dinner, without one pang of remorse for the absent Clara, or her feelings, should Dorothy reciprocate his passion, which he hoped and believed she did.

Fortune favoured him. The next day was a half-holiday, and Mr. Burton closed his shop for a few hours, and set out for a long ramble through the woods, and as the unexpected always happens, the first person he saw walking ahead of him was—Dorothy.

A few rapid strides soon brought him up to her.

"How do you do, Miss Williams? This is an unexpected pleasure," he exclaimed, radiant with the delight he could not conceal. He fancied she did not look quite so pleased at first as she might have done, but she was soon as charming and bewitching as ever, and he felt that it was now or never, he would make a bold plunge, confident of success.

"I am more than glad I have met you," he resumed, "as I have something very important to say, something I could not say in the shop it is of infinite importance to me, as I venture to hope it will be to you. I——"

"I know what you are going to say," she interrupted hastily, "that I come to your shop too often, that people have begun to notice it, and so on. They are dreadful gossips about here, I know, my husband told me to be careful."

"Your what?" gasped Theodore.

"My husband. Didn't you know I was married?" she inquired sweetly.

"Know! How on earth should I know?" he returned in a strange voice. "Why didn't you tell me before?"

"Because you didn't ask me," she answered demurely.

"But why did you come to the shop so often, and—and talk so much," stammered the bewildered Theodore.

"Oh! I am afraid I have been very mean," she replied with a contrite air, "but my husband is setting up a large drug shop here and as you are the only chemist, I wished to find out your prices, so that we could undersell you as much as possible. Mean, wasn't it? But you know it is done every day in business."

"Was that fellow I met you with one night your husband?" he asked gloomily."

"I should say so," she replied, "as I don't go for a walk with any other 'fellow.'"

"Oh!" was all he said. To say that he had received a shock is saying little. His vanity was wounded and his pride hurt. He had received a blow from which he would be long in recovering. Thank goodness! Clara didn't know, she would never forgive him if she did, she was so jealous. He still had her and her money to fall back upon.

"Really, Mr. Burton, you seem quite cross," the sweet voice at his side exclaimed; "but you mustn't be, you must forgive me and let us still be friends. I must introduce you to my friend, Clara Smith, who is coming from Leicester to stay some weeks with me. I have written and told her all about you, and how nice and kind you were to me, and you'd never think how interested she was. She will be so amused when she hears that you thought I was single all the time. She isn't exactly pretty, but very, very nice. I am sure——" but Theodore suddenly remembered that he must hurry back to the shop, and raising his hat, almost flew away, leaving Dorothy smiling an enigmatical smile.

* * * * *

The next week the handsome Theodore had gone, and Banford knew him no more. A new manager—plain and middle-aged—presided over the little chemist's shop in the High Street.

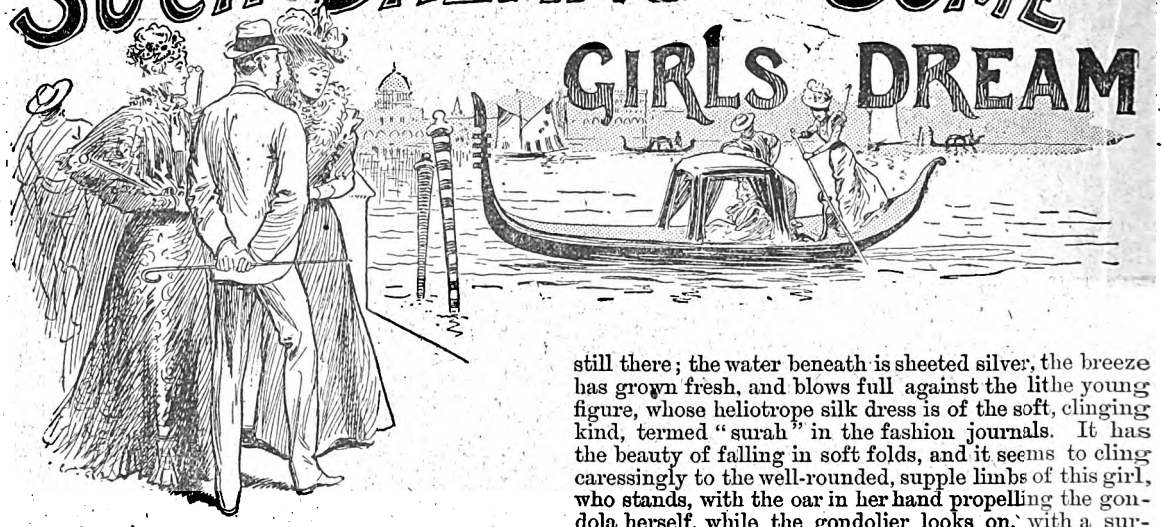
SUCH DREAMS AS SOME GIRLS DREAM



"See there!" exclaimed Mrs. Cadwallader, with a portentous wave of her hand—"one of that objectionable type of the English girl who brings discredit on our good breeding, and gives rise to erroneous ideas about our society amongst Continental people."

The good lady rustled all over with a sort of tremor of indignation. Her companions were a tall, aristocratic young girl, in a severely simple black satin dress, straight in its folds, clinging in its outline as the drapery of a statue, its sombre hue only relieved by three strings of amber beads wound closely about her throat; with a broad, black plush hat, and long black plumes, drooping over the pale, fair, high-bred face; and the other a young man, well groomed, with handsome dark eyes, a straight, positive-looking nose, a somewhat opinionated mouth, and, over all, that reserved and, at the same time, languid air supposed to be "good form" in exclusive circles.

The young lady slowly lifted her white eyelids, and faintly shrugged her drooping shoulders, as if to say, "Really, mamma, I have no interest in this sort of thing!"

Howard Winthrop, on the contrary, looked with a dawning interest kindling in his dark eyes.

It was a fresh October evening, and Venice was all aglow with light and sparkle. In the Plaza San Marco the white-coated bandsmen were making music in their own masterly manner.

Ladies in grand toilets sit and eat ices under the great arches, and street vendors of flowers and sweetmeats and lemonade, or the delicate white shell-work, and a hundred other trifles, go about with their wares. Red-sashed gondoliers, swarthy sailors, with great golden hoops in their brown ears, gorgeous Turks, Greek merchants, and the straight-browed Venetian ladies, with their dark, slumberous, melancholy eyes—all make a moving panorama of colour and light charming to the eye.

But our friends were not looking at this picture just now, but at a gondola near them, in which stood a young girl, her slight form thrown out in a cameo-like relief against the sky. The sun has set, but the after-glow is still there; the water beneath is sheeted silver, the breeze has grown fresh, and blows full against the lithe young figure, whose heliotrope silk dress is of the soft, clinging kind, termed "surah" in the fashion journals. It has the beauty of falling in soft folds, and it seems to cling caressingly to the well-rounded, supple limbs of this girl, who stands, with the oar in her hand propelling the gondola herself, while the gondolier looks on, with a surprised grin upon his face.

The light upon the flushed face shows intense and vivid colouring, and all the charms of youth and health, added to a sort of radiant independence of everybody and everything. The bronze gold hair that hangs in a bewitchingly soft, curly fringe almost down to the "wine-dark violet eyes," is carelessly blown by the same wind, and the long old-gold feather that decorates a plush hat of the same colour, sweeps out like a meteor upon the breeze.

"I knew I could do it, mamma," she is saying to a pale, delicate-looking woman, whose plain grey dress forms the greatest contrast to her daughter's. "It only needs practice to do anything."

Howard Winthrop could not resist the thrill of admiration that ran like a subtle electric fire through his whole being. The fresh, unconventional attitude, the radiant health and youth, the vigour, the fire, the verve.

At that moment, the long feather, having lost its hold in the rude struggle with the wind, fluttered away like some bright-winged bird, and sailing along for a moment with a sort of giddy delight in its freedom, dropped suddenly and softly as a golden shadow at the young man's feet.

He seized it rapturously but tenderly, and hastened nearer the water's edge. The flight had been noticed, and the gondola was turned toward the land.

The young lady looked about her as it stopped, and, having discerned a very handsome young man with her plume in his hand, she smiled a bewitching smile.

"It was carried to my feet," Howard said, bowing.

"She's dreadful for losing her things," said the mother, in a plaintive voice, hovering near, like a dim grey moth about a gorgeous butterfly. "Nothing ever stays on her that can get away."

"I would call that an evidence of the depravity of inanimate things," said Howard, with an admiring glance.

The mother looked puzzled. The daughter laughed.

"They come back, you see," she said.

"I should think they would," answered Howard. "I'm sure I wish I might."

Digitized by Google

He was quite shocked at his own boldness, but perhaps more so at the girl's answer.

"I wish you would; we don't known anyone here."

Yet her face was so frank and ingenuous that he could not think evil of her cordiality.

"I should be glad to be of service to you in any way," he answered, readily. "I know Venice pretty well, as this is my third visit."

"We are not at a hotel, but at a pension, and it's very dull," she said. "We stayed one night at a place in the Plaza San Marco, but the people never go to bed there, and mamma could not sleep. We are abroad for her health, and so we had to find a quiet place, and it is quiet—oh, deadly quiet!"

Howard suddenly recollected his companions who were waiting for him, and drew out his card. The grey mother produced one of hers, and feebly seconded her daughter's invitation. The whole proceeding struck the young man as curious and unconventional in the extreme, as he walked back to his party. While he had looked at the radiant vision, it seemed correct and proper.

"They don't know me. I might be a blackleg and an adventurer. I hope they don't admit everyone so carelessly. The girl is so beautiful."

And he experienced a sort of pang at the fear that any one else should be taken into their acquaintance in the same unconventional manner.

"I can be of real service to them," he said to himself, as he took out the cards and read, "Mrs. John Stirling." "Miss Dulcie Stirling."

"Dulcie."

What an odd diminutive, yet it had a soft, clinging music about it that thrilled him. It was singing itself over and over again in his brain when he came upon Mrs. Cadwallader, looking very stately and sedate, and Miss Mabel with an additional frosting in her face and manner.

"Really, Howard, that very outré and curious person seemed to have something to say to you," said the elder lady.

But Howard did not satisfy the curiosity that was evident. He only bestirred himself to procure a gondola, and in a few moments they were afloat on the smooth, shining water. It is not yet dark, the after-glow has not yet faded.

The golden lamps shine out like golden flowers against the deep violet shadows. Domes and spires come out distinctly in that light, and all the serried masts of the merchant fleet at the mouth of the Quidecca stand up like lances. So they glide on till the darkness falls, and a pale crescent moon rises "like a silver sickle in a field of stars."

But Howard Winthrop is thinking of none of these things. He sees instead a slight figure in a pale purple gown, with a vivacious, sparkling face and wind-blown bronze hair. "She's deuced pretty, but 'bad form,'" he decides, as he lights his cigarette that night. Yet she had taken possession of his fancy, and seemed quite at home there.

No one could have been more astonished than our hero himself when, a few evenings after this, he found himself drifting over the sheeted silver of those same waters with the enchantress herself. How it had come about was not exactly clear to him; but it seemed as if the invitation had come from Miss Dulcie herself, and that her mother had failed at the last moment.

The girl frankly held out her hand: it was rosy-white and dimpled.

"We hire the gondola by the week," the young lady had volunteered, "and it's a pity to send it away with such a moonlight, too."

So Winthrop found himself at her side, feeling as if he were sailing in an enchanted boat on an enchanted sea.

"Mamma gets tired so soon," she says to him, frankly, "that I have to go about alone. One hour in a picture-gallery uses her up, and she doesn't remember anything about it, poor dear; so what's the use."

"But you are too young, and, excuse me, too pretty to go about without a chaperone," said Winthrop looking at the effects of moonlight on the glowing face that bloomed like a flower in that pallid light.

She wore a dress of Vandyke blue velvet, with a cape of white Spanish lace carelessly tied over it. About her neck was a quaint collar of filigree silver, and on her arms bracelets of the same delicate frostwork. A Rembrant hat of blue plush, with a long blue feather, held in place by a bird's silver claw, shaded but did not conceal the glory of her ruddy hair.

It gave Winthrop a sort of pang that he could not explain to look at her and think of her freedom.

It was not the proper thing at all.

"They have such musty, fusty ideas in this Old World," she said, smiling brightly up in his face, "I rather like to shock them. Perhaps I shock you, too?"

"Would you enjoy that?" the young man asked, evasively.

"Oh no! I would rather you approved of me; though"—with a mutinous and bewitching smile—"I don't know that I would give up my own way to bring that about. I've been a good deal indulged—you have seen that, I know. The doctors told mamma long ago, when I was a child, that if I was opposed I would burst a blood-vessel and die. I'm afraid I've made use of her fear to get my own way. It's an ignoble confession to make, isn't it?"

"Yet you look extremely healthy," he answered, in a sceptical tone. "I own I should be tempted some time to oppose you. It's not healthful for any human soul to meet no crosses."

"Well, mamma consoles herself for her own weakness by thinking I may have a strong hand to rule me one of these days. She takes the most dismal views of matrimony, do you know, and says, 'Poor dear! she will suffer enough one of these days. Let her enjoy life now.'"

He ground his teeth in impotent rage when he saw his charmer leaning upon the Count's arm

"But you? I trust your views are more rose-coloured," said Winthrop, feeling his heart beat more rapidly, and half-despising himself for it.

What was this strange, impulsive creature to him?

"I? Oh, yes! I have my own dreams—what girl has not? I do not believe life is so leaden-hued as some say. The poets are particularly to blame for that, I think. They should be crowned with cypress instead of laurel, for all the dismal songs of grief and gloom they have perpetrated. But I have not seen the Fairy Prince yet—at least, I think I have not," with a mischievous look into Winthrop's eyes. "You know I am not eighteen, and not out."

Winthrop thought it would be hard to find a girl more emancipated, although she was not out.

"I predict all bright things for you," he said; "let me look at your hand. I learned palmistry once from an Arab."

The girl frankly held out her hand; it was rosy-white and dimpled. Its soft touch, as it lay in his own, thrilled Winthrop from head to foot.

"The line of life is——".

He hesitated. He knew it was all nonsense, but he felt his heart sink as he saw that mystic line so suddenly broken on the little rose-lined hand.

"Well, what is it? Shall I die soon? That will be when my husband contradicts me, I know."

Winthrop rallied, and spoke gayly.

"You will have a long life, a rich husband, and always have your own way. Here is a dark man who loves you."

It was quite in the approved gipsy style, and Dulcie nodded.

"Oh, yes. I know the dark man."

"What!" exclaimed Winthrop, in surprise. "I thought you knew no one."

"Oh, he is an Italian count we met at Trouville in the summer—a dark, gloomy fellow, with magnificent eyes. He has a history."

"They all have."

"He is very poor."

"They all are."

"And he talks English in a broken way, and in a low musical voice. He was teaching me Italian, and I am going on with the lessons when I get to Naples. He lives in Naples."

Winthrop could not account for the jealous pang that stabbed his heart.

"Mamma has been in constant terror lest I should fall in love with him on account of the romance of the thing; but I'm afraid of foreigners. I feel that Count Toriani could do any one of those dark deeds we read about in Italian romances; but there is an interest in being with a man who adores you," with a bright glance.

Winthrop winced.

"So he adores you, and tells you so?"

"Oh, yes. He reads me sonnets full of volcanic passion. He accounts for my indifference by believing that I am too young to be fully awakened to the best happiness of my life."

"And you go about with him?" Winthrop asked, in a dumb fury.

"Certainly. He is splendid-looking and a perfect gentleman. Besides he knows his country, as a foreigner could not do; and he appears to feel so much, that I cannot crush him at a blow—can I, now?"

Winthrop felt himself growing hard and cold at this information.

"You can only decide that for yourself," he said.

Somehow, the rest of the sail seemed to have lost its enchantment. They landed and climbed the sandy ridges that glisten in the silvery light.

Every pool is a molten mirror. Before them lies the placid lagoon, on one side a line of dark blue, with creamy waves crawling lazily upon the shore. It is the Adriatic.

It was in vain that Winthrop tried to withdraw himself from the subtle charm of Dulcie's society. In vain he repeated to himself that she was too unconventional—too impulsive for that strict and cool circle in which he moved at home.

Mrs Cadwallader shrugged her shoulders at the very mention of the girl, and Mrs. Cadwallader was the autocrat of his society. She had voted Miss Dulcie "crude—crude in the extreme," and there was scarcely a more significant term in that lady's vocabulary.

There was Mabel, a truly high-bred and perfect specimen of conventional breeding—a girl whose voice, musically modulated, was never raised above the regulation tone, whose step, floating and graceful, was never quickened by impulse, whose manner was cool, and quiet, and charming, but she charmed Winthrop no more.

He found himself longing for Dulcie's changing, ringing tones. There was everything in her voice, appeal, merriment, tenderness—it was as changed as her eyes, her face, her whole manner. She was never the same—a perpetual study, an eternal delight. She was outré, perhaps bizarre; but she fascinated him.

He spent all the time when he was away from her in steeling his heart against her, but with the first glance into her fearless bright eyes all his panoply fell from him, and he became her slave.

And so at last they find themselves together in Naples, and a new personage appears on the scene.

The tall, dark, melancholy nobleman, who expresses a whole record of past grandeur and fallen fortunes in his sallow, pathetic face and sombre, dark eyes, is seen everywhere with Dulcie.

Her mother seems to keep in the background as persistently as if she were indeed a grey moth, and shunned the daylight.

When the Count saw Winthrop, an antagonism seemed to spring up at once in his breast. He discerned a rival, and hated him from that moment.

As for our hero, he ground his teeth in impotent rage when he saw his charmer leaning upon the Count's arm, looking up with a bright smile into his face, listening to his broken sentences, as if they were the wisdom of the gods. He tried remonstrating with feeble Mrs. Stirling, who was just at that moment engrossed in a new symptom, and indifferent to everything else.

"It gives rise to remark," he said, "unless a young lady is engaged to the gentleman."

"Oh, dear me!" she wailed; "don't ask me to interfere. Dulcie does as she likes; she always has—she always will; I haven't the nerve to control her—and, after all, I'm sure of her, Mr. Winthrop. She is very independent, but she will do right always—I have that confidence about her. Do you know anything of Johumi's remedy for neuralgia? I have heard wonders of it."

Winthrop answered somewhat wildly, and got away in a discouraged mood. He must speak to the young lady herself. Most girls are keenly alive to rumour; and perhaps he might alarm her sufficiently to make her throw aside this languishing Count, who infuriated him so with his adoring airs.

It was a lovely sunset. As Winthrop stepped out upon the terrace between the sculptured vases full of trailing flowers, he saw a view which is, perhaps, the most famous in the world. The bay, like a shining crescent, lay before him, purple and emerald in the shadow of rocky headlands.

The fishing-barques, with their white wings, look like birds asleep on the blue waters.

There is a flicker of amber among the trailing ivies beneath him, and he hurries toward it. Dulcie is sitting there, idly picking some flowers to bits, a mosaic of bright leaves lies over her dress.

"So you serve the offerings of your victims?" he said, grimly.

"Oh, they are from the Count. I couldn't keep all he gives me."

"Does it never strike you that you might stop it, if you don't care for it?" Winthrop asked somewhat brusquely.

Dulcie opened her lovely eyes.

"But suppose it is not altogether unpleasant?"

"Oh, in that case it is quite correct, otherwise it might be better not to give rise to surmises that may be incorrect and injurious."

There was a slight rigidity about Dulcie's mouth and a little tremour in her voice.

"And why should you care?"

With those lovely eyes raised to his, the fresh young lips so near, the slender form within his reach, Winthrop's self-possession deserted him. A thicket of ivy and myrtle screened them from sight. He forgot everything but the rapturous beating of his own heart. In a second he had snatched her to his breast, and pressed a sudden kiss upon the scarlet lips.

"Because I love you, darling!" he murmured.

The golden-bronze head lay on his shoulder one second, while Dulcie said artlessly:

"Oh, I am glad—glad!" when a sudden rustle startled them. The Count stood glowering at them with gloomy eyes.

Winthrop started back, with a sudden impulse to knock him down, there was so much hate in the dark face. But he restrained himself—perhaps the man had done him a service. He had interrupted a passing frenzy; yes, that was what our unworthy hero styled his unpremeditated confession.

"Leave me!" Dulcie whispered. "I must speak to him! I can calm the wild beast in him, I am sure!"

Winthorp was glad to go away. He felt quite breathless with the plunge he had taken. It was all over now—too late to escape.

Was it too late? He had been betrayed into a sudden declaration and a kiss. Well? Dulcie had heard many such, and had been kissed before, very likely. A girl so very unconventional—no, somehow Winthrop could not wrong her in his mind.

What was a kiss? He felt the touch yet upon his lips light as a rose-leaf, yet glowing as a flame. Should he give up all for that kiss? Dulcie was sweet and bewitching, but she was not the wife for him. She was "crude, undeniably crude."

He felt, somehow, all the harder to her that he had been betrayed into that weakness. He had looked upon himself as a self-poised, self-centred fellow, who had himself well in hand; this undisciplined rebound of his nature was owing to her.

Her unfettered nature had worked upon his own to his detriment; he must shake off the fetters.

He nerved himself to the task, and sat down to write. He would not see her again—he dared not. The very memory of her witchery stole to him like a subtle and bewildering perfume.

He must write.

Never was task so hard. Over and over again he attempted and tore into bits the unsatisfying result.

Now it was diffuse and kind; now it was too short and cold. At last, he kept one in despair.

It ran as follows:

My Dear Miss Dulcie,—I am called away so suddenly that I fear I shall not have the happiness of seeing you again. Forgive me for the liberty I took this afternoon. I cannot forgive myself. Believe me, the feeling was not feigned; but I scorn myself for the weakness that betrayed me into an expression of interest that I cannot indulge. Circumstances, our own spheres in society and the fitness of things, must all be consulted as well as that treacherous organ—the human heart. Make my adieux kindly to your mother.—With best wishes for yourself, I am,

Yours, very humbly and repentantly,
Howard Winthrop.

When the young man had dispatched this note, he began to pack hurriedly. He had not the nerve to meet the girl again after having sent it.

He resolved to wait until it was dark, and then to go. He could trump up some reason for the Cadwalladers.

The night was singularly alive and bright. Winthrop noticed that Vesuvius's plume had grown into a column; it grew beneath his eye, piling itself mass on mass. As he gazed, it was no longer a plume, but an arch that spanned half the horizon.

It grew rosy, fire-tipped. The dark billows were rose-crowned, the sombre mountains of smoke were flame-capped. The mountain was in eruption.

He paused to look. The sight charmed him and made him forget his journey for the moment.

There was a trembling in the earth, in the air. Then a volley of black vapour shot up, rent with veins of fire, like a cloud veined with lightning, and streams of lava—seething liquid flame—began crawling down the cone.

Standing so transfixed, Winthrop has forgotten everything. He is not aware of a dark shadow stealing behind him, or of the glitter of steel flashing near. Only when he hears a woman's cry and feels two round, young arms about his neck, does he realize that someone is crashing away through the shrubbery, and that Dulcie has fainted in his arms.

He lifts her to a long rustic seat near, and realizes for the first time that he has stopped near the garden—nay, that they are on the very spot where he had kissed her that very day. She lies there now pale as the stone Niobe that stands near, and he suddenly sees with a cold horror that there is blood streaming over her white dress.

But the lovely eyes are open for a moment, and an arm steals about his neck again.

"I saved you, did I not, darling? You are not hurt?"

"No, no—but you? I do not understand."

"It is a scratch. But the count's dagger was aimed for your heart. I have saved you—that is joy enough."

Then she fainted away again, and he is aware that the attendants are thronging about them—that the mother is hovering with feeble moans over her daughter—that a medical gentleman is examining the wound. "It is not serious," he says; and then Winthrop gives her up to other hands with a sickening feeling of reluctance, and she is carried into the house.

He paces the garden-walks a long time, but scarcely looks at the wondrous panorama before him. Only he feels as if he, too, had undergone some strange convulsion of nature, as if a torrent of seething lava coursed through his veins instead of blood.

"And I have been ready to cast away such a love!" he groaned—"a love that could fling away life as a worthless thing for my sake. Oh, my darling, forgive me! I know I cannot live without you now."

Suddenly, the memory of the letter stabbed him like a dagger. It had not reached her, evidently, before she had left the house. His messenger had, indeed, stopped on the way to do a little courting on his own account.

"Oh, fool that I have been!" he cried, starting into a hurried walk. "My doom is sure if she sees that. She would never forgive that cursed, cold, heartless letter!—my proud darling!"

He hurried up to the hotel, hoping it might not yet have been delivered. He felt as if he would give ten years of his life to get that scrap of paper in his hand once more. He had some hope as he asked for Mrs. Stirling.

There seemed an unusual bustle about the halls. A flurried look in people's faces. Mrs. Stirling did not come to him. He made his way to their room. The door stood open.

"Is she worse?" he asked, as he caught Mrs. Stirling hurrying by. "Is the wound more serious than the doctor thought?"

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, go away!" moaned the mother. "She has burst a blood-vessel, the doctor says. It is not the wound at all, only he says the excitement may have brought it on. She was quite calm, and was reading a note someone brought her. She gave a strange cry as she looked at it, and the blood gushed from her mouth. There is no hope. I cannot be calm, and so they will not let me stay with her. No—no, you must not go in."

But Howard Winthrop heeded nothing. He strode onward to the couch upon which they had laid the wounded girl. She was ghastly white but conscious, and turned from him with a shudder.

He forgot conventionality then. It mattered not to him that his conduct was "bad form." He dropped on his knees at the bedside and gasped out:

"Forget it, Dulcie; it is not true. I have found out my own heart now, and know that you are my life. I love you—before Heaven, I love you!"

She lifted her languid eyes to him, and the shadow of a smile touched her pallid lips.

"I told you that I had never been crossed in my life. You see, when it came I could not bear it. I am going to die, because I cannot have my own way. I am a poor weak creature, after all."

"You are heroic," cried Howard, with a great sob in his throat; "do not slip away from me now, then I know your worth. Oh, darling! God has angels enough without you. Tell me—tell me you forgive."

She held out the crushed slip of paper she still had in her hand.

"Take it," she whispered faintly. "I forgive—and believe—in spite—of all—that you love me."

A grey pallor settled on her face, and Winthrop was hustled from the room to pace his own floor till the sudden hush that falls on all earthly sounds when one Presence enters settles down over all. He knew he had thrown away the most priceless boon ever offered to man, that he had murdered his own happiness for ever.

He could hear the "Never, never," whispered by the phantom years.

A voice that followed him with a ceaseless cadence of pain, saying always, "It might have been. It might have been."

BRITON OR BOER?

A THRILLING TALE OF THE FIGHT FOR AFRICA.

In 1896, Mr. George Griffith wrote an African romance entitled "Briton or Boer?" which, coming so soon after the Jameson Raid, was read with unusual interest.

Nothing could be more interesting than to read a prediction of a war now in progress for the possession of the richest region of the earth.

The chief characters are not fictions of the imagination, but life pictures of the very men who are now fighting.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Knight of King's Guard," by Ewan Martin, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. D. Wilson, 9 Argyle Street, Greenock. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 12th. Post-cards only, please.

Reckoning Without the Hens.

ON the boundary of a large town on the Clyde, there lives an old woman, named Aunt Su, who makes a living by keeping a fews hens, etc., and who takes her eggs weekly to the town to sell.

One day, before she left the shop, the grocer said:

"Look here, Aunt Su, the grocers have held a meeting last night and they have decided to reduce the price of the eggs."

Aunt Su said nothing, but went her way.

Next visiting day, having picked the smallest eggs, she again called on the grocer, who on seeing the size of the eggs, said:

"Why, what is the meaning of this, why are the eggs so small?"

"Well," answered Aunt Su, "the hens held a meetin' las' night, wi' the result that they're no' goin' ta lay bigger anes ta the price has been raised."

The price was raised. D. W.

Beating the Record.

AN old Scotch housewife was debating with a neighbour on one occasion as to who of the twain could recall the windiest day in their Highland valley.

"I mind sic a wind blawin' ane winter," said the first speaker, "that thae rooks were five 'oors fleein' hame frae the North Brae tae their nesties at Hill Fell, which is no mair than twa miles."

"Hoots, wumman, that's juist naething at a'! Ah've minded it that windy that the rooks couldna' flee at a', an' had tae walk hame!"

Not the Sort of Glass he Wanted.

A GOOD story is told of one of the new school of Scotch parsons who was recently preaching in a strange church in a village. Fearing his hair was not properly parted in the middle, or that he had a smudge on his nose, he quietly and significantly said to the beadle—there being no mirror in the vestry:

"John, could you get me a glass?"

John disappeared, and after a few minutes, returned with a parcel underneath his coat, which, to the astonishment of the parson, he produced, in the form of a lemonade bottle with a gill of whisky, saying:

"Ye mauna lat on about it, minister, for I got it as a great favour, and I wadna hae got it ava if I hadna said it was for you!"

The Jehu Again.

A FEW days ago the traffic in one of the principal London thoroughfares was being regulated by a policeman, who held up his hand to stop two or three cabs in order to let an old lady cross the road.

One cabby, however, did not stop immediately he saw the policeman's signal, which caused the bobby to sing out in a loud voice:

"Didn't you see me hold up my hand?"

"Well," said cabby, "it did grow dark suddenly, but I had all my work cut out to keep my horse from shying at your feet!" S. J. B.

The Worst of all Swindles.

WHEN a well-known theatrical lady was touring in America with her burlesque company, she arrived at a settlement in the Far West. Hers was the first dramatic company ever seen there, the "lecture hall" being generally occupied by panoramas of the Civil War.

A stage was fitted up in the hall, and an act-drop and curtain combined was painted.

On the night of the performance, the first to arrive was a six-foot miner. He paid his half-dollar, and took a front seat in the pit. After staring at the newly-painted curtain (representing a waterfall) for about ten minutes, he rose and went out. As he passed the ticket-taker he observed:

"Wall, that's the rankest panoramer ever I seed for half-a-dollar." K. D.

Not Quite Disinterested.

SOME years ago an active young fellow rushed on to the Temple Pier just in time to see the paddle-wheels of the steamer by which he wished to travel beginning slowly to revolve. Rather than lose the boat, he sprang on deck from the floating pier, clearing a distance of some three or four feet.

No sooner had he performed this not very hazardous achievement, when an elderly gentleman began to remonstrate with him on the foolhardiness of running so great a risk.

The young man could not help feeling flattered at the interest displayed on his behalf by one to whom he was a total stranger, and was on the point of giving vent to his feelings when the seemingly benevolent old gentleman thus concluded his remonstrance:

"You know, sir, you might have missed your footing and been drowned, in which case your family would probably have brought an action against the steamboat company, and I'm a shareholder!" S. H.

She Put Her Foot Down.

A LITTLE girl had been ill, and had struggled through the early stages of convalescence. She had taken "nourishing" broths and "nourishing" jellies until her soul was weary of them.

One morning she electrified the family by sitting bolt upright in bed, and saying:

"I want you to take notice. I'm not going to take any more nourishment. I'm hungry and I want my dinner, and not another mouthful of nourishment will I eat."

The Only Topic.

A TRAIN ran into a certain railway station last week, and a first-class passenger sprang out and ran into the refreshment-room for a cup of tea. The train started and he made a dash for it, but was pulled back by a porter. Furiously angry at losing the train, he assailed the porter with many severe words. The crowd on the platform sided with the official.

"He only did his duty," said one.

"He may have saved your life," said another.

"If you abused me like that, I'd give you something!" cried a third.

"I wouldn't mind," said the passenger bitterly, "only I'm under orders to sail with my regiment for the front to-morrow morning, and now I'll lose the boat."

For an instant the crowd was silent, then with one accord it turned upon the luckless porter.

"You officious rascal!" cried one.

"You ass! Do you know you're only the servant of the public?" shouted another.

"You scoundrel!" roared a third. "If I were the officer I'd pound the life out of you!"

Told by One of the Regulars.

SOLDIERS belonging to line regiments are fond of telling stories at the expense of the militia. Here is one which was related before they came so prominently before the great B.P. owing to the present war.

While a certain militia regiment was encamped on a well-known common, a woman with her children came out there for an outing. During the time she was playing with the children a militiaman, passing, stole a loaf and ran off. The woman observing him, commenced calling:

"Stop thief!"

The colonel was close at hand, and, hearing the cry, rode up, asking the reason.

"That thief has stolen my loaf."

"Never mind," said the colonel, giving her half-a-crown; "this will get another for you. But for goodness' sake don't call 'Stop thief!' or I shan't have a man left in the regiment."

Chaffing the War Office.

IN one of our military stations the following correspondence is recorded between the senior commissariat and the War Office:

"The senior commissariat officer requests forage allowance for a second horse, as the distance from U—— to N—— is seventeen miles, and as the senior commissariat officer has to visit it three times a week, the work is too much for one horse."

In due course the following reply was received by the commissariat officer:

"I am directed by the Under Secretary of State to inform you that your application for forage for a second horse cannot be entertained, as the distance from U—— to N——, as the 'crow flies,' is only ten miles."

To which the following reply was sent:

"Sir, I beg to inform you that I do not ride a crow—I ride a horse."

The forage for the second horse was granted, but the general officer commanding was requested to speak to the commissariat officer for his levity in official correspondence.

The Prince of Wales's Joke.

THE Prince of Wales, it is said, occasionally likes to crack a joke over his mother's propensity for giving away Indian shawls.

At the Henley Regatta a year or two ago he was on a steam launch with a party engaged in scrutinising the other craft on the river. Their attention was especially drawn to a boat containing a pleasure party, one member of which was an elderly lady bearing a remarkable likeness to the Queen, and she seemed bent upon doing all in her power to heighten the resemblance.

One of the party on board the launch approached the Prince and ventured to draw his attention to the lady in question, jocularly suggesting that it was the Queen viewing the regatta incognito.

Just as His Royal Highness was levelling his field-glass upon her, she rose, and, taking the shawl on which she had been sitting, threw it round the shoulders of a young girl who was with her.

"It is undoubtedly the Queen," replied the Prince quietly. "She has discovered herself. I see that she has just presented one of her Indian shawls."

People Who Ought to Marry.

THEY were discussing profound subjects with the cynicism that only youth can develop.

"I have given the subject serious thought," she said, "and I have decided long ago that I would never marry."

"That shows you are a woman of intellect," he answered admiringly, "I long ago reached the same determination."

"Marriage," she observed, "is a state in which the chance for sorrow is great and the prospect of happiness is small."

"Very true. And what is more, it is a confession that one's intellectual cultivation is insufficient to elevate him above the necessity of companionship."

He had been holding her hand all this time, but neither of them seemed to realise the fact.

"Every rule," she said thoughtfully, "is proved by its exceptions."

"Yes, and I was just thinking——"

"What, Orlando?"

"That two people who hold such similar views of life as you and I ought to manage to get on splendidly."

She blushed and sighed and murmured:

"I was just thinking that it is very seldom that folks find such a true bond of sympathy as we have discovered."

THE ANGEL OF THE REVOLUTION

By GEORGE GRIFFITH

CHAPTER LXVI.

ARMAGEDDON.

On the southern side of London the struggle between the Franco-Italian armies and the troops of the Federation had been raging all night with unabated fury along a curved line extending from Bexley to Richmond.

The railways communicating with the ports of the south and east had, for their own purposes, been left intact by the commanders of the League; and, so sudden and utterly unexpected had been the invasion of the force from America, and the simultaneous uprising of the British Section of the Brotherhood, that they had fallen into the hands of the Federationists almost without a struggle. This had enabled the invaders and their allies to concentrate themselves rapidly along the line of action which had been carefully pre-determined upon.

Landing almost simultaneously at Southampton, Portsmouth, Shoreham, Newhaven, Hastings, Folkestone, Dover, Deal, Ramsgate, and Margate, they had been joined everywhere by their comrades of the British Section, whose first action, on receiving the signal from the sky, had been to seize the railways and shoot down, without warning or mercy, every soldier of the League who opposed them.

What happened at Harwich had at the same time and in the same fashion, happened at Dover and Chatham. The troops in occupation had been caught and crushed at a blow between overwhelming forces in front and rear. Added to this, the International was immensely stronger in France and Italy than in Russia, and therefore the defections from the ranks of the League had been far greater than they had been in the north.

Thousands had donned the red ribbon as the Signal flashed over their encampments, and when the moment came to repel the assault of the mysterious grey legions, that had sprung from no one knew where, the bewildered French and Italian officers found their regiments automatically splitting up into squads of tens and companies of hundreds, obeying other orders, and joining in the slaughter of their former comrades with the most perfect sang froid. By daybreak on the 6th the various divisions of the Federationists were well on their way to the French and Italian positions to the south of London. The utmost precautions had been taken to prevent any news reaching head-quarters, and these, as has been seen, were almost entirely successful.

The three army-corps sent southward with General le Gallifet met with a ruinous disaster long before they came face to face with the enemy. Ten of the fleet of thirty war-balloons which had been sent to co-operate with them, had been manned and commanded by men of the International. They were of the newest type and the swiftest in the fleet, and their crews were armed with the strangest weapons that had yet been used in war. These were bows and arrows, a curious anachronism amidst the elaborate machinery of destruction evolved by the science of the twentieth century, but none the less effective on that account. The arrows, instead of being headed in the usual way, carried on the end of the shaft two little glass tubes full of liquid, bound together, and tipped with fulminate.

When the fleet had been in the air about an hour these ten aerostats had so distributed themselves that each of them, with a little manœuvring, could get within bowshot of two others. They also rose a little higher than the rest. The flutter of a white handkerchief was the signal agreed upon, and when this was given by the man in command of the ten each of them suddenly put on speed, and ran up close to her nearest neighbour. A flight of arrows was discharged at the gasholder, and then she headed away for the next nearest, and discharged a flight at her.

Considering the apparent insignificance of the means employed, the effects were absolutely miraculous. The explosion of the fulminate on striking either the hard cordage of the net or one of the steel ribs used to give the gasholder rigidity broke the two tubes full of liquid. Then came another far more violent explosion which tore great rents in the envelope. The imprisoned gas rushed out in torrents and the crippled balloons began to sink, at first slowly and then more and more rapidly, till at last the cars, weighted with screws, machinery, and explosives, struck the earth with a crash and exploded like so many huge shells amidst the dense columns of the advancing army.

In fifteen minutes each of the ten captured aerostats had sent two others to the earth, and then, completely masters of the position, those in charge of them began their assault on the helpless masses below them. This was kept up until the Federation troops appeared. Then they retired to the rear of the French and Italian columns and devoted themselves to burning their stores and blowing up their ammunition-trains with fire-shell.

Assailed thus in front and rear, and demoralised by the defection of the thousands who, as soon as the battle became general, showed the red ribbon and echoed the fierce battle-cry of the Federation, the splendid force sent out by General le Gallifet was practically annihilated by midnight, and by daybreak the Federationists, after fifteen hours of almost continuous fighting, had stormed all the positions held by the French and Italians to the south of London, the batteries of which had already been destroyed by the air-ships.

Thus, when the Ithuriel passed over London on the morning of the 7th, the position of affairs was as follows: The two armies which had been detached by the Tsar and General le Gallifet to stop the advance of the Federationists had been destroyed almost to a man. Of the two fleets of war-balloons there remained twenty-two aerostats in the hands of the Terrorists, while the twenty-five sent by the Tsar against the air-ships had retired at nightfall to the depôt at Muswell Hill to replenish their stock of fuel and explosives. Their ammunition-tenders, slow and unwieldy machines adapted only for carrying large cargoes of shells, had been rammed and destroyed with ease by the air-ships during the running, or rather flying, fight of the previous afternoon,

At sunset on the 6th the whole available forces of the League which could be spared from the defence of the positions, numbering more than three million men, had descended to the assault on London at nearly fifty different points.

No human words could convey any adequate conception of that night of carnage and terror. The assailants were allowed to advance far into the mighty maze of streets and bye-ways with so little resistance that they began to think that the great city would fall an easy prey to them after all. But as they approached the main arteries of central London they came suddenly upon barricades so skilfully disposed that it was impossible to advance without storming them, and from which, as they approached them, burst out tempests of rifle and machine-gun fire, under which the heads of columns melted away faster than they advanced.

Light quick-firing guns, posted on the roofs of lofty buildings, rained death and mutilation upon them. The air-ships, flying hither and thither a few hundred feet above the house-tops, like spirits of destruction, sent their shells into the crowded masses and wrought the most awful havoc of all with their frightful explosives, blowing hundreds of men to indistinguishable fragments at every shot, while from the windows of every house that was not in ruins came a ceaseless hail of missiles from every kind of fire-arm, from a magazine rifle to a shot-gun.

When morning came the Great Eastern Railway and the Thames had been cleared and opened, and the hearts of the starving citizens were gladdened by the welcome spectacle of train after train pouring in laden with provisions from Harwich, and of a fleet of steamers flying the Federation flag, which filled the Thames below London Bridge, and was rapidly discharging its cargoes of food at the wharves and into lighters.

As fast as the food could be unloaded it was distributed, first to the troops manning the barricades, and then to the markets and shops, whence it was supplied free in the poorer districts and at the usual price in the richer ones. All that day London feasted and made merry, for now the Thames was open there seemed to be no end to the food that was being poured into the City, which twelve hours before had eaten its last scanty provisions. As soon as one vessel was discharged another took its place, and opened its hold filled with the necessaries and some of the luxuries of life.

The frightful butcheries at the barricades had stopped for the time being from sheer exhaustion on both sides. One cannot fight without food, and the defenders were half-starved when they began. Rage and the longing for revenge had lent them strength for the moment, but twelve hours of incessant street fighting, the most wearing of all forms of battle, had exhausted them, and they were heartily glad of the tacit truce which gave them time to eat and drink.

As for the assailants, as soon as they saw conclusive proof that the blockade had been broken and the City victualled, they found themselves deserted by the ally on whose aid they had most counted. While the grip of famine remained on London they knew that its fall was only a matter of time; but now—if food could get in so could reinforcements, and they had not the remotest idea as to the number of the mysterious forces which had so suddenly sprung into existence outside their own lines.

Added to this their losses during the night had been something appalling. The streets were choked with their dead, and the houses into which they had retired were filled with their wounded. So they, too, were glad of a rest, and many spoke openly of returning to their lines and abandoning the assault. If they did so it might be possible to fight their way to the coast and escape out of this huge death-trap into which they had fallen on the very eve of their confidently-anticipated victory.

So, during the whole of the 7th there was little or no hard fighting in London, but to the north and south the grey legions of the Federation fought their way mile by mile over the field of Armageddon, gradually driving in the two halves of the Russian and the Franco-Italian armies which had been faced about to oppose their progress while the other halves were making their assault on London.

As soon as news reached the Tsar that the blockade of the river had been broken he had ordered twelve of his remaining war-balloons to destroy the ships that were swarming below London Bridge. Their fuel and cargoes of explosives had been renewed, and they rose into the air to execute the Autocrat's command just as Natasha had taken leave of Arnold on her errand of mercy. He fathomed their design at once, and instantly changed the course of the Ithuriel to the north-eastward. As soon as he had got within easy range he said to his lieutenant, who had just come on deck:

"Mr. Marston, those fellows mean mischief. Put a three-minute time fuze on a couple of No. 3 fire-shells and load the bow guns."

The order was at once executed. He trained one of the guns himself, giving it an elevation sufficient to throw the shell over the rising balloons. As the sixtieth second of the first minute passed he released the projectile. It soared away through the air and burst with a terrific explosion about fifty feet over the ascending aerostats.

The rain of fire spread out far and wide and showered down upon the gas-holders. Then came a concussion that shook the air like a thunderclap as the escaping gas mixed with the air, took fire, and exploded. Seven of the twelve aerostats instantly collapsed and plunged back again to the earth, spending the collective force of their explosives on the slopes of Muswell Hill. Meanwhile the second gun had been loaded and fired with the same effect on the remaining five.

Arnold then ran the Ithuriel up to within a mile of Muswell Hill, and found the remaining thirteen war-balloons in the act of making off to the northward.

"Two more time-shells, quick!" he cried "They are off to take part in the battle to the north, and must be stopped at once. Look lively or they'll see us and rise out of range!"

Almost before the words were out of his mouth one of the guns was ready. A moment later the messager of destruction was speeding on its way, and they saw it explode fairly in the midst of the squadron. The second followed before the glare of the first explosion had passed, and this was the last shot fired in the aerial warfare between the air-ships and the war-balloons.

The effect of these two shots was most extraordinary. The accurately-timed shells burst, not over, but amidst the aerostats, enveloping their cars in a momentary mist of fire. The intense heat evolved must have suffocated their crews instantaneously. Even if it had not done so their fate would have been scarcely less sudden or terrible, for the fire falling in the cars exploded their own shells even before it burst their gas-envelopes. With a roar and a shock as though heaven and earth were coming together a vast dazzling mass of flame blazed out, darkening the daylight by contrast, and when it vanished again there was not a fragment of the thirteen aerostats to be seen.

"So ends the Tsar's brief Empire of the air!" said Arnold, as the smoke of the explosion drifted away. "And twenty-four hours more should see the end of his earthly Empire as well."

"I hope so," said Natasha's voice at his elbow. "This awful destruction is sickening me. I knew war was horrible, but this is more like the work of fiends than of men. There is something monstrous, something superhumanly impious, in blasting your fellow-creatures with irresistible lightnings like this, as though you were a god instead of a man. Will you not be glad when it is over, Richard?"

"Glad beyond all expression," replied her lover, the angry light of battle instantly dying out of his eyes as he looked upon her sweetly pitiful face and melting eyes. "But tell me, what success has my angel of mercy had in pleading for the lives of her enemies?" he continued, slipping his arm through hers and leading her aft.

"I don't know yet, but my father told me to ask you to go to him as soon as you could leave the deck. Go now, and Richard, remember what I said to you when you offered me the empire of the world as we were going to Aeria. No one has such influence with the Master as you have, for you have given him the victory and delivered his enemies into his hands. For my sake, and for Humanity's, let your voice be for mercy and peace—surely we have shed blood enough now!"

"It shall, angel mine! for your sweet sake I would spare even Alexander Romanoff himself and all his staff!"

"You will never be asked to do that," said Natasha quietly, as Arnold disappeared down the companion-way.

It was nearly an hour before he came on deck again, and by this time the Ithuriel, constantly moving to and fro over London, so that any change in the course of events could be at once reported to Natas, had shifted her position to the southward, and was hanging in the air over Sydenham Hill, the head-quarters of General le Gallifet, whence could be plainly heard the roar of the tide of battle as it rolled ever northward over the hills of Surrey.

An air-ship came speeding up from the southward as he reached the deck. He signalled to it to come alongside. It proved to be the Mercury taking a message from Tremayne, who was personally commanding the Army of the South in the Ariel, to the air-ships operating with the Army of the North.

"What is the message?" asked Arnold.

"To engage and destroy the remaining Russian war-balloons, and then come South at once," replied the captain of the Mercury. "I am sorry to say both the Lucifer and the Azrael have been disabled by chance shots striking their propellers. The Lucifer was so badly injured that she fell to the earth, and blew up with a perfectly awful explosion; but the Azrael can still use her fan-wheels and stern propeller, though her air-planes are badly broken and twisted."

Arnold frowned at the bad news, but took no further notice of it beyond saying:

"That is unfortunate, but, I suppose some casualties were inevitable under the circumstances." Then he added; "I have already destroyed all that were left of the Tsar's war-balloons, but you can take the other part of the message. Where is the Ariel to be found?"

The captain of the Mercury gave him the necessary directions, and the two air-ships parted. Within an hour a council of war, consisting of Natas, Arnold, and Tremayne, was being held in the saloon of the Ithuriel, on the issue of which the lives of nearly two millions of men depended.

CHAPTER LXVII.

VICTORY.

IT was a little after three o'clock in the afternoon when Natas, Tremayne, and Arnold ended their deliberations in the saloon of the Ithuriel. At the same hour a council of war was being held by Generals le Gallifet and Cosensz at the Crystal Palace Hotel, Sydenham, where the two commanders had taken up their head quarters.

Since daybreak matters had assumed a very serious, if not desperate aspect for the troops of the League to the south of London. Communication had entirely ceased with the Tsar since the night before, and this could only mean that his Majesty had lost the command of the air, through the destruction or disablement of his fleet of aerostats. News from the force which had descended upon London told only of a fearful expenditure of life that had not purchased the slightest advantage.

The blockade had been broken on the east, and, therefore, all hope of reducing the city by famine was at an end. Their own war-balloons had been either captured or destroyed, thousands of their men had deserted to the enemy, and multitudes more had been slain. Every position was dominated by the captured aerostats and the air-ships of the Terrorists. Even the building in which the Council was being held might be shattered to fragments at any moment by a discharge of their irresistible artillery.

Finally, it was practically certain that within the next few hours their head-quarters must be surrounded, and then their only choice would lie between unconditional surrender and swift and inevitable destruction by an aerial bombardment. Manifestly the time had come to make terms if possible, and purchase their own safety and that of their remaining troops.

Both the generals and every member of their respective staffs saw clearly that victory was now a physical impossibility, and so the immediate issue of the council was that orders were given to hoist the white flag over the tricolour and the Italian standard on the summits of the two towers of the Crystal Palace, and on the flagstaffs over the head-quarters.

These were at once seen by a squadron of air-ships coming from the north in obedience to Tremayne's summons, and within half-an-hour the same squadron was seen returning from the south headed by the flag-ship, also flying, to the satisfaction of the two generals, the signal of truce. The air-ships stopped over Sydenham and ranged themselves in a circle with their guns pointing down upon the head-quarters, and the Ariel, with Tremayne on board, descended to within twenty feet of the ground in front of the hotel.

As she did so an officer wearing the uniform of a French General of Division came forward, saluted, and said that he had a message from the Commander-in-chief of the Federation forces. Tremayne returned the salute and said briefly:

"I am here. What is the message?"

"I am commissioned by General le Gallifet, Commander-in-Chief of the Southern Division, to request on his behalf the honour of an audience. He awaits you with General Cosensz in the hotel," replied the Frenchman, gazing in undisguised admiration at the wonderful craft which he now for the first time saw at close quarters.

"With pleasure. I will be with you in a moment," said Tremayne, and as he spoke, the Ariel settled gently down to the earth, and the gangway steps dropped from her side.

As he entered the room in which the two generals were awaiting him, surrounded by their brilliantly-uniformed staffs, he presented a strange contrast to the men whose lives he held in the hollow of his hand. He was dressed in a dark tweed suit, with Norfolk jacket and knickerbockers, met by long shooting boots, just as though he was fresh from the moors, instead of from the battlefield on which the fate of the world was being decided. General le Gallifet advanced to meet him with a puzzled look of half-recognition on his face, which was at once banished by Tremayne holding out his hand without the slightest ceremony, and saying:

"Ah, I see you recognise me, General!"

"I do, my Lord Alanmere, and, you will permit me to add, with the most profound astonishment," replied the General, taking the proffered hand with a hearty grasp. "May I venture to hope that with an old acquaintance our negotiations may prove all the easier?"

Tremayne bowed and said:

"Rest assured, General, that they shall be as easy as my instructions will permit me to make them."

"Your instructions! But I thought——"

"That I was in supreme command. So I am in a sense, but I am the lieutenant of Natas for all that, and in a case like this his word is law. But come, what terms do you propose?"

"That truce shall be proclaimed for twenty-four hours; that the commanders of the forces of the League shall meet this mysterious Natas, yourself, and the King of England, and arrange terms by which the armies of France, Russia, and Italy shall be permitted to evacuate the country with the honours of war."

"Then, General, I may as well tell you at once that those terms are impossible," replied the Chief of the Federation quietly, but with a note of inflexible determination in his voice. "In the first place, 'the honours of war' is a phrase which already belongs to the past. We see no honour in war, and if we can have our way this shall be the last war that shall ever be waged on earth.

"Indeed, I may tell you that we began this war as one of absolute extermination. Had it not been for the intercession of Natasha, the daughter of Natas, you would not even have been given the opportunity of making terms of peace, or even of unconditional surrender. Our orders were simply to slay and spare not, as long as a man remained in arms on British soil. You are, of course, aware that we have taken no prisoners——"

"But, my lord, this is not war, it is murder on the most colossal scale!" exclaimed the General, utterly unable to control the agitation that these terrible words evoked, not only in his own breast, but in that of every man who heard them.

"To us war and murder are synonymous terms, differing only as wholesale and retail," replied Tremayne drily; "for the mere names we care nothing. This world war is none of our seeking, but if war can be cured by nothing but war, then we will wage it to the point of extermination. Now here are my terms. All the troops of the League on this side of the River Thames, on laying down their arms, shall be permitted to return to their homes, not as soldiers, but as peaceful citizens of the world, to go about their natural business as men who have sworn never to draw the sword again save in defence of their own homes."

"And his Majesty the Tsar?"

"You cannot make terms for the Tsar, General, and let me beg of you not to attempt to do so. No power under heaven can save him and his advisers from the fate that awaits them."

"And if we refuse your terms, the alternative is what?"

"Annhilation to the last man!"

A dead silence followed these fearful words so calmly and yet so inflexibly spoken. General le Gallifet and the Italian Commander-in-Chief looked at one another and at the officers standing about them. A murmur of horror and indignation passed from lip to lip. Then Tremayne spoke again quickly, but impressively:

"Gentlemen, don't think that I am saying what I cannot do. We are inflexibly determined to stamp the curse of war out here and now, if it costs millions of lives to do so. Your forces are surrounded, your aerostats are captured or destroyed. It is no use mincing matters at a moment like this. It is life or death with you. If you do not believe me, General le Gallifet, come with me and take a flight round London in my air-ship yonder, and your own eyes shall see how hopeless all further struggle is. I pledge my word of honour as an English gentleman that you shall return in safety. Will you come?"

"I will," said the French commander. "Gentlemen, you will await my return," and with a bow to his companions, he followed the Chief out of the room and embarked on the air-ship without further ado.

The Ariel at once rose into the air. Tremayne reported to Natas what had been done, and then took the General into the deck saloon and gave orders to proceed at full speed to Richmond, which was reached in what seemed to the Frenchman an inconceivably short space of time. Then the Ariel swung round to the eastward, and at half speed traversed the whole line of battle over hill and vale, at an elevation of eight hundred feet, from Richmond to Shooter's Hill.

What General le Gallifet saw more than convinced him that Tremayne had spoken without exaggeration when he said that annihilation was the only alternative to surrender on his terms.

The grey legions of the Federation seemed innumerable. Their long lines lapped round the broken squadrons of the League, mowing them down with incessant hailstorms of magazine fire, and overhead the air-ships and aerostats were hurling shells on them which made great dark gaps in their formations wherever they attempted anything like order. Every position of importance was either occupied or surrounded by the Federationists. There was no way open save towards London, and that way, as the General knew only too well, lay destruction.

To the east of Shooter's Hill the air-ship swerved round to the northward. The Thames was alive with steamers flying the red flag, and carrying food and men into London. To the north of the river the battle had completely ceased as far as Muswell Hill.

There the Black Eagle of Russia still floated from the roof of the Palace, and a furious battle was raging round the slopes of the hill. But the Russians were already surrounded, and manifestly outnumbered five to one, while six aerostats were circling to and fro, doing their work of death upon them with fearful effectiveness.

"You see, General, that the aerostats do not destroy the Palace and bury the Tsar in its ruins, nor do I stop and do the same, as I could do in a few minutes. Do you understand now why you could not make terms for Russia?"

"What your designs are Heaven and yourselves only know," replied the General with quivering lips. "But I see that all is hopelessly lost. For God's sake let this carnage stop! It is not war, it is butchery, and we have deserved this retribution for employing those infernal contrivances in the first place. I always said it was not fair fighting. It is murder to drop death on defenceless men from the clouds. We will accept your terms. Let us get back to the south and save the lives of what remain of our brave fellows. If this is scientific warfare, I for one, will fight no more!"

"Well spoken, General!" said Tremayne, laying his hand upon his shoulder. "Those words of yours have saved two millions of human lives, and by this time to-morrow war will have ceased, I hope for ever, among the nations of the west."

The Ariel now swerved southward again, crossed London at full speed, and within half-an-hour General le Gallifet was once more standing in front of the Crystal Palace Hotel.

As it was now getting dusk the search-lights of the air-ships were turned on, and they swept along the southern line of battle flashing the signal, "Victory! Cease firing!" to the triumphant hosts of the Federation, while at the same time the French and Italian commanders set the field telegraph to work and despatched messengers into London with the news of the terms of peace. By nightfall all fighting south of the Thames had ceased, and victors and vanquished were fraternising as though they had never struck a blow at each other, for war is a matter of diplomacy and Court intrigue, and not of personal animosity. The peoples of the world would be good enough friends if their rulers and politicians would let them.

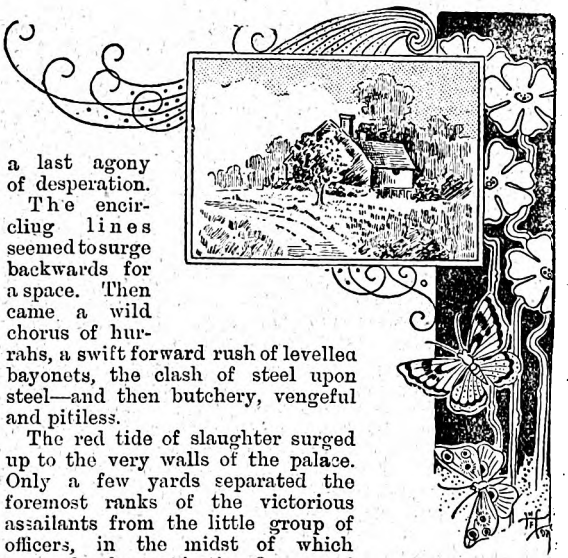
Meanwhile the battle raged with unabated fury round the head-quarters of the Tsar. Here despotism was making its last stand, and making it bravely, in spite of the tremendous odds against it. But as twilight deepened into night the numbers of the assailants of the last of the Russian positions seemed to multiply miraculously.

A never ceasing flood of grey-clad soldiery surged up from the south, overflowed the barricades to the north, and swept the last of the Russians out of the streets like so much chaff. All the hundred streams converged upon Muswell Hill, and joined the ranks of the attacking force, and so the night fell upon the last struggle of the world-war. Even the Tsar himself saw that the gigantic game was virtually over, and that the stake of world-empire had been played for—and lost.

A powerful field search-light had been fixed on the roof of the palace, and, as it flashed hither and thither round the area of the battle, he saw fresh hosts of the British and Federation soldiers pouring in upon the scene of action, while his own men were being mown down by thousands under the concentrated fire of millions of rifles, and his regiments torn to fragments by the incessant storm of explosives from the sky.

Hour after hour the savage fight went on, and the grey and red lines fought their way up and up the slopes, drawing the ring of flame and steel closer and closer round the summit of the hill on which the Autocrat of the North stood waiting for the hour of his fate to strike.

The last line of the defenders of the position was reached at length. For an hour it held firm in spite of the fearful odds. Then it wavered and bent, and swayed to and fro in a last agony of desperation.



The encircling lines seemed to surge backwards for a space. Then came a wild chorus of hurrahs, a swift forward rush of levelled bayonets, the clash of steel upon steel—and then butchery, vengeful and pitiless.

The red tide of slaughter surged up to the very walls of the palace. Only a few yards separated the foremost ranks of the victorious assailants from the little group of officers, in the midst of which towered the majestic figure of the White Tsar—an Emperor without an empire, a leader without an army. He strode forward towards the line of bayonets fringeing the crest of the hill, drew his sword, snapped the blade as a man would snap a dry stick, and threw the two pieces to the ground, saying in English as he did so:

Influenza's After-effects.

The greatest danger of Influenza is its after effects. The system gets run down, the blood impoverished, and the whole tone lowered. It is now more than ever that a liberal use of Bovril should be resorted to. Bovril will speedily restore vitality, refortify the constitution, and effectually ward off threatening complications.

"It is enough, I surrender!"

Then he turned on his heel, and with bowed head walked back again to his staff.

Almost at the same moment a blaze of white light appeared in the sky a hundred feet above the heads of the vast throng that encircled the palace. Millions of eyes were turned up at once, and beheld a vision which no one who saw it forgot to the day of his death.

The ten air-ships of the Terrorist fleet were ranged in two curves on either side of the Ithuriel, which floated about twenty feet below them, her silvery hull bathed in a flood of light from their electric lamps. In her bow, robed in glistening white fur, stood Natasha, transfigured in the full blaze of the concentrated search-lights. A silence of wonder and expectation fell upon the millions at her feet, and in the midst of it she began to sing the Hymn of Freedom. It was like the voice of an angel singing in the night of peace after strife.

Men of every nation in Europe listened to her, entranced, as she changed from language to language, and when at last the triumphant strains of the old eighteenth century Song of the Revolution, came floating down from her lips through the still night air, an irresistible impulse ran through the listening millions, and with one accord they took up the refrain in all the languages of Europe, and a mighty flood of exultant song rolled up in wave after wave from earth to heaven, a song at once of victory and thanksgiving, for the last battle of the world war had been lost and won, and there was peace on earth at last.

"Doctor, my wife has insomnia—lies awake most of the night. What shall I do for her?"

"Get home earlier."

Husband: "Woo! Hoo! Great snakes! Why do you set that alarm clock so that it will go off like that?"

Wife: "That is to remind me it's time to wind it up, my dear."

"Of course, Nora, you know that marriage is a very serious thing," said Mrs. Forthingham to her cook, who had told her that she was about to set up housekeeping for herself.

"Yes'm, I know that," replied Nora; "but it isn't half so serious as being single."

Two sisters visiting in Ireland got into conversation with a tenant of their hostess. One of the girls, who is quite stout, asked the old Irish woman if she would have known them for sisters.

"Well," was the answer, with a smile that would have put the blarneystone itself to the blush, "ye look alike; but yer sister's slender, while you, miss—well you favour the Quane."

Courteous Shop Walker: "What can we have the pleasure of showing madam to-day?"

Prospective Customer: "I want something neat but showy, attractive yet modest, of the newest design and yet apparently inexpensive, something which will accentuate my grief and yet not make me look ugly. Do you think you understand?"

C. S. W.: "Perfectly, madam. The Breach of Promise Hat Department is upstairs on the first floor."

A VILLAGE INDUSTRY.

About three miles from Cambridge is a valuable object lesson to the nation as to how the people may be kept on the land, and be thereby prevented from crowding into already over-populated cities. Twenty-four or twenty-five years ago a farmer turned his attention earnestly to fruit-farming, and made it pay from the outset. A few acres sufficed at first; to-day some thousands of acres are under fruit culture in the little old-world village of Histon and the adjacent district. What was the secret of his great success? It lay mainly in the foresight, skill, energy, and hard work in adapting means to an end.

A market was found for the fruit by the erection of a model factory, remarkable for its equipment, daintiness, and up-to-date methods. The fresh fruit is made into Jam in silver-lined pans the same day it is picked, with all the luscious taste of the fruit preserved intact by the addition of sugar. Ripe fruit juices are also employed to impart a delicious and delicate flavour to Chivers' Gold Medal Table Jellies, which is one reason for their great superiority. We have said that the success of this village industry is owing in great measure to the cleanliness and purity of the methods employed in the factory. An Alderman and J.P. writes to the firm: "Doubtless the daily "freshly gathered fruit has given your "firm the high position it enjoys com-"pared with town factories." An M.P. said in a speech in 1894. "I never had "better Strawberry Jam. I am quite "certain that so long as such excellence "is maintained the prosperity of the "firm will continue."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. S. Chivers & Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

The Brain Gymnasium.

On this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set will be comparatively easy of solution, while others will be designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the sender of the greatest number of correct solutions, and to the senders of the ten next highest number of correct ones will be presented either one of our silver-plated pencil cases or a copy of a popular six-shilling novel. Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, February 12th, 1900.

An Enigma.

While I, 6, 7, 8, my miserable dinner, 6, 7, the old hotel, I saw a 5, 6, 7, run over the floor, and presently a man came in and showed us a box which he said contained an 1, 2, 3. He wanted to let it out, but we were afraid to have it done. When I went to the landlord to pay my bill, I found the old 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, had charged me enormous 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and I refused to pay the full amount. He became quite 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and, though I could not understand a word he said, he hissed me out. So I came away and left him practising his 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. What were they?

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

'Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife foun the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2llb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if the had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.".

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. McLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

Mrs E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver nr Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

A Peep into the Stomach.

About sixty years ago, Dr. Beaumont, of the United States army, happened to come across a young Canadian boatman named Alexis St. Martin. In a skirmish in which the Doctor's regiment was engaged, this St. Martin received a gunshot wound in the lower part of the Chest wall, which healed up, leaving an opening that led directly into the Stomach.

Dr. Beaumont seized the opportunity which had so curiously come his way. He engaged St. Martin as his servant, and the young man allowed all sorts of experiments to be performed upon his digestive Organs. Different articles of food were eaten by St. Martin, and the action of the Gastric Juice upon them in the Stomach was carefully watched.

The results of these experiments, showing the relative digestibility of various articles of Food, are given in a Tabulated Statement in our book entitled "What to Eat and What to Avoid." As a result of more recent investigation by artificial means, the period is also shown which these same articles take to digest, if after each meal a dose of Guy's Tonic be taken. We shall be pleased to send a copy of this Booklet, post free, to any reader of "Short Stories" who applies for it to Guy's Tonic Company, 12 Buckingham Palace Road, London, S.W.

As a Remedy for Digestive Disturbance, depressing pains, and oppression after eating, and for preventing Food becoming like a Weight at the pit of the Stomach, Guy's Tonic is Invaluable. People who take it after meals Digest their Food thoroughly and completely, so that the Body is far better Nourished in every way, and there is an entire absence of those unpleasant Symptoms which make Food and eating a bugbear to so many.

"Immediate Benefit is Derived."

Mr. Bayle St. John, Journalist, of Church Road, Teddington, S.W., writes:—

"I firmly believe Guy's Tonic is the only genuine "Remedy known for Indigestion and kindred Ailments. "Immediate benefit is derived by taking this Valuable "Preparation. I myself know of several cases of "Indigestion, with its troublesome companions, Flatu-"lence, Loss of Appetite, Nausea, Headache, and "Nervousness, where Guy's Tonic has proved a successful "cure after everything else had failed."

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

D. JAMIESON, TOWER CHAMBERS, LIVERPOOL.

A WOMAN'S LOVE.

HE watched her as she moved about among her guests, a gracious figure, full of dignity and ease; charming, whether she stood a moment idly playing with her great fan, letting her meditative eyes wander about the room, or moved from group to group with just the right word, the sympathetic glance, or ready smile for each. He had watched her hundreds of times before, finding her lovelier every time.

She wore a gown of black lace, and at her breast there was a little knot of Parma violets—a deep, fragrant cluster. Durant had walked four miles that afternoon, and had paid an absurdly exorbitant price for the satisfaction of seeing them there. Well, he had it. He even fancied he detected her in a half-stolen, fleeting caress. Certainly more than once she had bent her face tenderly to their fragrance while she stood apart.

Durant had drawn a little aside into the half-seclusion of the deep window, the better to watch her undisturbed. On the little table beside him lay her books, a dainty basket of confections, a glove, and other trifles. His hand stole wistfully from one to another, and he pleased himself with the fancied contact of her fingers.

"Looking at that Holbein?" said a gruff voice at his elbow. "You well may! Stupid subject, and a wretched light, but fine! Ah, we can't better that much. Those old masters! It's the fashion to turn up your noses nowadays, but the root of the matter was in them."

All rights reserved.]

Durant turned with a start. He knew before he turned who his interlocutor was, the man who of all in his profession he most revered, the great artist Hood.

There had been years when Durant would have esteemed it glorious good fortune to exchange a word with the master. To-night, so absorbed was he in his own feverish fancies and desires that he almost resented the interruption.

"The Holbein?" he said. "Oh, yes! I've seen it before. Very fine indeed, I believe," mechanically.

The old painter cast a curious glance from under his shaggy brows at the young man.

"And you," said he abruptly, "what have you been doing? We saw the 'Sappho'"—alluding to a picture which had made a sensation at the Melbourne Exhibition, and had carried its unknown young painter into an enviable popularity and recognition at a bound—"we saw the 'Sappho,' what comes after?"

Durant's brow grew slightly ruffled.

"A—not much, as yet," he reluctantly confessed. He added rather forcedly: "I have some things begun. I have not been in a working mood lately. By and by——"

He was uncomfortably conscious of the piercing glance of those far-seeing eyes, and drew himself up a trifle stiffly in resentment.

"I hope so," said Hood. "Success, young man, should be a spur, not a curb," as he moved away.

It was not unkindly said, but it stung Durant unreasonably. He watched moodily the fine, erect figure of the old man, for whom everyone made way, and then his gaze turned again with a passionate determination to the woman he loved.

Guests were making their adieux, and she stood giving her hand to one and then another with a courteous grace.

"Going?" said a voice behind her, "and what of the Holbein? Great, of course. Ah, when will our young artists do work like that?"

"Never," answered the voice of Hood, bitterly; "never—as things are! They waste their youth; they have no conscience for their art. I despair!"

"You are in a blue mood to-night," was the laughing response. "But the Holbein—the Holbein——"

"I know nothing of your Holbein," answered the master gruffly.

Digitized by Google

"But you went to see it?" persisted the other.

"And saw instead what spoiled my temper. Look there, Anthony. You see that young man dreaming beneath the Holbein?"

"Whom? Durant?"

"Yes, Durant—the painter of the 'Sappho,' a picture full of faults, I grant you, but a masterpiece. What colour! What feeling! A picture on which to build the structure of a noble fame. That man has promise—genius!"

"H'm! ah!—no doubt you are right. Everyone speaks of him. But what has he done of late?"

"Done!" answered the old artist angrily; "he has done nothing—absolutely nothing—since the 'Sappho!' What is worse, he never will do anything."

"But, my dear sir," expostulatingly.

The two men turned to meet the composed smile of their young hostess.

"Sir," interrupted Hood severely, "I have spoken to him. He has neither ambition, hope, nor strength. I spoke three words to him, and measured him. Clever, he may be—it is a clever age—nothing more. His future is already past. He has committed the fatal sin for the artist—he has set something, no matter what, between him and his art. Clever he may be, will be, doubtless—great never."

There was a little, sharp, clicking sound behind him.

"Oh, my dear Miss Heatherton, your lovely fan!" exclaimed a regretful voice. "How did you do it?"

The two men turned to meet the composed smile of their young hostess, who held in her hand the shattered sticks of her great fan.

"It was absurdly fragile," she said serenely, laying it aside, and holding out her hand to the artist. "You are leaving us already?"

"Alas! yes," Hood replied, bowing with old-world courtesy. "Late hours and old age are ill friends. Make my adieux to your uncle, and tell him he has a treasure in his Holbein."

She let her hand lie in his a moment. He thought she looked a little weary. "Good-night," she said, "and—thank you!"

They were all gone at last; yet the young hostess stood before the fire in the outer room alone and absorbed in thought. Mechanically she bent her head above the violets, which lay drooping in her bosom, and, as if this action had decided her, she lifted her head and moved towards the inner room.

As the heavy portière fell behind her, Durant's longing, eager eyes met hers, and, without a word, he drew her silently into his arms and held her so, against his heart, a long, silent moment.

"Darling!" broke like a sob from his lips; and still she forbade him nothing, but let him hold her, clasp her, kiss her as he would; only her lips and eyelids trembled.

"Sweetheart," he murmured, exultingly, between his kisses, "you do love me—you do"

A sigh that was almost a sob answered him. With a sudden movement she freed herself and, turning from him, threw herself into a chair.

"Now," thought Durant, "what is it?"

After a moment's perplexity he went behind her and put his hands on either side of her head with a gentle touch

"I will kiss away her mood," he thought, smiling; and bending above her he upturned slowly to his own a face of ice and marble.

"Esmond," she said; and there was an expression in her eyes which made his hands fall silently, "Esmond, why did you not tell me of Herdsman's offer?"

A little wave of vexation crossed the young man's face, and he coloured, but answered carelessly:

"I dare say I should have—but why should I, after all? It was of no moment."

She gave him a swift glance, and then made a little gesture of invitation with her hand.

"Come and sit down. I want to talk with you."

He took a cushion, tossed it at her feet, and threw himself thereon.

She looked at him uneasily.

"Had you not better sit on the sofa or in a chair?"

He shook his head and possessed himself of her hand. "I prefer this."

"Very well. You will guess, Esmond, that I want to talk about you and your work."

She paused.

"Well," he said indifferently, seemingly more absorbed in the hand upon whose every finger he was pressing kisses.

Digitized by Google

Again she looked at him—a look of uncontrollable distress, which he did not see.

"We have spoken of it," she said gently, after the fleeting glance, "a thousand times, all the winter long, without result; but now there is a reason why we should decide at once, and, Esmond—we—must!"

He lifted up his head and looked at her.

Under that gaze she grew very white.

"You mean——"

"I mean that if you are ever to do anything, ever to fulfil your promise, you must go to Europe to study, live, work among artists and all that your art needs—and you will never find a second opportunity like this."

"Like what?"

"Like this which Mr. Herdsman offers you. To go with him, under the prestige of his name—it is to have the entrée at once of the art circles of all Europe; to go under the best conditions, in the pleasantest companionship, and at a time when you most need it. Is it true he sails on Friday?"

"Yes," answered Durant coldly.

"So much the better. It will be easier to go quickly, and you—you should be at work. You waste your strength here. There is every—every reason why you should go. Esmond, you ought, you must!"

She put her free hand on his entreatingly.

He shook it off.

"For Heaven's sake, Marguerite," he said, "speak plainly. Don't torture us both unnecessarily. I don't know what iron resolve to make us both miserable you have taken now, but I tell you frankly I have borne all I can. You know what I have endured already, and—I am flesh and blood! You say you want me to go abroad; well and good. Do you mean you want me to go without you? After all that has passed—all these months of waiting and suspense—is that your meaning?"

"Yes," she said, "I mean it. Wait; let me finish now. We have argued, and discussed, and waited until we have no longer any judgment left, and we are both—both nervous and worn out. You have been in a perfect fever for months past. It is of no use; the thing must end."

"You forget to say," he put in bitterly, "what has been the cause—the sole cause—of all these wretched months—this fever! If you would have simply consented to marry me, Marguerite——"

He broke off with a sudden passionate change, throwing himself upon his knees beside her.

"Consent now—only say you will marry me and we will start for Europe next week! I will show you. Work!—you shall see what I can do with your love to stimulate me. You say I waste my time—that I have done nothing all the winter. I know it, I know it; but I can do nothing while I live under this killing tension! I am like a man half-mad, benumbed, under a spell. With you—I would live. I have power—I know it; power and genius. With you, how I would work! And as for happiness—oh! darling, darling, let us make an end of all this torture. You do love me—only say you will go with me, bravely, nobly!"

His voice shook. He trembled like a leaf.

"Impossible!" The faint, chilling word fell from her lips. He simply would not heed it.

"It is not impossible! It is easy, wise, sensible!" he declared. "We are free; we love each other; that alone would make all easy. We have little money—what of it? We could live on almost nothing in Paris for a little, while I painted and made myself famous.

You should want for nothing. I would work night and day—for you—and think it happiness. It is in me to be great, with you I could—I would be. Only believe—only try."

"Yes," she said, "I know—and the picture is—is tempting; but it is not fairly drawn, Esmond. In the first place, I am not wholly free; my uncle has a claim on me, which I cannot, ought not wholly to disregard. And we—you and I—have next to nothing. You would be burdened at the outset with the care of providing bread and butter. All your strength and energy would go to meet daily demands, instead of being devoted singly to your art. Alone you can face privations, and never feel them, which would be a galling weight and chain if I were there. Esmond, I will never marry a man on these terms."

"Will you tell me," he said, checking himself, bitterly, "precisely what you would like to have me do?"

"Yes," she said, "I will tell you—and you will hate me for it! I would have you go away, to study, to work, for months, a year, two years, until you have laid the foundations of a name and fortune; and because I know your temperament and—and weakness I wish you to go utterly free, bound by no tie, even a tacit one. I wish to be to you a friend—the best of friends—a help, not a hindrance. I should like"—she gave him a swift look—"I should like you to write to me often, constantly, freely, of all your work, plans, hopes—provided," she added, with slow, distinct emphasis, "they are the letters of a friend to a friend. There must be no love-letters; nothing but unrest and wretchedness will come of your keeping yourself in a fever that way. I would rather give up all, not hear from you. You think me very hard, but what do I ask? Only that you should give your service first where it is first due. Yes, no woman's love on earth should supersede your art. And for the rest,"—she smiled a little sadly—"a knight of old thought it no hardship to serve his lady with years of waiting and knightly deeds. I don't think he reproached her for expecting him to prove his title to her favour. It is so utterly unreasonable for us to demand something more than a man's unsupported assurance that he loves us?"

"Oh, you are fortified in reasons. You have all the wisdom on your side," he said bitterly. "I have only love on mine. So then," he said, "this is what it comes to. As I stand you will have none of me. Laying fame and riches at your feet, you may—relent!"

"If you choose to put it so—yes."

"I see; 'unto him that hath shall be given; from him who hath not, even——'".

He caught his breath sharply.

"So this is woman's love?"

"Yes," she answered, "this is woman's love."

"I have read," he said bitterly, "of women who lived otherwise; of women whose delight it was to go step by step beside the men they loved. There have been those who have given themselves freely to serve a man's genius; who have been his critics, helpers, models even."

"Yes," she said, "I have heard of such women. History does not record their end."

"At all events they loved—and lived—and were not ashamed nor afraid of it, unlike the women upon whom men waste their hearts and souls to-day. Pshaw! of what use to talk? We speak a very different language. There is one thing, though." He came nearer and looked down at her with an icy bitterness. "Has it ever occurred to you," he said, speaking with a cutting coldness—how close akin to fire—"has it ever entered your head, Marguerite, that, when your beautiful, desirable end is reached, and I am rich and famous, and you love me; it may be—too late? —that just possibly you may learn the value of the love you despise, when it is no longer yours?"

"You have all the wisdom on your side," he said bitterly. "I have only love on mine."

He hated himself before the words had passed his lips; he knew they were ignoble, unmanly, base, but he was half-insane with wounded pride and love.

She sat as if turned to ice.

After all it had not hurt her much he thought, after a quick, remorseful glance.

"Yes," she said at last, coldly, "I—I have thought of it. It is one of the reasons why I will have no shadow of a bond between us. You are absolutely free from this moment. I will take my chance."

"And you have dared to think—to make me think—you loved me!" he cried passionately. "Well, I know now at least; and you cannot be more anxious to have me gone now than I shall be to go."

He turned and strode to the door. His hand was on the portière.

"Esmond!"

He stopped, wavered, looked around.

Her yearning face was toward him, and her arms were outstretched.

Anger, bitterness, furious pride fell from him, and without a word he turned to her, knelt beside her, and with a low sob, laid his head upon her knees.

"My poor boy! my poor boy!" She caressed him as a mother does a child; and then, as she bent her lips to the curls of his bowed head, a single low word escaped them.

Durant lifted his head quickly; he caught her hands in his and fastened his eyes upon her with such a relentlessly probing gaze, that her own eyes were fain to fall beneath it.

"Oh," he said despairingly, "if I could understand you! Cold as you are, I do believe you love me better than you know. If you would but have the courage—if you would but let yourself go. Darling! sweetheart!"

He felt her tremble all over; felt her yielding, melting, changing, and he took a swift resolve.

"Don't speak," he cried, springing to his feet and holding both her hands. "Not another word to-night! We are both worn out. Don't even try to think. I will go, and you must rest. To-morrow, when we are both quieter, we will talk this over calmly, and decide. Don't tremble so! I will abide by your decision. I swear I will, even though it kills me—but not to-night. There," he added, tenderly; "say good night and I will go; you are so tired."

She pulled herself together. "Yes," she said, wearily, "that will be best. Good night."

She sat as he had left her, her head resting listlessly on her hand, her face half hidden. When at last she raised it it was full of conflicting purposes. Then she walked restlessly up and down the room. She stood beneath the Holbein, and the old painter's words rang cuttingly in her ears.

"He has committed the fatal first sin for an artist—he has set something between himself and his art. His future is already past."

And it was love of her—he had said so—which had snapped this vigorous promise. His love of her! An unutterable sadness filled her heart.

"A greater love would have risen by it," she said to herself—"a greater love, or——"

She stopped; even to herself she would not say,—"a greater nature."

"Only clever, never great." The stinging phrases pursued her. "And yet," she thought to herself, with scorching self-contempt, "for all that, if he comes to-morrow——"

She turned away feverishly, desperately.

"What can I do?" she cried to herself. Then all at once she saw.

* * * * *

"I wonder if he has quite forgiven me," she thought. "It is three years now."

Three years before, Durant, hurrying through his bohemian breakfast at the studio, had been interrupted by a knock at the door. Opening it he found himself confronted by James, the Heatherton's servant, who, with a comprehending friendly grin, held out to Durant a small envelope. With a deadly misgiving Durant seized it, tore it open, and read:

My Dear Esmond,—You surprised me in a moment of weakness last night. Perhaps you might surprise me in another to-day so I have made it impossible. Hate me if you must; forgive me if you can. I have gone away for a little time, not to return until I hear that you have left for Europe with Herdsman or by yourself. Forgive me for withholding my address. A note to Uncle John will always reach me. It will be useless to try to shake my decision this time; even if you did so for a moment I should not abide by it.

Forgive me, Esmond—forgive me.

Faithfully and lovingly,
Marguerite Heatherton.

It was three years since Durant stood in his little studio, a broked-hearted man, in the bitterness of his spirit reviling his art, his fate, the day he first met and loved this fairest, most heartless woman.

And it was three years since he had sailed away with Herdsman for England, bearing with him all his little store of valued treasures, the Sappho, and the sorest heart, he told himself, that ever beat in any human breast.

He had left without any word in answer to her, had vowed he would never write to her again; but the many days and nights upon the calm, infinite seas exercised a potent influence upon his mood.

Day by day he stood by the steamer's side and watched the receding leagues of ocean grow between himself and Marguerite, and his longing, bitterly wounded heart yearned towards her. With every league it was less and less easy to picture her the heartless, cold, ambitious creature he was fain to think her. More and more, love, the infinite forgiver, made excuses for her.

When he reached England, as a matter of course he wrote, pouring out his whole soul in a torrent of tenderness, reproach, entreaty, unavailing regret.

And she replied at once, retracting nothing, conceding nothing; quietly reminding him of what she had said, that there were to be no love-letters, that they were but friends—best friends—all with such a loving gentleness as reduced Durant to despair.

Then he took refuge in proud silence, and for months he sent no word. But she wrote on, long friendly, intimate, most unimpassioned letters, ignoring utterly his silence, always full of his plans and work, her interest in his success, the latest art gossip—letters upon which he dwelt with an intensity he himself never realised. He never dreamed what a mighty part those constant messengers played in his life just then; from what abysses of despondency they kept him.

At last he too sat down and wrote a friendly letter, telling her of his work, his plans, of how agreeably he was surprised in England, how cordial he had found the English artists, etc.

"Not a word in it she can find fault with this time," he said to himself, with a last throb of bitterness, as he folded and sealed it.

Meanwhile he was, in spite of himself, becoming interested: in spite of himself becoming happier in his work. The constant stimulus of artistic surroundings, the society of other artists, the generous appreciation which his first exhibited work met with, the atmosphere of emulation and friendly recognition—all told upon his sensitive and receptive nature. He began to plan more largely and to attack his art more daringly.

His little studio became the centre of a coterie of brother artists, who watched with an enthusiastic and most unenvious delight the development of his genius. Durant throve like a flower in this genial environment, and began to do great things.

"Lilith has brought me quite a meed of fortune," he wrote Marguerite. "She is the sensation of the hour, and has received the honour of a protective railing at the Royal Academy. I wish you could see her, for I am not ashamed of her; but I shall do better yet than 'Lilith.' Fortune follows but slowly. In fact I don't mind owning that I've had some pretty hard rubs to make both ends meet; but things begin to look brighter, too, in this regard. Another success like 'Lilith' and I am made."

"Lilith" and "Lilith's" praises overran the papers. Whole columns were given up to her; her name became a current word on the lips of fashionable and artistic Melbourne, proud of its claim to the young painter. Hood, the great artist, from whose age-enfeebled hand the brush was almost ready to fall, rejoiced in the prospect of a successor in whom the hope and glory of the Young World might centre.

"Glorious!" said he to Marguerite. "Have you heard what Durant is doing? There's a man who will uphold the honour of our young nation everywhere; who will be a glory to us all. And do you know," he added, as though conscience-stricken, "I decried him, foretold his failure! Here in these very rooms I said he would never amount to anything, that he lacked the elements of greatness. I said so!"

"Yes," said Marguerite; "I remember."

"At the same time," declared the master energetically, "it was true then. I never mistake. If he had gone on as he was, he would have failed as I foretold, for he had neither ambition nor energy. Something, something happened at the critical moment. Depend upon it, it was so. Well, whatever it was, it was heaven-sent. Art will be the richer for it."

He looked at Marguerite, and she at him; and all at once—who can tell how?—a great many things which had been puzzling the old man were made clear to him.

And Marguerite stood beneath the Holbein.

"I am so glad, so glad," she thought. "But he will do nobler work than 'Lilith' by and by."

And the friendly letters flew back and forth—long and confidential; but there was not, Marguerite remarked gratefully, even with a little hunger at her heart, there was not a word she could criticise in his. She did full honour to the self-control and the respect he showed to her wishes, at a cost which she had no difficulty in estimating.

In the spring her uncle died, and Marguerite was left alone.

"Come to me, my poor, dear child, at once," wrote her uncle's sister, from England. "My heart aches to think of you alone. You say John has amply provided for you; but what can a young, homeless, unchaperoned heiress do? My house and arms are open to you. Make up your mind to pack up at once and take the next steamer. I am all impatience to see you," etc.

"No," said Marguerite to herself; "I will not go until he asks me. I will wait a little."

Durant wrote at once, kindly, sympathizingly, on receipt of the news. He was still struggling along, already recognised as a rising genius, but hardly reaping the first golden fruits of his success.

"He is proud and ambitious," thought Marguerite. "Will he let my fortune keep us apart?" And the impulse came to go to him, to say: "You have done all I wished; you will be great. Let me help you a little now with my fortune. Let me come to you now." Then she thought again. "No; he is on the brink of fortune already. I exacted so much then. Let him taste the full delight now. Let him come to me as a prince, giving all, receiving only myself. He will be happier so. I must wait."

But month after month went, and it was three years in all, and she held his letter in her hand. It said so much—so much and so little. It told her of his great work, with which he hoped to seal his fame, to win his ultimate crown.

"I want you to see my Madonna," he wrote. "She is orthodox in nothing but name, I assure you. You remember all our talks on the subject. If you should see her you will see how much she owes to them—and you." Then he said: "If this brings me the fame I hope for, I shall come home in the spring for a little while." And under her hand lay the paper, telling in its latest, telegraphic despatches, of the triumphant success which had hailed the exhibition of the great Madonna, and covered with imperishable laurels the name of the young artist—Durant.

All Europe was ringing with it, and here stood the woman who loved him, trembling like a reed.

"He has waited for this," she said to herself. "Now he will come."

And then she took a brave resolve. She would not wait. Nobly had he won all she had to give, Well, she would give it nobly. She would go to him, bravely, purely, and, keeping back nothing of the passion of her heart, she would lay it at his feet, with a pride which never woman felt who stooped to lift a lover up.

"My dear child, I can hardly believe it is really you! How like your dear mother you are—only you are taller and more imposing. And you are not tired? That is a special Providence: for, I almost feared to tell you, my dear, we are to have a little gathering here this evening—musical and artistic; very quiet, of course.

"I was afraid you would not feel like coming down, and that would have been a pity, for, my dear, I've such a surprise for you. Mr. Durant has haunted the house since I told him I had your telegram, and he was determined to meet you, only he was telegraphed for at noon—some royal command—and he had to go. He was quite frantic about it, but he will be here to-night, and he has sent a perfect garden of flowers. They are in your room. And what else do you suppose he has sent? My child, it is enough to turn my head with excitement just to think of having it under my roof, when all the dignitaries in London would give their eyes for it—the Madonna! He insisted upon having it brought here and hung just that you might see it at once. He said it was his welcome. And he superintended the hanging; would have it just so. He was welcome to do what he liked, you may be sure. I was only too grateful. I don't suppose there is another woman on earth short of her Majesty, he would have done it for."

"Ah! what flowers!"

She stopped.

The room was like a bower with roses—great masses of roses, red and gold and creamy white—set everywhere.

"Mr. Durant sent them," said her aunt. "These, he said, were to go on your dressing-table, for you were particularly fond of them,"

"These," were a great bowl of Parma violets, purple and dewy and fragrant, whose sweetness arose like incense to greet the girl.

"And now," said Aunt Emily, "that is all, I believe. Well dear, I will leave you to rest. Ring, if you want Hornells, and remember that you are really at home."

The door closed behind her.

And Marguerite, alone, knelt down and put her arms about the bowl of violets and bent her pale face lower and lower, till eyes and lips were hidden in the petals utterly.

"Can it be possible that is I?" she exclaimed to herself a few hours later when she stood before the glass. "Do I look like—that?" with a little ineffable thrill of joy.

She was so fair in all that soft black lace—so he liked best to see her. Last of all, with unsteady fingers, she took a handful of the violets and fastened them in her bosom. Then she looked at herself. Such happy eyes! Such a soft glow upon those cheeks! Such tell-tale, tremulous lips!

"And he called you cold," she said, to that glowing image. "He—he will not call you so now," and she hid her warm face in her hands.

"Yes; what is it?" with a start. "I will be down in a moment." "It has come," she thought.

Down the great stairs, across the lighted hall, she walked, as if in a dream. At the drawing room door of the long suite she hesitated, only a second, for, before she had time to think, her hands were seized in two strong, gentle ones, and she was drawn irresistibly across the threshold.

"Marguerite! dear Marguerite! Is it really you? I can scarcely believe it. Come into the light that I may see if you are yourself."

Esmond's voice, just the dear voice of old, only laughing now, and bright with excitement. She lifted her famished eyes. His face, the beautiful face, thinner a trifle, older, more manly, changed, "all for the better," she thought, in that one lightning, loving glance.

"And you," he went on gaily, "you are lovelier than ever. Were you always so tall? What it is to see you once more, Marguerite!"

Could tones be more affectionately tender, eyes more overflowingly delighted, clasp of hands more warm?

She lifted her eyes to his bravely.

"And I," she said, "I am glad to see you, Esmond."

"How good it is to hear your voice again!" he exclaimed. "You are not a bit changed, after all. To think," he ran on, with a sudden change of tone, "that I was not there to meet you! I made myself disagreeable in consequence, I can tell you, to all their high-mightinesses. At least you got my flowers. How good of you to wear them!" he added, touching lightly the knot of violets. "For 'auld lang syne,' Marguerite; you were so fond of them in the old days."

She looked at him silently.

"I know," he continued, smiling, "I am not giving you a chance to speak; but if you knew! It is such a joy to see you. Ah!"—he turned to her with a sudden, eager start—"have they shown you my Madonna yet?"

"No," she said, "I—waited."

He gave her a quick, grateful glance.

"Thank you," he said. "It has been a dream of mine to show her to you. Let us go now, before the people come."

He led the way, talking all the while with so much buoyancy, so much life and freshness, throughout the entire suite of rooms to a small half-lit study at the end of all. And Marguerite followed. At the door of the little room Durant stopped. Opposite it hung a great frame with a heavy curtain drawn across it.

"Stay where you are," said Durant, over his shoulder. "It wants distance, and I want to see your face."

He went up to the great frame. He himself was a little pale, and Marguerite was white.

"Are you ready?" he asked, and he drew the curtain slowly away.

There she stood, the great Madonna, the majestic Madonna, like to no other Madonna the world has ever seen. No virgin, but a sublime mother, the type and image of the world's ideal—strong, and calm, and divinely human—and in her arms she held the hope and promise of the ages.

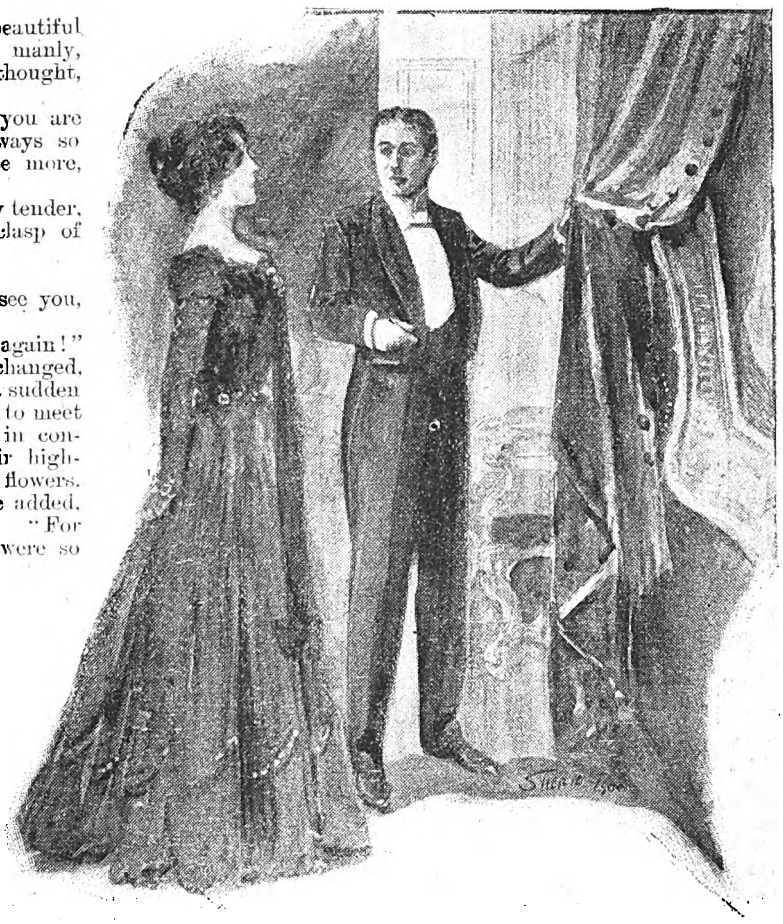
"You see," said Durant quietly, "I have made her simply—a woman."

He waited a moment silently, and then crossed the room, and stood looking down at Marguerite with a grave and gentle gaze.

"Are you content?" he said. "Does she satisfy your severe and noble standards?"

"Yes," said Marguerite, "I am content."

"Then," said Esmond, "one of the dreams of my life is fulfilled. But there is something more. Marguerite,



"Are you ready?" he asked, and he drew the curtain slowly away.

under this picture, of which you have been the largest inspiration, let me ask your forgiveness for all the suffering I have caused you. I was selfish, ill-controlled.

"I—I despise myself when I think of it. Believe me, I have lived to rejoice that you did not return that ignoble passion of mine, to value your sweet friendship, to bless you for your beautiful tenderness and patience, and, not least of all, to thank you for the bitter but most needed lesson. It has largely made me what I am, for I was resolved to prove that you had not done me justice. Admit," he said with a smile full of tenderness, "that I am not quite the worthless good-for-nothing you then thought me, and, dearest friend, sister, forgive me all, and love me a little."

There was a silence. Then she looked at him with a look he could not fathom.

"I have nothing to forgive, Esmond," she said quietly, "nothing."

He took her hand and kissed it.

"Will you give me one violet?" he asked, "just one, as a sign of friendship and perfect understanding?"

She took a violet from her bosom and held it out to him and smiled a little.

"Here," she said, "is the sign of friendship and perfect understanding."

She fixed her eyes upon him with a strange expression.

"And now," she said, "is there nothing more? You—you are a very happy man, Esmond. You are young, rich, powerful; you have a divine gift. There is only one thing more a friend could wish you."

She watched him, how intently.

Durant's face glowed.

"Ah!" he said, "I saved that till last. I was about to tell you—and it is yet a profound secret."

"So!" she interrupted him. "I am rejoiced—beyond words."

"You are the first to know it," he said, with vibrating tones of happiness.

She unfastened the little knot of violets from her bosom, and laid it in the shadow underneath the picture.

"Thanks for that, too," she added, gently. "What is—her name, Esmond?"

He gave her name.

"She will be here to-night," he said. "She knows you already—knows all, Marguerite: but I want you to know her. May I bring her to you?"

"Yes," said Marguerite, "bring her to me."

"How am I ever to deserve so much good fortune," began Esmond, with grateful eyes.

There was a sharp ring at the bell.

"Let us go," said Marguerite, rising quickly. "Let us go. It may be she has come."

"Your niece is a very lovely woman," said one of the best judges in London to Mrs. Bretherton an hour later. "Surely I have seen her somewhere before—her face——"

"Not unless you have been to Melbourne," replied the hostess. "This is her first appearance here."

"Pardon me," said the same gentleman, later in the evening, to Marguerite, "but do you happen to know Durant the painter?"

Marguerite looked at him over her fan.

"Mr. Durant and I are old friends," she said.

"Ah, that explains it; you have a look of the Madonna. Pardon my remarking what all London will not fail to do," he added with a smile.

She bowed a little coldly.

"Any woman must feel honoured by the resemblance," she said. "Excuse me."

She passed on into the little room where the Madonna hung deserted.

* * * * *

"I thought I should find you here," said Esmond. "I have brought Olga."

Marguerite turned to the tiny, childlike, graceful figure at his side.

"A mistake, all a mistake," she said to herself. "She will not help him."

"And now," said Esmond happily, looking from one to the other, "you two are to love each other dearly. I know you will. And I am the proudest and happiest man on earth to stand beside you both—the two people dearest to me in the world."

Marguerite returned gently the look he gave her, so warmly, tenderly affectionate. She dropped her eyes not to see that other look he turned upon his betrothed.

When she raised them she found herself, with a shock of amazement, gazing straight into two glorious eyes, set in that childlike face. From their depths a strong and fearless soul looked out. "Thank God!" thought Marguerite, "all will be well with him."

Recalling herself she put out her hand.

"I was about," she said, "to commit the worst of solecisms. Mr. Durant is so old and dear a friend that I thought the woman he would marry I might dare to congratulate; but now," with a sweet fleeting smile, "I shall know that if she is fortunate, he has been more than fortunate."

The beautiful eyes contemplated her gravely.

"Thank you," said their owner, simply. Then turning to her lover, "Esmond," she said, with a certain dainty coolness, "there is a great, fat novelist in the other room—one of the greatest you ever saw, Esmond—and he wants to know me. Take me to him, if you please."

Durant laughingly gave her his arm, and Marguerite blessed their going. She did not dream that eyes as clear as her own had read her secret, and that a soul as noble had quietly taken as a trust into its keeping the honour and greatness of the man beside her.

She looked up, and the Madonna looked down at her with eyes of strength and lips of infinite compassion.

"And he will never know," thought Marguerite, with unutterable bitterness. "He will never know."

She unfastened the little knot of violets from her bosom and laid it in the shadow underneath the picture, and again lifted up her face exultingly, for love is strong.

And then—and then she let it fall again upon her hands, and the large, slow tears dropped one by one between the fingers, for hearts are weak.

HOW HE WON HER.

"It was in the year 1850," began the old Canadian, "that I came to Montreal and became employed in a hardware store in Wolfe Street. I became acquainted with a widow lady, who kept a few boarders in what was then known as Esmond Avenue.

"My landlady was accomplished and had evidently seen better days, but the death of her husband left her in reduced circumstances. She had two daughters, both lively, intelligent, and possessed of graces that only come from association with the better class of society. They were of extremely gay disposition, and I had not been at the house a month before I was hopelessly in love with Fanny, the elder of the two, and though at times her manner towards me was tender and encouraging, she carefully avoided giving me an opportunity to be alone with her long enough to declare my passion.

"The winter had nearly passed, without finding me any farther advanced in my suit, until one night in February, after a heavy fall of snow, I asked Fanny to take a sleigh ride with me, to which she consented, and after tea I procured as high stepping a pair of horses as could be found in the city, drove up to the house of my affinity, and in a few minutes we were whirling away out on the Sherbrooke turnpike.

"I had taken that road because it was less frequented at night than the other thoroughfares leading from the city, and we were not likely to be interrupted in our ride or conversation. The night was just cool enough to make it necessary to place my arm round my companion, the horses were frisky, and the moon shone with that peculiar light which is preferred by lovers to all others, unless it be that of a gas jet turned down so low that as an illuminator it is nearly useless.

"Through the outskirts of the town we whirled out into the country, where the lights from the farmhouses became more scattered, and the baying of a watchdog was the only sound heard. Fanny, who had previously sung, laughed and chatted merrily during our ride, now became quiet.

"As we came to a rise in the road that disclosed a level strip of two or three miles in length before us I said to myself, 'Before we turn I will settle my fate and go home a happier or more miserable man.'

"Hardly had I come to this conclusion before I heard a peculiar rushing sound behind us, and looking round could see a flock of sheep coming at full speed towards us. Behind them were two or three dogs, and these accounted for the fright of the sheep, which would doubtless run for miles before stopping and cause their owner much trouble in hunting them up. But a bright thought came to me.

"Fanny was a town-bred girl and had never seen a sheep save in the shape of cutlets or roast at her mother's table. I would engage in a strategy of the kind which is considered fair in love or war. Lowering my voice to a suitable tone, I said:

"'Fanny, my girl, are you brave—can you bear terrible news?'

"'Why, Henry, what is the matter—what makes you so pale?'

"Assuming a more tragic voice I replied:

"'Be firm, dearest—rely on me. We are followed by wolves! Look behind you and you can see the monsters, who are already thirsting for our blood!'

"She gave a hurried glance backward, heard the rushing sound of many feet, the deep breathing, which, when heard in the forests of the north, causes the wildest dismay, then drawing nearer to me said. 'I did not know there were any wolves so near the city, Henry.'

"'Neither did I think there were any,' I replied, 'but it seems we are mistaken, for these behind us are of the grey species and by far the most dangerous of any. They must have been driven here by hunger, and, unless our horses can reach the inn about four miles from here before we are overtaken, we are lost.'

"At this juncture the old curly horned leader, tired and out of wind from the long run, gave vent to a prolonged bleat which was fearful enough to scare a girl less timid than Fanny. I sawed on the horses' bits, and flourished my whip frantically round them until they were excited and apparently doing their best to escape the fate behind them, but I was secretly holding them back to allow the wolves (?) to get closer.

"On came the motley horde, panting for breath, nearer and nearer, until I began to throw out robes and blankets. 'These will keep them chewing a few minutes,' I said, 'and we may escape.' But the sheep had no appetite for the robes and were close behind us.

"I arose in the sleigh, gave the reins to Fanny, saying, 'Drive for your life—I will sacrifice myself for you!' and made a movement as if to jump out of the sleigh.

"'Never! Never!' she screamed. 'We will die together?' And she pulled me down beside her to await her fate.

"While thus employed I hurriedly declared my love and succeeded in obtaining a hasty avowal from Fanny; at the same time I was holding back the horses to let the pursuers go by. They came; the monsters separated and passed us on the other side, while I held my hat over her face that she might not see the dreadful deception I had played upon her.

"She fainted the moment we were overtaken by the wolves, and, without trying to revive her, I turned the horses homeward, and only stopped to pick up the robes which had been thrown out to check the ferocious animals. After driving a mile or two my now affianced wife revived sufficiently to hear how we were saved by a party of sleigh riders who met us just as we were surrounded.

"Though nervous and weak from the excitement, she recovered her buoyancy of spirits before we arrived home and had promised to keep our adventure a secret, as I informed her the owner of the horses would charge me a fearful price if he knew to what tests his steeds had been put. And that is my adventure with wolves and how I came to marry."

"But did your wife never find out the deception you practised?" we asked the old Canadian as he laughed again while thinking of his boyish prank.

"No until eight years ago," he replied, "when I told her one evening while she was ironing."

"What did she say?"

"Not much—not very much," answered our old romancer, but, removing his hat, he showed us a triangular space upon his head, such as might have been made by a hot polishing iron, and with not a hair upon its surface.

We thought Fanny was revenged. W. F. G.

THE MERRY PIEMAN AND THE DON'S DAUGHTER.

MANY years ago, upon the banks of a gleaming river that rippled through the dreary heart of Old Castile, there stood a castle with many towers, in which dwelt a haughty Don and his only daughter, Francella Dolores.

The Don had a nose like an eagle's beak and an eye like a red flash of fire in the dark, and he was very fierce and proud, for the blood of eleven generations of noble ancestors throbbed in his veins.

Francella was a sweet, shy girl, with eyes like those of the wild deer. She was graceful and fair as a wild flower in spring; and so wildly enamoured of her loveliness were all the youths and bachelors in that province that they one and all forsook their comfortable haciendas, gave up napping after dinner, and wandered about the country doing all sorts of ridiculous and daring things in the hope of winning her favour.

Francella, however, was wholly unmoved by all these wondrous doings, as she had for some time been deeply in love with a gay young pastry vendor whom she had seen selling pies in the market place one morning, clad in a bright blue and yellow jacket, and singing like a skylark all the while. His name was Pedro Perez, but every one called him the Merry Pieman.

To a maiden who loved as passionately as Francella, there was very little satisfaction in peeping through the lattice of her window at daybreak every morning, as she did, merely to see the object of her affection passing by with his basket of wares, and humming some merry tune. But the memory of even that little glimpse filled her dreams the whole day long, just as one sees green and scarlet circles, everywhere after looking at the sun.

One morning, however, as he passed with his basket full of tarts, whistling a scrap of a rollicking bolero, he chanced to look up and spied her peeping from the window.

The instant he saw her he stopped stock still and his whistle ran off to nowhere in a funny little squeak. The blood rushed to Francella's cheeks and she was about to draw the curtain, when he doffed his cap with a graceful bow, stooped swiftly as he did so, and, choosing the crispiest custard pastry in his basket, tossed it up towards the window.

"Oh, my!" she gasped. "Oh, my, it will spill!"

But the pastry sailed through the air like a swallow on the wing, turned over twice as it flew, and dropped on the window-sill unharmed with an appetising little flop that made Francella's heart go pit-a-pat. Speechless with delight, she clasped her slender hands and stood gazing in rapture at the fat little pats of currant jelly dotting the fluffy white meringue.

The young pastry vendor thought he had never looked upon a lovelier picture in all his life.

"Senorita Francella Dolores," he exclaimed, pressing his hand to his heart:

"You're the cake of my endeavour and my jelly roll forever;
You're my tapioca tartlet and my lemon custard pie;
You're my candied fruit and spices and my juicy citron slices;
You're the darling sugar-sprinkled apple dumpling of my eye!"

Francella's heart fluttered like a bird in a cage. "Truly," said she, as she set her small white teeth deep into the rim of the fragrant pastry with a fascinating crackle of the rich crust, "truly you are the most delightful lover I ever had. But tell me," she said tremulously, "is this pastry a vanilla-cream pastry or a lemon-custard? I can scarcely tell, I am so agitated—but if it is lemon custard you might toss me up two or three, for I just dote on lemon custard."

The words were hardly out of her mouth before a heavy foot-step, hurrying up the hollow stair, echoed down the long corridor. She turned deathly pale.

"Fly!" she cried, trembling from head to foot with apprehension; "it is my father. The smell of the pastry has betrayed us!"

For an instant she stood swaying like a pallid lily in the wind, as the crimson sash of the pastry vendor faded swiftly from the view, and she could not restrain a sob as she saw pies and tarts fall here and there and break in fragments on the stones.

"Open the door, Francella," cried her father, in a terrible voice, beating upon the oaken panels with angry fists.

"Yes, father," faltered Francella, hastily finishing the pastry, though her hands shook with terror.

"Don't say 'yes,'" roared the furious Don. "But open the door instantly—I smell a smell of pastry!"

"A pieman passed a moment ago," stammered Francella.

"Girl," thundered the Don, "do not try to deceive me! I tell you I smell pastry, pastry; vulgar, hand-made lemon pastry, through the keyhole of the door!"

Francella, white with fear, pushed back the bolt, and her father strode into the room.

There on the window-ledge lay three flakes of pie-crust.

"Francella," cried her father, in a voice so icy cold that she shivered. "Francella, is it possible that you, a daughter of mine, have so far forgotten your rank as to eat pie, a common pie?"

Francella clung speechless to the curtain

"A daughter of mine should die before she would stoop to the pie of a low-born pastry vendor!"

"But, father," panted Francella, "I love him."

"What?" roared the Don. "A pie-seller?" and without another word he locked her up in the dungeon.

Then in a towering rage he sent out heralds through all the land, to proclaim in every courtyard, market-place and plaza that upon the following Monday he would hold a tournament at his castlé, open to all high-born caballeros, and t the victor in the strife would give his only daughte .e far-famed Francella Dolores, the Lily of Castile.

There had not been such another out-pouring of the chivalry of Spain since the days of the great crusade. From east, from west, from north and south they came. From the wild mountain passes of Castile, from the cross-road castles of Grenada and from the furthest limits of Navarre. Knights and squires, dukes, hidalgos, nobles and princes of the royal line, armour-clad with pennoned lances, fluttering plumes and splendid trappings, until the lanes and highways looked like one grand circus procession of sun-bright riders flaming in the glory of the midsummer sun.

And when the great day dawned the plain about the castle of the Don was hidden by a multitude of tents, marquees and pavilions of radiant colours, over which flapped and swung the banners of the best blood of Spain.

The trumpet blared from the Castle walls. Down clanged the drawbridge, and the haughty Don rode forth, his retinue about him, and at his right hand Francella Dolores, ashy pale, clad in white samite and cloth of gold and mounted upon a cream-white palfrey that her father had hired for the occasion of the best livery stable in Toledo.

A cheer of greeting rolled across the plain and thundered away in the canyons of the mountain, scaring the sheep nearly out of their skins; but Francella hung her head upon her breast like a wilted flower, unmindful of it all.

Up the glittering lists rode the Don to the bar of the high pavilion.

"Begin!" he cried, and waved his hand.

With a tremendous shout, the mail-clad warriors hurled together like mad wild boars.

Crash! went ashen spears, splintered in fragments that kept the poor in kindling-wood for a month.

Clang, clang, rang sword and battle-axe on helmet, mail and shield. Down went horse and rider in a cloud of blinding dust.

Round and round went the struggling, seething whirl, battling like tigers, while from the great pavilion rose shout and call to friend and foe:

"Go it, Gasper—now you've got him again!"

"Wade in, Carlos—hit him again!"

"Now, Diego—yah, yah, yah!" until the sky rang.

Many an unintentional somersault was turned in that wild onfall, and many a gallant knight was tumbled over his horse's crupper, like an apple from a tree.

But still the fight went on with unabated fury all day long, without an intermission for refreshments; though here and there at intervals, from under the mad medley of hilts and heels, some dishevelled caballero crawled on his hands and knees and telephoned for the ambulance.

But when at last the night fell, and over the mountains in the east the old moon hung like a tired cheese, the Don arose.

"Hold!" he cried. "The day is spent. Let us eat, drink and be merry, and sleep anon, and on the morrow the tourney may proceed."

Then followed a scene that baffles description.

The Don had mortgaged his whole estate to raise the ready cash, and "Get me the best cook in all Castile," he said.

"He shall be gotten," bowed the steward.

"And the richest stores in all the land!"

"They shall be procured."

And there upon the great tables spread in the long pavilion steamed and glowed a feast that filled the air for miles around with appetizing fragrance that was in itself almost a meal, and made the mouths of those noble warriors water like mountain springs.

Roasted capons, stuffed with spice and olives; flitches of beef, garnished with savoury and lined with currant jelly; broad gammons of sizzling bacon, crisped with onions and grated almonds; fat eels, stewed in rich, green oil; sausages buried in golden cheesecakes; roast lamb with clear mint sauce; venison collops with guava jam; turbot, herring, sturgeon, roe, turtle soup and devilled kidneys drowned in wine.

But in the night a woeful sound arose within the camp. There was busking and buckling in haste, and riding hard through the darkness, and wild blows and voices crying at the doors of all the doctors and apothecaries in the town.

And when the morning came the camp wore a melancholy, jaded air. Down hung the proud banners wearily, and slow flapped the tent doors dejectedly in the sullen wind, and there was a prevalent odour of peppermint and paregoric everywhere.

Again the trumpet blared from the castle wall, and the draw-bridge rattled down; and again the retinue of the Don and his daughter swept down the lists. But the lists were empty, and in the whole camp there was no sound, nor any person to be seen, save one doleful fellow with a plaster on his nose and a bit of raw beef clapped to a very dismal eye.

And while they wondered, there came from afar off a solitary horseman, riding down the mountain side. Spurring across the plain, he came up the lists in a cloud of dust and smote upon the shield of Don Santallana Lopez, Duke of Tors, with a blow that made the audience jump an inch off their seats.

"I challenge him to combat!" cried the stranger in a ringing voice, at the sound of which Francella started and clasped her hands.

Then the dust cleared away. There upon a fat little donkey sat a stout young fellow in a gabardine of blue and gold, wearing a white apron tied about his waist. In his hand he bore a broad, strong baker's paddle of ash, from which fluttered a banderole, and upon this banderole, on a blue ground, were blazoned a silver lily and three custard pies rampant. His face was hidden by a mask.

"Out with your Duke," cried he impatiently. "I can't wait here all day."

Then the Marshal ran to the Duke's pavilion, crying: "Señor, señor, they are calling thee in the lists!"

"Let 'em call, you noisy dog," bawled the Duke with his head in a bucket of ice-water. "I wouldn't fight, the way I feel, for a billion Lillies of Castile—my head is like to split!" and he groaned dismally. "Oh, that supper."

Then the stranger rode again down the lists and struck the shield of the Baron of Baquedena until it rang like a Chinese gong. But the Baron came not. And the Marshal ran to the Baron's tent and beat upon the sill-board, calling: "Señor, señor, they call thee in the lists!"

"Plague on the lists!" groaned the Baron, who was rubbing his forehead with spirits of camphor, and wore a mustard plaster where it would do the most good. "Plague on the lists and on you, too! My head spins round like a flying Dutchman. I wouldn't fight for the fairest maiden in forty Spains!" And "Oh, that supper, that supper!" he groaned in bitterness of spirit.

Then the stranger smiled a strange, far-away smile, and smote upon the shield of all the knights within that camp, but not one came forth; for some were groaning and some were praying, while others were swearing dreadfully; and some threw their boots at the Marshal's head, and some tied themselves up in piteous knots and wailed for the doctor, and the burden of their wailings was: "That supper; oh, that supper."

At last they came to the Marquis of Seville; and he, being an old campaigner and a veteran glutton, had but an attack of dyspepsia that filled him with a yearning to fight a cage of wild cats for pastime. He summoned his two private blacksmiths, who got him into his fighting clothes; and then, with his ponderous lance in rest, he thundered down the lists, grinding his teeth until the shivers ran up and down his own back.

"Who art thou," he roared, hoarsely, "who darest me to joust!"

"Come and find out," replied the stranger, sweetly, as he took a good grip on his long ashen paddle.

The Marquis put spurs to his fiery steed and dashed upon the stranger like a thunderbolt.

Francella shrieked and hid her eyes.

But the stranger laughed, dug his heels into his donkey's ribs, dodged like a flash, ducked under the great beam of the Marquis's lance, and, swinging his paddle in the air till it whizzed again, he spanked the Marquis's fiery steed across the flank with such a vigour that the said fiery steed gave one tremendous plunge and such a wild kick of his hind legs in the air that the Marquis went heels over head in the dirt, where he lay with his head going round so fast that he did not know which direction was up.

Then the stranger rode around and poked him gently in the ribs and asked softly: "Fair sir, would you be pleased to have some more of this pleasing game?"

But the Marquis rolled over on his face and crawled away on his hands and knees as fast as he could, evidently labouring under the impression that there had been an earthquake and that the mountains in the vicinity were turning handsprings at his expense.

Then the stranger, turning to the great pavilion, cried: "Sir Don, if you have any other able-bodied victims to a delusion that they are the only people on earth, please bring them along!"

There was a dead silence.

"There don't seem to be any," said he, ironically.

"No," replied the Don, looking carefully over the programme and then about the camp in some chagrin, "there doesn't."

"Then," said the stranger, "it appears that I am the victor in this tournament, and the winner of the fair Francella Dolores."

"I don't know," said the Don, looking doubtfully at the donkey and the baker's paddle, "I have never seen anything like this laid down in the books of chivalric etiquette, and it doesn't seem quite, that is, not exactly —er—proper, you know."

"Nonsense," cried the stranger. "You know as well as I, Sir Don, that, 'All is fair in love and war.'"

"Yes," said the Don, dubiously, "but this isn't war."

"It is love though," cried the stranger, at which Francella giggled hysterically. "And you can see for yourself that love is given the first place in the proverb."

"Yes," rejoined the Don, reluctantly. "But before we begin talking of love or of giving you my daughter, who are you?"

"I," cried the stranger in a ringing voice, snatching off his mask as he spoke, "am—Pedro Perez!"

"What?" roared the Don, leaping to his feet, crimson with fury, and drawing his sword half out of its sheath. "A base-born pie seller?"

"Base-born?" cried Pedro, stoutly. "No, Sir Don—my family is as old as yours and my ancestry as good."

"What?" cried the Don—"what," being a favourite word of his—"do you dare to compare your lineage with mine?"

"Well, I should say I did!" replied Pedro, coolly. "I am a direct descendant of Adam and Eve. Does your family line run any further back than that or begin any higher?"

The Don's sword dropped back into its sheath with a clank. He bit his lips.

"No," said he, sourly, "I can't say that it does. But," he went on, sneeringly, "if you are well born, Sir Piepeddler, where are your estates?"

"I have none," answered Pedro, "but——"

"Nonsense! Be off, you beggar, you penniless fraud, or I'll——"

"Not so fast, Sir Don," cried Pedro, quietly. "I may have no estates of my own, but I am no beggar, nor am I penniless. I hold——"

"Hold? I don't care what you hold!"

"Don't be too sure of that, Sir Don," said Pedro once more, "for what I hold happens to be a mortgage upon your castle and your lands!"

The Don dropped into his chair as if some one had knocked his legs out from under him. "How—how"—he gasped, "how did you get it?"

"I was the cook who furnished your supper, last night—and the mortgage was my pay!"

The Don collapsed.

"And now, my dear Don," said Pedro, affably, cocking one leg across the pommel of his saddle and locking his hands about his knee, "if you prefer, you may keep your daughter, in spite of the fact that I love her and she loves me, and—I will foreclose the mortgage to-morrow morning."

"Oh, my dear fellow," cried the Don, changing expression like a kaleidoscope, "I was just joking, indeed I was. Francella is yours—take her, take her, my boy—and may you be happy!"

With a glad cry Pedro leaped from his donkey's back and sprang to Francella's side.

"Oh, my!" she gasped, ecstatically. "Oh, my! Now I can have all the lemon-custard pastry that I want!"

And as Pedro continued to hold the mortgage they lived happily forever after. C. Harvey.

The Punched Kopeck.

"THE annals of the Russian police, if they could be read, would excel the most extravagant imaginings of your detective story writers," said a handsome, heavily whiskered man, who was one of a party of five gentlemen in a small room in a St. Petersburg private palace. "We have excellent writers of fiction here in Russia,"—two of his auditors were Frenchmen—"and sometimes they go to the real for material, but I am sure that the shrewdest of them have never heard of the punched kopeck which belongs to the annals of the police just mentioned."

The man with the whiskers emptied his wine glass and pushed it away as he continued:

"About fifteen years ago, Count Yasilvitch was one of the best-known nobles of the Empire. His St. Petersburg establishment was conducted on a style of royal magnificence, and he had the imperial ear oftener than any other man of his rank.

"Well, one morning the count was found dead in his mansion, and in circumstances which went to prove that somebody helped him out of the world. As a matter of course, the Russian police took the affair in hand; and that was the last heard of it.

"At that time there was said to be attached to the Third Section a man named Paritz. Rumour invested him with all the attributes of the ideal 'sleuth.' Nobody could be found who had ever seen him, but, all the same, the great discoveries in crime continued to be placed to his credit. He worked out great results from impossible beginnings, and some said that it was Paritz who was adding most to the criminal population of Siberia. Of course everyone expected to see Count Yasilvitch's enemy dragged to light through the agency of this secret man-hound, but as months passed without anything of the kind transpiring Paritz became the laughing stock of St. Petersburg.

"Count Yasilvitch was known far and wide as a numismatist. His collection of coins was the most complete of any in the country, and had drawn from the mint large offers of purchase. In the collection were two ordinary copper kopecks which had been curiously punched through the centre. Count Yasilvitch valued these coins above any in his possession, and it was understood that they had a history which he would not reveal.

"When the police came to examine the count's coin collection after his death they discovered that a number of pieces were missing, and among them was one of the kopecks. Of course the authorities did not care to publish their discovery, and the world at large knew nothing about it. The coin which was not taken was given to the misty Paritz, with orders to find its mate and the count's enemy as well.

"Paritz took the case with his usual bow, and there the Chief of Police left it. The count's coins were put up for sale, and the numismatists who were drawn to St. Petersburg by the event wondered what had become of the punched kopecks. Time rolled on, and everybody forgot Paritz and his trail.

"I recollect that I took considerable interest in the trail of the kopeck at the time. I was rather intimate with a member of the police, and he told me much about the count's death and the hunt for his murderer. But question him as adroitly as I would, I could learn nothing of the identity of the renowned Paritz. Indeed, I was more than ever inclined to consider him a myth.

"I went abroad a few months after the Yasilvitch mystery was sprung on society, and travelled almost incessantly for ten years. I visited nearly every part of the globe, finding wherever I went secret representatives of our police, with whom, being a native Russian myself, I became as intimate as possible. I tried by these means to keep track of the mythical Paritz and his trail. The secret agents had heard about the missing kopeck, but they did not know how Paritz had progressed, nor where he was.

"About a year ago interest in the count's death was suddenly revived by the arrest of a man who had a lot of rare coins on his person. They were said to be some of those missing from the murdered man's collection, and they were subjected to the closest scrutiny. The fellow arrested was an honest and illiterate peasant, who averred that he had found the coins in the weed-grown garden attached to the late count's residence. He was not released till the garden had been dug over by the authorities, whose labours were rewarded by the finding of several rare roubles known to have been described in the Yasilvitch catalogue.

"Now, more than ever, Paritz and the punched kopeck became objects of derision. Several of the Russian newspapers received satirical communications on the subject, but, as a matter of course, they were not published. A Russian editor is supposed to know just how far to go to eat his bread this side of the frontier. For fifteen years the punched kopeck has been missing to the Russian police. The Yasilvitch case is as great a mystery now as it was then, and for once Paritz has been thoroughly baffled.

"If he is not a police fiction, he knows no more to-day of the whereabouts of the mutilated kopeck than does the gentleman who inhabits the moon. Our police stand baffled by one of the most insignificant coins of the world, for, until Paritz can place the kopeck in his possession alongside the one he has not, of course the mystery of Count Yasilvitch's death cannot be solved.

"Now, let me show how completely this Paritz has been beaten," and a smile stole over the whiskered face of the Russian.

"I am by no means a detective myself, but we pick up queer things in our everyday wanderings. Wherever I went during my tour, I examined every coin that fell into my hands, for I was quite familiar with Count Yasilvitch's collection, and believed that I should be able to recognise any parts of it at sight. I might even admit that I grew to be a hunter of the lost coins, and of the punched kopeck in particular.

"But I came home unsuccessful. One morning in the market of St. Petersburg I received in change a lot of small coin which, being in a hurry at the time, I carried home without an examination. In my library I fell to looking at the little pieces, and what was my astonishment when I found in my hand a punched kopeck?

"There was no doubt that I had the identical coin which had baffled the acumen of the Russian police for fifteen years and for which the wonderful Paritz could almost afford to risk his head. Yes; I had found in St. Petersburg the punched kopeck which the 'sleuth' of the Empire may have chased round the world, and in order to wind up my story with the proper climax, gentlemen, here it is!"

At the same time Colonel Simovar, who had just finished his narrative, drew from his waistcoat pocket a small coin, which he placed carefully and with the proper emphasis on the table under the lamp.

His auditors, two Frenchmen and two Russians, leaned forward with gaze riveted on the coin.

"Now, I would like to see Paritz match the punched kopeck and thus vindicate the fame of the Russian police," continued Colonel Simovar, looking up at his auditors in triumph. "If he does not I may hold him up as the laughing stock of the world and prove that the Third Section is not infallible!"

The last words had barely left Simovar's lips ere a very dark hand rose over the edge of the table, and the next second, to the utter consternation of four men, another kopeck, punched exactly like the first, lay on the cloth! Colonel Simovar fell back and stared first at the second kopeck and then at the guest who had placed it where it was.

"Paritz, gentlemen, has chased the kopeck round the world," said the guest, without the semblance of a smile on his swarthy face. "He takes great pleasure in vindicating the Russian police by matching Colonel Simovar's kopeck. I am Paritz!"

Colonel Simovar laughed derisively.

"You are my friend and guest, Captain Basilvitch," said he to the so-called Paritz. "I recollect that we met in Constantinople, and again in Milan and Athens. Come, gentlemen, Captain Basilvitch is a man of humour. We will drink to his little joke."

The face of Paritz did not relax.

Rising to his feet he drew forth a small diary, the leaves of which he turned with provoking coolness.

At length he began to read of Colonel Simovar's minutest doings in France and among the Pyrenees. From this he jumped to his travels in America, and was following him step by step back to the Tsar's dominions, when Simovar threw up his hands.

"It is enough," he said, "I surrender."

The police spy bowed to the other guests.

"I take the punched kopecks, gentlemen," said he, "and the murderer of Count Yasilvitch as well;" and gathering up the two coins with one hand he touched Simovar on the shoulder with the other.

There was no resistance on the Colonel's part, and he went with Paritz and the punched kopecks to the station.

Colonel Simovar paid the severest penalty of the law for his secret crime, and from the day of the finding of the punched kopeck the name of Paritz has been invested with a new dread and terror. F. H. T.

A POSTAL IRREGULARITY.

There was too much pepper in the soup, and too little salt in the potatoes; the joint was a trifle overdone, and the pastry not done enough; and Ada's expression implied that the cook was under notice. So the conversation was monosyllabic until the cloth was removed and I had started a cigar.

"It is well to be a man," said she, "to sit and smoke and enjoy yourself."

"There is no reason," I ventured to suggest, "why a woman should not sit, or smoke, or even enjoy herself."

"Unless she has a husband."

"My dear girl!"

"A husband who can never be trusted to recollect any little thing that he is asked to do, however important."

I tried vainly to blow smoke rings, and to think what I had forgotten.

"I can't remember—" I began, shaking my head.

"You can remember easily enough when you are going to play a stupid chess match; or to watch a brutal game like football."

"Or to send for half-a-dozen things that you have left out of your stores' order; or to ask Brown to tell his wife what you forgot to say; or to—er——"

"Post a letter."

I stopped my attempts at smoke rings abruptly.

"What letter?"

"A letter which I found to-day in your overcoat pocket. You needn't glare at me. I was merely looking for handkerchiefs for the wash. You generally have half-a-dozen in your pocket."

"Why?—What?—Er—when?"

"A letter to mother which I gave you last Tuesday." She produced it from behind the clock, and laid it firmly upon the table. There was no valid line of defence, so far as I could see.

"Umph," I remarked feebly. "I suppose it's too late to post it now?"

Ada looked at me in mute wrath.

Digitized by Google

"It was awfully stupid of me," I admitted penitently. "I can't think how I forgot it. Was it important?"

"Important! It was to ask them to get me some woollen things for baby at Tapeandrape's sale; and to send them without fail by Friday. Now of course the sale is over, and I shall have to pay twice as much for them."

"Well, I must be fined the extra cost, that's all."

"It isn't all." She produced her handkerchief, and I trembled. "I've done something that I shall never forgive myself for!

"It's all your fault!" she commenced, wiping her eyes. "A whole week and you never remembered or said a word to me. I'll never trust you with anything again, so long as I live. No, no! Go away! I hate you; and I wish I'd never seen you! There!"

"Really, my dear, you're a little unreasonable."

"Unreasonable! When you've made me offend mother and the girls; and they're so sensitive, and they've always been so good to me—ever so much better than y-y-you."

The handkerchief was again in use.

"Why ever should they be offended just because they didn't get a letter asking them to buy things at Tapeandrape's sale? Come, come, Ada, don't be a little goose!"

"It isn't only that," she wailed. "I-I wrote them another letter this morning—before I found this."

"Whew!" I whistled. "Pitching into them?"

"Yes—if you must use such vulgar expressions."

"Did you—er—say much?"

"Oh, Fred, don't ask me!" She was so evidently distressed that I laid down my cigar and tried to console her.

"You can write and explain," I suggested, "or I will."

"But I wrote so disagreeably, I thought it was so unkind, when they knew the dear little baby wanted the things; and not to send a line even."

"You can tell them that you were feeling a bit upset."

"It wasn't a 'bit.' Cook was all behind again, when I came downstairs; and I thought your breakfast would be late, and you'd be as savage as a bear."

"But, my dear girl——"

"And grumble at me."

"But I don't!"

"Well, you look grumbling. You've no idea how cross you look, Fred."

"Ah! Well, about cook?"

"I gave her notice; and she was impudent; and then I sat down and wrote the letter."

I shook my head.

"That's where you were wrong, my dear. You should never write letters when you're in a state of irri——"

She cut me short with a stamp of her foot.

"It's very nice for you to talk in that superior tone," she cried, "when it's all your fault. You'll make my life miserable with your carelessness and forgetfulness, and never doing anything that I ask you. There was the birthday card for Aunt Mary Jane, that you left on the hall stand, and she didn't get it till the day after her birthday, and was so upset!"

"But she's all right since I explained."

"And there were the fowls that you forgot to order—I might have known you would! when the Stevensons were coming to supper; and I had to take cook off her work, and send her out for them—and she was so disagreeable over it, and you know how dear things are down here."

"Everyone forgets things sometimes," I protested.

"It isn't sometimes. It's always. Now I can't trust you with a letter without your forgetting to post it. I'll never forgive you so long as I live!"

I twirled my moustache uncomfortably. I do forget letters somehow, even my own. Then something came into my mind so suddenly that I burst into a fit of laughter.

Ada looked up at me with unspeakable things in her face.

"You're a perfect brute," she cried. Then she burst into tears. "You cannot c-care for me any longer, when you l-laugh and j-jeer at my distress! I'll go away—and take b-baby——"

"But it's all right, Dadie," I cried bending over her and—never mind what!—"Didn't you give me your furious letter this morning to post?"

"You know I did!"

"Well—er—the fact is, my dear—I forgot to post this one also!"

There was silence for a minute; after which I succeeded in pulling the handkerchief away from her face.

"It was rather clever of me," I inquired, "don't you think?"

"I think," said she, "that you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

I suppose I ought.

A Christmas Auction

CHAPTER I.

Going——

It wanted a fortnight to Christmas Day, when Mr. Hartington arrived at Gresham, after a few days' visit to town. The air was cold and clear, and he walked on briskly for some minutes until he paused by a lamp-post to light his pipe. A flaming bill on the wall beside him attracted his attention; it was printed in the brightest colours. He read it once, and opened his eyes in amazement; he read it a second time and exclaimed: "Either I am dreaming, or the man has gone clean out of his senses!"

For the bill contained the extraordinary announcement that the entire household furniture of Francis Gower, Esq., would be sold on Christmas Eve, Tuesday December 24th, at eleven o'clock, to the first bidder, for the sum of one shilling.

"He is a lunatic, and must be put under restraint!" said Mr, Hartington, when he had read the words for the third time, for on the 25th of December, Christmas Day, he was to have officiated as best man to Mr. Gower on his marriage with Miss Ormside, the belle of Gresham. A handsome house had been taken and furnished at great expense, and now all the valuable possessions were to go for one shilling! It was altogether too pitiable to be ludicrous.

Mr. Hartington walked on at an incredible rate of speed, entirely forgetting his pipe, but he did not go fast enough to avoid seeing at every corner repetitions of the outrageous bill.

"With Sampson's name on it, too!" he ejaculated wrathfully. "I thought he was a high-class auctioneer, and would not have played into the hands of a madman!"

He gave a thundering rat-tat-rat at his door instead of using his latchkey. His housekeeper answered the door. Without greeting her he exclaimed, "Is Gower in a madhouse or going to one?"

Mrs. Thompson looked at him in surprise.

"Can't you answer, woman; is Gower in a madhouse I say? Be quick."

"If you wouldn't come in just like a whirl-wind, Mr. Hartington, I could collect my senses," replied Mrs. Thompson in an injured tone, "and instead of standing in the hall holding your bag in your hand, if you would come into the dining-room, where a hot chicken will be served immediately, I could tell you as much as lays in my power. I must say that Mr. Gower's most extraordinary proceeding is the talk of the town."

"Why did he do it?"

"I don't know, but it is said——"

"Oh, you don't know," interrupted Mr. Hartington, "Very good; I will find out," and he reopened the front door.

"But the dinner, the chicken!" exclaimed Mrs. Thompson.

"Bother the chicken!" replied Mr. Hartington from the doorstep, "I'm off."

"It seems to me that they are a pair!" said the housekeeper wrathfully, "and after all the trouble I have taken about his dinner to-night!"

Mr. Hartington walked on at the rate of about six miles an hour, and soon reached Mr. Gower's lodgings. Without inquiring if his friend were at home, he waved the servant on one side and entered, exclaiming, before the door was fairly shut:

"Are you mad, Gower? Are you stark, staring mad?"

Mr. Gower was sitting over the fire in an attitude of extreme dejection; he was a fine, handsome man of some three or four-and-thirty; but to-night he looked ill; his hair was ruffled, his general appearance betokened insensibility to either surroundings or circumstances. He raised his head and replied, with a half smile: "It looks as if I were mad, doesn't it? But I'm not."

"What's the meaning of it?"

"Ask Miss Ormside," said Mr. Gower, with a sudden frown and a tone of suppressed fury.

"Miss Ormside, and why not Edith Ormside to me, seeing that I have known you both all my life?"

"Look here, Hartington, you mean well but don't try to interfere in this business; I won't have it."

"But I will interfere, you consummate idiot," said Mr. Hartington, speaking very rapidly, his nervous, energetic face all aglow. "Unless you can explain your proceedings you ought to be locked up as a lunatic. I've a great mind to go this minute for a couple of doctors for you. Don't you know these confounded posters have made you the talk of the town?"

"I'll thank you to mind your own business. Yes, I do know I am the talk of the town. I swore I would have my revenge, and I'm having it, and she is the talk of the town as well as I."

"Upon my word you are a nice, manly fellow," said Mr. Hartington with contempt, "and if I didn't really and truly believe that you are off your head, I would never speak to you again. When were those precious bills posted?"

"To-day."

"Then I will have them all torn down, and tell everyone you did it for a bet."

"You will do nothing of the sort. I have sworn that that sale shall take place, and take place it shall, and I advise you to let me and my affairs alone, unless you want me to thrash you," said Frank Gower with a second burst of fury.

"You thrash me!" exclaimed Mr. Hartington in an equally furious tone, "I should like to see you do it. Come on and try."

But the other sat still with such an expression of hopeless misery on his countenance that Mr. Hartington relented.

"Well," he said, "I'm going. You've insulted me and behaved like a cad, but I'm not going to bear malice. Good-night, Frank."

"Good-night," replied Mr. Gower without moving. Mr. Hartington next made his way, still at the top of his speed, to the house of Mr. Ormside. He was told that Mr. and Mrs. Ormside were dining out, but Miss Edith was at home.

"I wish to see her," he said, and again announced himself.

He shook hands, exclaiming as he did so, "What is the meaning of it all?"

Miss Ormside's cheeks were flushed, her eyes shining. She was in the state of mind in which it is a relief to people to knock the furniture about, or throw something at someone's head, or stamp with rage. But, as she was a lady, she did none of these things, but only clenched her hands, and walked up and down the room.

"The meaning of it!" she repeated. "Ask Mr. Gower."

"He told me to ask you."

"The meaning of it," she said, her bosom heaving, "is that he is a wretch, and I wish I had never seen him. He has made our affairs known all over the town, and publicly insulted me by these bills. Everyone knew the 25th, Christmas Day, was to have been our wedding-day."

"What do Mr. and Mrs. Ormside say?"

"They were both very angry; my father with him, my mother with me. They have gone out to dinner to-night to try to stop the talk and make the best version possible, though I don't know what can be said."

"But what is it all about?"

"Mr. Hartington. I recommend you not to interfere in other people's affairs."

This second snub, coming as it did to a man who had had no dinner, was a little too much for Mr. Hartington.

"I apologise," he said gravely; "I will not intrude on you again. Good-night."

"Good-night," she replied, in equally cold tones; but before he had reached the door she called him back and said, her eyes flaming, "If you see Mr. Gower tell him I hate him."

CHAPTER II.

Going——

The world did not seem bright to Mr. Hartington the next day. His housekeeper was sulky because his dinner had been spoilt the day before; his two best friends were alienated from him because he had done his best in all conscientiousness to do them a service; the hateful posters stared him in the face at every turn, and, worse than all, every one of his acquaintances stopped him in the street to make comments on Mr. Gower's extraordinary conduct. Everyone asked him what it meant, and to every one this faithful friend gave the same answer—that the circumstances would be explained later on; for he was not without a hope that something would arise, some miracle perhaps take place, so that the marriage might still be performed, the sale averted. He made his way to Mr. Sampson, the auctioneer.

"I am surprised," he began, in his usual impetuous manner, "that you, Sampson, a high-class auctioneer, a fellow-townsman of Mr. Gower's for the last thirty years, should have lent your name to this disgraceful sale!"

"And why disgraceful?" asked Mr. Sampson, coolly.

"It is disgraceful. A house full of brand new furniture to go for a shilling. I'm ashamed of you, Sampson!"

The auctioneer knew Mr. Hartington well, and was not at all offended.

"And what was I to do?" he asked. "He would have this done, and done at an hour's notice. I said all I could to prevent it, but he declared if I wouldn't do it he would find some auctioneer who would, so I thought he would come off best in my hands."

"If you had any sense of decency you wouldn't have put those flaring colours on the posters to call everyone's attention. Auctioneers' notices are always printed in black."

"Come, come," said Mr. Sampson, in a rather offended tone, "I believe I have some sense of decency, the colours were by Mr. Gower's positive order."

"I beg your pardon, Sampson; you are a good fellow, I know, and I am sure you will do your best to stop this folly if stopped it can be."

"That I will, but I see no chance of it. I have heard no particulars, but, like every one else, I imagine there has been some deadly quarrel between him and Miss Ormside. I should be glad if anyone could patch it up. Why don't you try?"

"I have tried," returned Mr Hartington, "and my attempt has been a failure."

He left the town and took a long country walk, returning home after dark, still with a sense of depression hanging over him.

"I am in time for dinner to-day, Mrs. Thompson," he said, making an effort to rally.

"Yes, sir," replied the housekeeper, her good humour restored, "and you will find it to your liking. Miss Ormside has been here. She left a message that she would be glad if you could call round this evening. She looked as if she had been crying."

As soon as dinner was over, Mr. Hartington fulfilled the young lady's request, meditating as he went on the transitory nature of human happiness and how this Christmas Day, which was to have been a joyful one, would now be wretched to both his friends. Miss Ormside received him alone. She had lost her excitement and was looking as wretched as Mr. Gower had done.

"How good of you to come out this cold night," she said, taking Mr. Hartington's hand and leading him to an arm-chair beside the fire. "How cold you are. Do take off your great coat."

"My visit will not be a lengthy one."

"You are still offended with me. I asked you to come because I wanted to tell you how sorry I am I was rude to you last night, and you needn't be vexed with me, for I am so wretched and——"

Her utterance was impeded by tears.

"There, there, my dear," said Mr. Hartington, "you mustn't cry. Don't you know that you and I are always good friends, whatever you say to me? I was a little hurt and surprised that you showed no confidence in me, but that is all over now, and I daresay I was a meddling fool."

"But you're not, and I want to tell you everything. You are the kindest friend we have."

Mr. Hartington removed his great coat, and seated himself comfortably in front of the fire.

"Now for this woeful tale," he said.

"You know how fond Frank was of me and I of him, and we were to have been married so soon, and everything was ready—my trousseau, and that beautiful house, and the wedding presents, and the wedding cake."

"By the way, I brought you a bracelet from town. I am still in hopes I may give it."

"Thank you, but that is impossible. We have had a quarrel of such a nature that nothing can ever set it right."

"What about?"

"We went to a party and Major Cowper was very attentive, and I danced twice running with him and Frank was angry. And when he found fault I said I should dance with whoever I pleased and as many times as I pleased, and he said I shouldn't, but I was angry too, and so I danced six times running after that with Major Cowper, and then the party was over. And Frank came to me in the grounds looking white with rage, and he said I had no love for him, and called me a flirt, and I lost my temper and told him that I cared nothing about him and never had cared. But it wasn't true, Mr. Hartington, for I loved him with my whole heart, only my temper got the better of me."

"Frank came to me in the grounds and called me a flirt."

Mr. Hartington looked very grave and said nothing. Edith continued:

"And he said that if I had never cared for him, I was the falsest woman that ever lived, both in word and deed, and that he cared nothing about me, and that as I had held him up to public contempt by showing everyone that I preferred Major Cowper to him, he would show everyone that all was over between us, and that nothing would induce him to have anything more to do with me, although our banns had been read. And then these dreadful bills came out, showing everyone that he was thoroughly reckless, or all that lovely furniture would not go for a shilling. Oh, Mr. Hartington, can't you buy it?"

"Never mind the furniture. I must say I think you were greatly to blame, and he was a fool. But do I understand you to say that you love him still?"

"Yes, I never cared for anyone else, and I don't like Major Cowper one bit, and I don't know what came over me that night. But don't tell me you 'hope it will be a lesson' to me."

"I am sure I shall not do that."

"Thank you. If people only knew how very much more effectual a lesson is if applied by oneself than if pointed out by other people, I am sure they would not do it. Nothing enrages either children or grown-up people so much as having things 'pointed out' to them or so effectually destroys any good that might be done."

"I quite agree with you."

"Can anything be done about this wretched business?" asked Mr. Ormside in the hall, as Mr. Hartington was going away. "We wished you to see Edith alone, in the hope that you might set matters straight, but I must say I consider Gower's behaviour scandalous."

"And I Edith's," said Mrs. Ormside. "Anyone can see that he was beside himself with wounded pride and love when he had those placards out."

"I will do all I can," said Mr. Hartington, "but each of them has done all he and she can to wound one another. The difficulty of the case lies in the publicity that has been given to it."

The next day he called on Mr. Gower.

"Frank," he said earnestly, "put a stop to this farce, I beg. Have the bills of your sale removed, and make it up with Edith. I have been to see her, and I know positively that she loves you and always has done so. She is very unhappy."

"Let her be unhappy," returned Frank, moodily. "I am very unhappy also. I loved her with a great love, but I don't love her now. I wouldn't, unless she could prove to me as publicly that she loved me as she put me to shame publicly. But that she can't do, and I have done with her."

"She told me with tears in her eyes that she loved you. I will stake my life she spoke the truth."

"Then she told a lie before. I have done with her."

According to promise Mr. Hartington communicated the result of this interview to Edith. For a moment her spirit was roused.

"He seems to forget how publicly he has put me to shame," she said, but nevertheless Frank's words "unless she could prove to me publicly that she loved me," rang in her ears, and would not go from her.

Mr. Gower went to London, the days dragged slowly on.

"Can't you stop that sale, Sampson," said Mr. Hartington, "as Gower is away?"

"Can't!" replied the auctioneer, "my professional reputation is involved. I can't do it without directions from Mr. Gower."

* * * * *

Christmas Day was fast approaching; everyone, it seemed to Edith, was happy and joyous except herself. She spent her days in absolute seclusion, and the talk of Gresham increased as the day for the sale drew near. She saw no hope for herself, although she had put her pride on one side and resolved that she would take advantage of any opening that might present itself. Suddenly an idea occurred to her, which caused her cheeks to glow. She sent for Mr. Hartington in hot haste, and communicated her thoughts.

"But would you like to do such a thing as that?" he asked in amazement.

"No," she replied, "it would be dreadful to me to do it, but it is the only way. Frank is so terribly proud, and I can't think of anything else. You know he has sworn this sale shall take place."

Mr. Hartington departed, reflecting on the wonderful ways of women. Edith's scheme was most objectionable to him, and yet he, too, saw no other way open. To Mr. Sampson he went and held a conversation with him.

"I haven't the smallest right to do what you suggest," said the auctioneer, "but for old friendship's sake I will, though probably Gower will knock me down."

"Let him," said Mr. Hartington, "and I'll knock him down afterwards."

Mr. Sampson telegraphed to Mr. Gower that he entirely declined to perform the sale unless he himself were present in the house. Mr. Gower telegraphed in reply that he would be on the spot.

He had his arm round Edith and had taken her away.

CHAPTER III.

Gone.

Christmas Eve opened bright and clear. The air was frosty, but the sun shone. The church bells rang out at eight o'clock for early service and Edith attended, her heart dying within her as she thought of what she had set herself to do at eleven. The projected auction had given great annoyance to the Vicar of Gresham, who had remonstrated both with Mr. Gower and Mr. Sampson, to no effect.

"Surely the auction could have been held another day than Christmas Eve," said the Vicar. "It is a shocking example," for Gresham was a very High Church-town.

"I can't help it," said Mr. Sampson.

"But you could have helped it," retorted the Vicar, angry at the postponement of the wedding. A great number of families attended church at eleven, but shortly before that hour Mr. Gower's elegant house was filled with brokers, auctioneers, men, and all the young men of the neighbourhood, who had assembled in a body to see the fun. The furniture was not disturbed; as it was to be sold intact there was no occasion to touch it, said Mr. Sampson, whose rostrum was placed in the large dining-room. He himself looked anxious, and listened with disfavour to the jokes that were freely circulating about Mr. Gower and his affairs.

Meantime Mr. Hartington was with Mr. Gower.

"Tom," said the latter, "I have woke up to the fact that I have made a great ass of myself by this sale, but I can't stop it now."

"You can't," assented his friend.

"I was so madly in love with her that I was wild with rage when she provoked me, and I would have done anything. It's too late to help it now."

"It is too late," again assented his friend.

"I have sometimes thought since I have been in London that she must have cared for me. I wish she did now."

"Will this prove to you that she does?" asked Mr. Hartington, joyfully, and speaking a few further words very rapidly.

"It's impossible," said Mr. Gower.

"It's not impossible; it's true. Come along now and see."

"Come this moment," returned Frank, with excitement; "what are you delaying about? She can't do such a thing for love of me, after my conduct about the sale. Come, how slow you are; the sale will be over unless you make haste. Make haste," he said, rushing from the house.

"I don't think the sale will be over," said Mr. Hartington drily.

* * * * *

The sale was about to commence, groups of expectant brokers were standing about, prepared at any loss to assert their right to the first bid.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Sampson, "you are all aware that this sale is one of an unusual character. You are all aware that for a houseful of new and elegant furniture to go for the sum of one shilling to the first bidder is a very extraordinary thing. But there is a condition attached to the sale, a most serious condition."

The faces of the brokers grew grave.

"That condition, gentlemen, renders it useless for any married man to make the bid."

The faces of the brokers fell, for they were all married men.

"Briefly, a young lady must accompany the furniture; he who buys it must wed her. Before I receive your bid, I will produce her."

He left the room. Breathless silence followed disturbed shortly by the hurried entrance of two gentlemen, who placed themselves at the further end of the room.

"It's a shame, makin' this condition and deceivin' us into comin' here Christmas Eve and all," said a portly broker.

"Silence!" shouted someone, as the door opened and Mr. Sampson appeared leading a very lovely girl dressed in white.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Sampson, "this is the young lady."

All eyes were fixed on Edith Ormside, who stood still as a statue, her colour high, her head slightly bent.

Mr. Sampson mounted his rostrum.

"Now," he said, looking towards the end of the room, "who bids?"

"I do," shouted Frank Gower in a voice of thunder, before anyone else could speak, and before the scene had been well taken in by the audience he had his arm round Edith and had taken her away.

"The lesson has been a severe one, but it has been effectually learnt, Frank," she said.

* * * * *

Service was over at the Parish Church, and yet the congregation kept their seats, for a wedding party was coming up the aisle, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Ormside, Edith, Mr. Hartington and Mr. Gower. The clergy returned to the chancel, and Christmas-time saw Frank and Edith man and wife. But to this hour the good people of Gresham are mystified. H. F. Curfett.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Knight of the Golden Chain," by R. D. Chetwode, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. H. E. Luck, 19 Cleveland Road, Chichester. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 19th. Post-cards only, please.

Not Quite the Same Thing.

"I'll admit this much," said an English trooper to a Boer he had captured, "you fellows have got plenty of grit."

"Yes," said the Boer looking pleased, "we're pretty brave, aren't we?"

"Oh, you don't understand," said the soldier. "I'm referring to the grit in those German shells of yours; they're full of sand, you know, that's why they won't burst."

A Hint to the Weather Prophet.

He entered the meteorological service office and said in his jerky way:

"This ere's where you give out weather predictions, ain't it?"

The clerk nodded.

"Well," continued the old man, "I thought as how I would come up and give you some tips."

"Yes," said the clerk politely.

"Yes. I've figured on it a little, an' I find that ye ain't always right."

"No, we sometimes make mistakes."

"Course you do. We all do sometimes. Now, I was thinkin' as how a line that used to be on the auction hand-bills down in our county might do fust-rate on your weather predictions and save you a lot of explainin'."

"What was the line?"

"Wind an' weather permittin'."

He went down without waiting to say good-bye.

Rebuking "President Kruger."

On a train pulling up for a short stop at our local station recently, a fringe-whiskered cleric began to overhaul the publications on an attendant newsboy's tray; but, after looking at all the war illustrations and deliberately enjoying a literary feast in Short Stories, he calmly declined to buy anything.

For a few moments the lad was speechless with disgust, then, with all the withering sarcasm at his command, and to the intense delight of a number of onlookers, he loudly remarked:

"Beggin' yur pardon, President Kruger, I thought everybody knew I wos sellin' these books an' papers, but it seems that you've taken me fer a bloomin' walkin' free library!"

Not Flattering to Tennyson.

Dante Rossetti used to tell a story of Tennyson, with whom he was walking one sultry summer night through High Holborn. They passed a building brilliantly lighted up, and from which issued the sounds of joyous music.

"What is that place?" asked the bard.

"It is called," replied Rossetti, "the Holborn Casino."

"I should like to look in," pursued Tennyson, "only I should be at once surrounded by a crew of groundlings who would mob and pester and jostle me."

"My dear sir," quietly remarked Rossetti, "if you were to get on one of the tables, announce your name, and recite three of your poetic masterpieces into the bargain, probably not two per cent. of the audience would have the slightest idea who you were!"

Pat the Jarvey.

I know a remarkably pretty woman, who lives in the suburbs of Belfast.

One day she went into Belfast for a day's shopping.

Arriving at the first car stand, and having selected a tolerably clean vehicle, said to the driver that she "wanted to engage him for the day."

Poor Pat, never backward in paying homage to beauty, earnestly replied:

"Oh, ma'am, I only wish it was for life."

Sorry for the Sinners.

A little girl was graciously permitted one bright Sunday to go with her mamma to hear papa preach. It was a time of great rejoicing and responsibility, and the little face was all alight with happy anticipation.

Now, it chanced that on this special occasion papa's sermon was of the "warning" order, and his earnest voice rang out solemnly in the Sunday quiet. After a moment of breathless surprise and horror, the little listener's soul was wrought upon with a great pity for the poor mortals upon whom so much wrath was descending.

She rose excitedly to her feet, and her wide reproachful eyes just peeping over the back of the seat, called out in sweet, chiding tones:

"What for is you scolding all the people so, papa?"

Putting Tags on Dogs.

THERE was a certain master of foxhounds in one of the English shires who was greatly angered by the awkwardness of one of the gentlemen, who invariably rode over the hounds.

At one of the meets, the M.F.H. rode up to the awkward hunter, and, in the most chilling tones, remarked:

"Mr. So-and-So, there are two dogs in the pack to-day, Snap and Tatters, of whom I am especially fond, and I would esteem it a favour if you would avoid killing or maiming them with your horse's hoofs."

"Certainly, my dear fellow," replied Mr. So-and-So, "but as I do not know them, will you be kind enough to put tags on them for me?" C. J.

A Cheap Way of Getting Doctor's Advice.

A GOOD story has just been told by a family doctor regarding a little ruse adopted by one of his patients who wished to save the expense of consulting him.

The patient was a woman of good means, but of frugal disposition. One day she began to feel some alarm regarding her health, and wishing to avoid a costly procedure, made an application to a life insurance company for a policy of large amount—so large, indeed, that they delegated three medical men to make an exhaustive examination of her before they could accept her as a risk.

In due time she was informed that her life had been accepted. She was thus in a position to assume that she was quite well, whereupon she replied to the company that she had changed her mind, and did not intend to take out a policy just then. A. B.

Quite Natural.

A STORY is told of an Oxford undergraduate who had been requested to entertain a party of London costermongers, and who had been advised by his friends working in the East-end to be "perfectly natural" in his conversation.

At breakfast he was very nervous, but at last managed to say:

"Ahem! aha! er-r-r-r-r. Many people in town just now?"

"Yus, gov'ner. About five million," was a coster's quick answer.

The host gave up trying to be "natural" after that. P. T.

A Choice of Three Things.

AUSTRALIAN judges make jokes that would hardly pass muster on this side of the equator. One of them recently going on circuit arrived at a town where a clean charge-sheet was presented for his acceptance, accompanied, of course, with the inevitable pair of white gloves. Having accepted the gift, he returned thanks in these terms:

"This proves that either the district possesses an unusually high standard of morality, or that there is nothing in it worth stealing, or that the police are not active enough to catch criminals."

Leaving his hearers in doubt as to which of the three alternatives he personally favoured, the judge smiled sweetly at the local head of the police force, and retired from the bench. W. S.

A TALE OF THE FIGHT FOR AFRICA.

BRITON OR BOER?

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

WILL COMMENCE IN . . .

SHORT STORIES

. . . DATED FEBRUARY 24TH.

For Further Particulars see Next Week.

For years past Britain and the Transvaal have been spoiling for a fight, and it was left to that well-known author, Mr. George Griffith, to write a strong and exciting serial nearly four years ago graphically describing a huge war between the two countries.

Now that Briton and Boer are in deadly conflict it will be interesting to read the story, and see how far the imagination of the author has actually come true.

BRITON OR BOER?

deals with how the countries fought out their final fight for the possession of the richest region of the earth and one of the fairest portions of the British Empire.

The crack of the rifle and the scream of the shell will echo in the readers' ears from the rock-walls of the kopjes where the Boers lie hidden with their deadly rifles in wait for their foes.

The secret plottings of scheming politicians for the ruin of England will be laid bare and vividly contrasted with the deeds of heroism which confounded them. It will tell how Valour and Devotion grappled with Treason and Treachery, and how the murders of Bronkhorst Spuit were avenged and the shame of Majuba Hill wiped out.

Its chief characters will not be fictions of the imagination, but life-pictures of the very men who at that moment were on the one side plotting and scheming for the destruction of British power in Africa, and on the other fighting gallantly to uphold it.

It will show how those who were crying peace were in reality sharpening the sword in secret, and how that sword, drawn by stealth to stab in the dark, was blunted and broken in the inevitable day of battle.

Mr. George Griffith says: "In the romance of which the first chapters will be published in SHORT STORIES dated February 24th, I have attempted to answer in the form of an essay in prophetic fiction the question which forms the title of the story: 'Is the Briton or the Boer, the Englishman or the Dutch-Afrikander, going to rule South Africa?'"

THE GHOST OF THE "PENGUIN."

For more than a week the Penguin had lain at anchor in the little harbour at Bastia. She was a small schooner, a weather-beaten lubberly craft with her yards splintered and one of her masts broken, yet she looked strangely picturesque, standing with bare poles against the flaming sky, as I allowed my little boat to drift before the gentle breeze.

Aboard the craft there were no signs of life visible, and I knew that Muggins must be ashore, filling himself with rum, as was his custom when Captain Darke was absent.

My old friend, the captain, had been beating about the Mediterranean with his lubberly schooner for half-a-score of years; and so he might still have been engaged but for the arrival of a letter at Bastia telling him of a newly-inherited fortune left him by an uncle who had been living in Florence.

But upon receipt of the good news he was off at once, leaving his disabled schooner in charge of Muggins, an old sailor who was more honest than sober.

As my boat drifted alongside the Penguin I perceived a rope trailing over the port side, and, making my little craft fast, I drew myself up on deck.

I looked about me, but no one was visible. It was evident that I was the only soul aboard the Penguin.

I threw myself on a camp-stool in the shadows of the sail, and fell to regarding the range of dark hills that rose at the back of the romantic little city. Presently I was interrupted by the sound of oars, and a few moments later Muggin's tawny head appeared over the rail. He started when he saw me, and was about to beat a hasty retreat, when my voice stopped him.

"Bless me, I thought you were a ghost, I did, by the powers!" he said, seeming well pleased that his fears had not been realised.

"Well, now, what the dickens is there about me, Muggins, to make you think me a ghost?" I asked.

"Oh, it isn't that you look like a ghost, Mr. Raymond," he returned apologetically. "But, you see, when a chap is looking to see a ghost, he's pretty certain to take the first live thing his eyes fall on for what he's looking for."

"Then you were expecting to see something of the supernatural kind?"

"That's a fact, Mr. Raymond, though 'tain't often a chap is believed when he tells such a story. There's a ghost on this old hulk, or else I'm losing my eyesight."

"And you really believe in such nonsense?"

"I believe what I sees that's all."

"What did you see?"

"Well, since you ask, I don't mind telling you. You see, since Captain Darke went away and the crew were discharged, the Penguin has been under my care, and I have been sleeping aboard this vessel and spending most of my time here. Last night, about two o'clock, I woke, thinking I heard something moving near me. I was sleeping in my cot on the deck, and as I looks about me I sees a woman, all in white, moving like a spectre right by the hatchway.

"While I was watching, it seemed to sink into the deck and disappear. I'm not the man to run from a single night-prowler, but I felt queer-like at this, and can't see how a woman could be on the Penguin. Thinking she might have gone down the companion-ladder, I goes down with a lantern but finds nothing. Then I looks over the ship, with the same result. I slept no more that night, and though I look after the ship, during the day, I shan't sleep here again if I know myself, call it ghost or what you will."

With this he picked up a lantern and descended to his boat that lay alongside.

"Then I shall spend the night here, and lay your ghost for you," I said.

"I'll thank you if you will," he returned, "though I'll be blowed if I think you'll do it. Good-night, Mr. Raymond. I'll drop alongside early in the morning and see how you have fared. There's the key of my cabin," he added, tossing the key upon deck. "You'll find pipes and plenty of 'bacco, and a sip of rum in a decanter, if you look close. Now again, good night to you."

His oars dipped in to the water, and he was gone.

Dusk was already settling over the water. I took a seat on the deck and lit a cigar, and began running over in my mind some of the events that had befallen me since my arrival in Corsica.

For more than three months I had been staying in the romantic little island, finding a restful charm in its quiet seclusion that was a pleasing contrast to the life I had been spending for the past two years in the gay capital of the restless and pleasure-loving French.

One is not likely to expect to meet with adventures of the thrilling kind in the peaceful precincts of Bastia, yet something bordering upon this had come to my lot less than a month before.

For the amateur artist the quaint little city will furnish many subjects for the pencil and brush, and I had made good my opportunities since my arrival.

The most prized among my collection was the portrait of Veda, the little Corsican fruitseller. There was something fascinating in her very pose, and the dark beauty of her face had drawn me to her as if by some subtle witchery.

One evening, as I was strolling through the streets, I heard a cry of mortal terror come from the court of a ruined building where several poor families had taken their abode, and entering hastily, I perceived an aged woman, a withered hag, with uplifted knife, in the act of striking a girl who was crouched in the corner of the wall.

I struck the knife aside, and the would-be murderess fled, leaving me face to face with Veda, the intended victim.

She only paused a moment to press a kiss upon my hand, then she slipped through a gap in the wall and was gone. That was the last I had seen of her.

To my inquiries regarding her whereabouts I received no information, excepting a bit of her past history, which told me that she had belonged to a wealthy and influential family, and that she had received a finished education. But reverses had come. Her father had fallen a victim to a dreadful vendetta, and she had finally been left a penniless orphan.

I was deeply interested in her, but no one could give me the slightest clue as to whither she had fled.

Still I had lingered about the places where I used to see her. Was I in love with the little Corsican beauty?

Her face would come before my mental vision asleep or waking, bringing a sweet sensation I had never before experienced; and yet I tried to dismiss her from my thoughts.

I sat smoking for some hours upon the deck of the Penguin, watching the yellow lights dancing in the romantic little city, and drinking in the fresh, sweet air of the night that stole up from the Mediterranean.

It was about eleven o'clock when I stretched myself upon the cot which Muggins had placed upon the deck. I fell asleep soon after, and dreamed of Muggins' ghost.

It seemed that some strange presence came to me—a woman, beautiful beyond any dream; and just as I reached out to touch her she vanished, leaving only a faint odour of some strange sweet perfume. I awoke suddenly with that inexplicable sensation that sometimes tells us of the unseen presence of another.

I sat up and looked about me in vague bewilderment. The moon had risen out of the sea, and was flooding the deck with its mellow radiance.

As my mind grew more composed I detected a subtle perfume on the night air—the same that had come to me in my dream.

Was it only the effect of my imagination? No; there could be no mistake as to its reality. Something white lay at my feet. I picked it up. It was a delicate piece of lace-embroidered linen, and exhaled the breath of perfume that had before greeted my senses.

While I stood bewildered at the amazing circumstance I perceived a white form emerge from the hatchway and move forward with a slow, gliding movement.

I stood speechless, staring at the strange figure, the words of the superstitious Muggins coming with sudden force to my mind; and in spite of my utter disbelief in the sailor's absurd story, something like a feeling of awe came over me.

I stood immovable, watching the figure as it came towards me. As it drew near I perceived that it was a girl, and as the moonbeams fell on the pale face I recognised it as belonging to Veda Dorlos, the little fruitseller.

Her eyes were wide open, and staring vacantly ahead in a way peculiar to a somnambulist. She was a sleepwalker! The thought came to me like a flash. Yet what could account for her presence aboard the Penguin?

Without attempting to solve the puzzle, I started towards the figure; but, as I did so, the sound of something like the dropping of an oar in a boat came from over the port. Then a moment later the dark figure of a woman—the same I had seen making the assault on the little fruit seller—slipped noiselessly over the rail. She paused for but a moment to glance about the ship; then, with a cry of rage that might have proceeded from some wild animal in deadly combat, she leaped upon the unconscious girl, the blade of a long knife glinting in the light of the moon. Roused to action by the sight of the murderous intruder, I leaped quickly forward, and before the knife descended to do its deadly work, I caught the hand that held it

But if I reckoned on an easy victory in subduing my adversary, I soon discovered my mistake for the woman though aged to all appearances, seemed to possess the strength of the strongest man, and, finding herself foiled in her murderous attempt, she turned upon me with the fierceness of a panther. Coming unexpected as the attack did, it caught me off my guard, and before I realised my peril, the hand that held the knife was wrenched from my grasp; then there was a swift blow. I felt a keen pain in my shoulder as the blade entered, then a mist gathered before my eyes, and I sank unconscious upon the deck.

* * * * *

When my senses returned it was broad daylight, and I was lying on a cot in Muggin's cabin, the beautiful but troubled face of Veda bending over me.

It was a week before I was able to go ashore, and though I had a trained nurse from Bastia, Veda refused to leave me entirely in the hands of another.

Well, in that week I learned to love the little Corsican beauty with such an intense devotion that I could not bear the thought of a separation.

Her life had been one of trials and misfortunes. The old hag who had twice sought the life of Veda was prevented from taking my life by the timely arrival of Muggins, who had come over to the vessel in his boat just before daybreak to see how I was faring. Finding herself thwarted, she leaped into the bay, and was drowned before she could be rescued by Muggins.

She was the last of the Boralodo family, between whom and the Dorlos a dreadful vendetta had existed, and it was to escape the vengeance of the old woman that Veda had stowed herself aboard the Penguin, hoping to be carried to some foreign land and thus escape the violent death that constantly threatened her.

Veda and I were married, and a month later were enjoying our honeymoon on board the Penguin with my old friend Captain Darke, who had returned and had the vessel repaired.

Muggins was much elated over the happy ending of my attempt to "lay" his ghost, though he always declared I had made a most lucky failure, and instead of laying the ghost, I had myself been layed by it. H. T. H.

THE ANGEL OF THE REVOLUTION

By GEORGE GRIFFITH

CHAPTER LXVIII.

THE JUDGMENT OF NATAS.

THE myriad-voiced chorus of the Song of the Revolution ended in a mighty shout of jubilant hurrahs, in the midst of which the Ariel dropped lightly to the earth, and Tremayne, dressed now in the grey uniform of the Federation, with a small red rosette on the left breast of his tunic, descended from her deck to the ground with a drawn sword in his hand.

He was at once recognised by several of the leaders, and as the words "The Chief, the Chief," ran from lip to lip, those in the front ranks brought their rifles to the present, while the captains saluted with their swords. The British regulars and volunteers followed suit as if by instinct, and the chorus of cheers broke out again. Tremayne acknowledged the salute and raised his hand to command silence.

A hush at once fell upon the assembled multitude, and in the deep silence of anticipation which followed, he said in clear, ringing tones:

"Soldiers of the Federation and the Empire, that which I hope will be the last battle of the Western nations has been fought and won. The Anglo-Saxon race has rallied to the defence of its motherland, and in the blood of its invaders has wiped out the stain of conquest. It has met the conquerors of Europe in arms, and on the field of battle it has vindicated its right to the empire of the world.

"Henceforth the destinies of the human race are in its keeping, and it will worthily discharge the responsibility. It may yet be necessary for you to fight other battles with other races; but the victory that has attended you here will wait upon your arms elsewhere, and then the curse and the shame of war will be removed from the earth, let us hope for ever. European despotism has fought its last battle and lost, and those who have appealed to the sword shall be judged by the sword."

As he said this, he pointed with his weapon towards the Tsar and his staff, and continued, with an added sternness in his voice:

"In the Master's name, take those men prisoners! Their fate will be decided to-morrow. Forward a company of the First Division; your lives will answer for theirs!"

As the Chief ended his brief address to the victorious troops, ten men, armed with revolver and sword stepped forward, each followed by ten others armed with rifle and fixed bayonet, and immediately formed in a hollow square round the Tsar and his staff. This summary proceeding proved too much for the outraged dignity of the fallen Autocrat, and he stepped forward and cried out passionately:

"What is this? Is not my surrender enough? Have we not fought with civilised enemies that we are to be treated like felons in the hour of defeat?"

Tremayne raised his sword and cried sharply, "To the ready!" and instantly the prisoners were encircled by a hedge of levelled bayonets and rifle-barrels charged with death. Then he went on, in stern, commanding tones:

"Silence there! We do not recognise what you call the usages of civilised warfare. You are criminals against humanity, assassins by wholesale, and as such you shall be treated."

There was nothing for it but to submit to the indignity, and within a few minutes the Tsar and those who with him had essayed the enslavement of the world, were lodged in separate rooms in the building under a strong guard to await the fateful issue of the morrow.

The rest of the night was occupied in digging huge trenches for the burial of the almost innumerable dead, a task which, gigantic as it was, was made light by the work of hundreds of thousands of willing hands. Those of the invaders who had fallen in London itself were taken down the Thames on the ebb tide in fleets of lighters, towed by steamers, and were buried at sea. Happily it was mid-winter, and the temperature remained some degrees below freezing point, and so the great City was saved from what in summer would infallibly have brought pestilence in the track of war.

At twelve o'clock on the following day the vast interior of St. Paul's Cathedral was thronged with the anxious spectators of the last scene in the tremendous tragedy which had commenced with the destruction of Kronstadt by the Ariel and which had culminated in the triumph of Anglo-Saxondom over the leagued despotism of Europe.

At a long table draped with red cloth, and placed under the dome in front of the chancel steps, sat Natas, with Tremayne and Natasha on his right hand, and Arnold and Alexis Mazanoff on his left. Radna, Anna Ornovsky, and the other members of the Inner Circle of the Terrorists, including the President, Nicholas Roburoff, who had been pardoned and restored to his office at the intercession of Natasha, occupied the other seats, and behind them stood a throng of leaders of the Federation forces.

Neither the King of England nor any of his Ministers or military officers were present, as they had no voice in the proceedings which were about to take place. It had been decided, at a consultation with them earlier in the day, that it would be better that they should be absent.

That which was to be done was unparalleled in the history of the world and outside the recognised laws of nations; and so their prejudices were respected, and they were spared what they might have looked upon as an outrage of international policy and the ancient but mistaken traditions of so-called civilised warfare.

In front of the table two double lines of Federation soldiers, with rifles and fixed bayonets, kept a broad clear passage down to the western doors of the Cathedral. The murmur of thousands of voices suddenly hushed as the Cathedral clock struck the first stroke of twelve. It was the knell of an empire and a despotism. At the last stroke Natas raised his hand and said:

"Bring up the prisoners!"

There was a quick rustling sound mingled with the clink of steel as the two grey lines stiffened up to attention. Twelve commanders of divisions marched with drawn swords down to the end of the nave, a few rapid orders were given, and then they returned heading two double files of Federation guards, between which, handcuffed like common felons, walked the once mighty Tsar and the ministers of his now departed tyranny.

The footsteps of the soldiers and their captives rang clearly upon the stones in the ominous breathless silence which greeted their appearance. The fallen autocrat and his servants walked with downcast heads like men in a dream, for to them it was a dream, this sudden and incomprehensible catastrophe which had overwhelmed them in the very hour of victory, and on the threshold of the conquest of the world.

Three days ago they had believed themselves conquerors, with the world at their feet, now they were being marched guarded and in shackles, to a tribunal which acknowledged no law but its own, and from whose decision there was no appeal. Truly it was a dream, such a dream of disaster and calamity as no earthly despot had ever dreamt before.

Four paces from the table they were halted, the Tsar in the centre facing his unknown judge, and his servants on either side of him. He recognised Natasha, Anna Ornovsky, Arnold, and Tremayne, but the recognition only added to his bewilderment.

He thought, in a dazed sort of fashion, of the ball at the British Embassy in St. Petersburg, and of the first trial of the war-balloon in the Gatschina Park, and of the breast-pin that he had given the young English engineer who had so strangely escaped the death prepared for him, and of the mysterious way in which the jewel had been returned to him.

In the supreme hour of his fate it was these comparative trifles that were uppermost in his mind. To the millions who had fallen in battle since then he gave no thought; their lives were but as counters in the mighty game that he had played and lost.

There was a slight flush on the face of Natas, and an angry gleam in his dark magnetic eyes as he watched his captives approach, but when he spoke his tones were calm and passionless, the tones of the conqueror and the judge, rather than of the deeply injured man and the personal enemy. As the prisoners were halted in front of the table and the rifle-butts of the guards rang sharply on the stone pavement, so deep a hush fell upon the vast throng in the Cathedral that men seemed to hold their breath rather than break it until the Master of the Terror began to speak.

"Alexander Romanoff, late Tsar of the Russians, and now prisoner of the executive of the Brotherhood of Freedom, otherwise known to you as the Terrorists—you have been brought here with your advisers and the ministers of your tyranny that your crimes may be recounted in the presence of this congregation, and to receive sentence of such punishment as it is possible for human justice to mete out to you——"

"I deny both your justice and your right to judge. It is you who are the criminals, conspirators, and enemies of Society. I am a crowned King and above all earthly laws——"

Before he could say any more two bayonets crossed in front of him with a sharp clash, and he was instantly thrust back into his place.

"Silence!" said Natas, in a tone of such stern command that even he instinctively obeyed. "As for our justice, let that be decided between you and me when we stand before a more awful tribunal than this. My right to judge even a crowned King who has no longer a crown, rests, as your own authority and that of all earthly rulers has ever done, upon the power to enforce my sentence, and I can and will enforce it upon you, you heir of a usurping murderess, whose throne was founded in blood and supported by the bayonets of her hired assassins. You have appealed to the arbitration of battle, and it was decided against you; you must therefore abide by its decision.

"You have waged a war of merciless conquest at the bidding of insatiable ambition. You have posed as the peace-keeper of Europe until the train of war was laid, as you and your allies thought, in secret, and then you let loose the forces of havoc upon your fellow-men without ruth or scruple. Your path of victory has been traced in blood and flames from one end of Europe to the other; you have sacrificed the lives of millions, and the happiness of millions more, to a dream of world-wide empire, which, if realised, would have been a universal despotism.

"The blood of the uncounted slain cries out from earth to heaven against you for vengeance. The days are past when those who made war upon their kind could claim the indulgence of their conquerors. You have been conquered by those who hold that the crime of aggressive war cannot be atoned for by the transfer of territory or the payment of money.

"If this were your only crime we would have blood for blood, and life for life, as far as yours could pay the penalty. But there is more than this to be laid to your charge, and the swift and easy punishment of death would be too light an atonement for Justice to accept.

"Since you ascended your throne you have been as the visible shape of God in the eyes of a hundred million subjects. Your hands have held the power of life and death, of freedom and slavery, of happiness and misery. How have you used it, you who have arrogated to yourself the attributes of a vicegerent of God on earth? As the power is so too is the responsibility, and it will not avail you now to shelter yourself from it behind the false traditions of diplomacy and statecraft.

"Your subjects have starved while you and yours have feasted. You have lavished millions in vain display upon your palaces while they have died in their hovels for lack of bread, and when men have asked you for freedom and justice you have given them the knout, the chain, and the prison.

"You have parted the wife from her husband——"

Here for the moment the voice of Natas trembled with irrepressible passion, which, before he could proceed, broke from his heaving breast in a deep sob that thrilled the vast assembly like an electric shock, and made men clench their hands and grit their teeth, and wrung an answering sob from the breast of many a woman who knew but too well the meaning of those simple yet terrible words. Then Natas recovered his outward composure and went on; but now there was an angrier gleam in his eyes, and a fiercer ring in his voice.

"You have parted the wife from her husband, the maid from her lover, the child from its parents. You have made desolate countless homes that once were happy, and broken hearts that had no thought of evil towards you—and you have done all this, and more, to maintain as vile a despotism as ever insulted the justice of men, or mocked at the mercy of God.

"In the inscrutable working of Eternal Justice it has come to pass that your sentence shall be uttered by the lips of one of your victims. For no offence known to the laws of earth or Heaven, my flesh has been galled by your chains and torn by your whips. I have toiled to win your ill-gotten wealth in your mines, and by the hands of your brutal servants the iron has entered into my soul. Yet I am but one of thousands whose undeserved agony cries out against you in this hour of judgment.

"Can you give us back what you have taken from us—the years of life, and health, and happiness, our wives and our children, our lovers and our kindred? You have ravished, but you cannot restore. You have smitten, but you cannot heal. You have killed, but you cannot make alive again. If you had ten thousand lives they could not atone, though each were dragged out to the bitter end in the misery that you have meted out to others.

"But so far as you and yours can pay the debt it shall be paid to the uttermost farthing. Every pang that you have inflicted you shall endure. You shall drag your chains over Siberian snows, and when you faint by the wayside the lash shall revive you, as in the hands of your brutal Cossacks it has goaded on your fainting victims. You shall sweat in the mine, and shiver in the cell, and your wives and your children shall look upon your misery and be helpless to help you, even as have been the fond one who have followed your victims to exile and death.

"They have seen your crimes without protest, and shared in your wantonness. They have toyed with gold and jewels which they knew were bought with the price of misery and death, and so it is just that they should see your suffering and share in your doom.

"To the mines for life! And when the last summons comes to you and me, may Eternal Justice judge between us, and in its equal scales weigh your crimes against your punishment. Begone! for you have looked your last on freedom. You are no longer men; you are outcasts from the pale of the brotherhood of the humanity you have outraged!

"Alexis Mazanoff, you will hold yourself responsible for the lives of the prisoners, and the execution of their sentence. You will see them in safe keeping for the present, and on the thirtieth day from now you will set out for Siberia."

The sentence of Natas, the most terrible one which human lips could have uttered under the circumstances, was received with a breathless silence of awe and horror. Then Mazanoff rose from his seat, drew his sword, and saluted.

As he passed round the end of the table the guards closed up round the prisoners, who were staring about them in stupefied bewilderment at the incredible horror of the fate which in a moment had hurled them from the highest pinnacle of earthly power and splendour down to the degradation and misery of the most wretched of their own Siberian convicts. No time was given for protest or appeal, for Mazanoff instantly gave the word "Forward!" and, surrounded by a hedge of bayonets, the doomed men were marched rapidly down between the two grey lines.

As they reached the bottom of the nave the great central doors swung open, and through them came a mighty roar of execration from the multitude outside as they appeared on the top of the Cathedral steps.

From St. Paul's Churchyard, down through Ludgate Hill and up the Old Bailey to the black, frowning walls of Newgate, they were led through triple lines of Federation soldiers amidst a storm of angry cries from the crowd on either side, cries which changed to a wild outburst of savage, pitiless exultation as the news of their dreadful sentence spread rapidly from lip to lip. They had shed blood like water, and had known no pity in the hour of their brief triumph, and so none was shown for them in the hour of their fall and retribution.

CHAPTER LXIX.

The Ordering of Europe.

The hour following the disappearance of the Tsar and his ministers from the cathedral was spent in a brief and simple service of thanksgiving for the victory which had wiped the stain of foreign invasion from the soil of Britain in the blood of the invader, and given the control of the destinies of the Western world finally into the hands of the dominant race of earth.

The service began with a brief but eloquent address from Natas, in which he pointed out the consequences of the victory and the tremendous responsibilities to the generations of men in the present and the future which it entailed upon the victors. He concluded with the following words:

"My own part in this world-revolution is played out. For more than twenty years I have lived solely for the attainment of one object, the removal of the blot of Russian tyranny upon European civilisation, and the necessary punishment of those who were guilty of the unspeakable crime of maintaining it at such a fearful expense of life and suffering.

"That object has now been accomplished; the soldiers of freedom have met their hirelings of despotism on the field of the world's Armageddon, and the God of Battles has decided between them. Our motives may have been mistaken by those who only saw the bare outward appearance without knowing their inward intention, and our ends have naturally been misjudged by those who fancied their accomplishment meant their own ruin.

"Yet, as the events have proved, and will yet prove in the ages to come, we have been but as intelligent instruments in the hand of that eternal wisdom and justice which, though it may seem to sleep for a season, and permit the evildoer to pursue his wickedness for a space, never closes the eye of watchfulness or sheaths the sword of judgment. The empire of the earth has been given into the hands of the Anglo-Saxon race, and therefore it is fitting that the supreme control of affair should rest in the hands of one of Anglo-Saxon blood and lineage.

"For that reason I now surrender the power which I have so far exercised as the Master of the Brotherhood of Freedom into the hands of Alan Tremayne, known in Britain as Earl of Alanmere and Baron Tremayne, and from this moment the Brotherhood of Freedom, more commonly known and spoken of as the Terrorists, ceases to exist, for its ends are attained, and the objects for which it was founded have been accomplished.

"With the confidence born of intimate knowledge, I give this power into his keeping, and those who have shared his counsels and executed his commands in the past, will in the future assist him as the Supreme Council, which will form the ultimate tribunal to which the disputes of nations will henceforth be submitted, instead of to the barbarous and bloody arbitration of battle.

"No such power has ever been delivered into the hands of a single body of men before, but those who will hold it have been well tried, and they may be trusted to wield it without pride and without selfishness, the twin curses that have hitherto afflicted the divided nations of the earth, because, with the fate of humanity in their hands, and the wealth of earth at their disposal, it will be impossible to tempt them with bribes, either of riches or power, from the plain course of duty which will lie before them."

As Natas finished speaking he signed with his hand to Tremayne, who rose in his place and briefly addressed the assembly:

"I and those who will share it with me accept alike the power and the responsibility—not of choice but rather because we are convinced that the interests of humanity demand that we should do so. Those interests have too long been the sport of kings and their courtiers, and of those who have seen in selfish profit and aggrandisement the only ends of life worth living for.

"Under the pretences of furthering civilisation and progress and maintaining what they have been pleased to call law and order, they have perpetrated countless crimes of oppression, cruelty, and extortion, and we are determined that this shall have an end.

"Henceforth, so far as we can ensure it, the world shall be ruled not by the selfishness of individuals, or the ambitions of nations, but in accordance with the everlasting and immutable principles of truth and justice, which have hitherto been burlesqued alike by despots on their thrones and by political partisans in the senates of so-called democratic countries.

"To-morrow, at mid-day in this place, the chief rulers of Europe will meet us, and our intentions will be further explained. And now before we separate to go about the rest of the business of the day, let us, as is fitting, give due thanks to Him Who has given us the victory."

He ceased speaking, but remained standing; the same instant the organ of the cathedral pealed out the opening notes of the familiar Normanton Chant, and all those at the table, saving Natas, rose to their feet. Then Natasha's voice soared clear and strong above the organ notes, singing the first line of the chant:

"The strain upraise of joy and praise!"

And as she ceased, the swell of the organ rolled out and a mighty chorus of hallelujahs burst by one consent from the lips of the vast congregation, filling the huge cathedral and flowing out from its now wide-open doors until it was caught up and echoed by the thousands who thronged the churchyard and the streets leading into it.

As this died away Radna sang the second line, and so the Psalm of Praise was sung through, as it were, in strophe and anti-strophe, interspersed with the jubilant hallelujahs of the multitude who were celebrating the greatest victory that had ever been won on earth.

That night the inhabitants of the delivered city gave themselves up to such revelry and rejoicing as had never been seen or heard in London since it foundation. The streets and squares blazed with lights and resounded with the songs and cheerings of a people delivered from an impending catastrophe which had bidden fair to overwhelm it in ruin, and bring upon it calamities which would have been felt for generations.

While these events had been in progress three squadrons of air-ships had been speeding to Petersburg, Vienna, and Rome. Three vessels had been dispatched to each city, and the instructions of those in command of the squadrons were to bring the German Emperor, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Italy to London.

The news of the defeat of the League had preceded them by telegraph, and all three monarchs willingly obeyed the summons which they carried to attend a conference for the ordering of the affairs of Europe.

The German Emperor was at once released from his captivity, although only under a threat of the destruction of the city by the air-ships, for the Grand Duke Vladimir, who ruled at Petersburg as deputy of the Tsar, had at first refused to believe the astounding story of the defeat of his brother and the destruction of his army. The terrible achievements of the air-ships were, however, too well and too certainly known to permit of resistance by force, and so the Kaiser was released, and made his first aerial voyage from Petersburg to London, arriving there at ten o'clock on the evening of the 8th, in the midst of the jubilations of the rejoicing city.

The King of England had sent a despatch to the Emperor of Austria inviting him to the Conference, and General Cosensz had sent a similar one to the King of Italy, and so there had been no difficulty about their coming. At mid-day on the ninth the Conference was opened in St. Paul's, which was the only public building left intact in London capable of containing the vast audience that was present, an audience composed of men of every race and language in Europe.

Natas was absent, and Tremayne occupied his seat in the centre of the table; the other members of the Inner Circle, now composing the Supreme Council of the Federation, were present, with the exception of Natasha, Radna, and Anna Ornovsky, and the other seats at the table were occupied by the monarchs to whom the purposes of the conference had been explained earlier in the day. France was represented in the person of General le Gallifet.

The body of the cathedral was filled to overflowing, with the exception of an open space kept round the table by the Federation guards.

The proceedings commenced with a brief but impressive religious service conducted by the Primate of England, who ended it with a short but earnest appeal delivered from the altar steps to those composing the Conference, calling upon them to conduct their deliberations with justice and moderation, and reminding them of the millions who were waiting in other parts of Europe for the blessings of peace and prosperity which it was now in their power to confer upon them.

As the Archbishop concluded the prayer for the blessing of Heaven upon their deliberations with which he ended his address, Tremayne, after a few moments of silence, rose in his place and, speaking in clear, impressive tones, began as follows:

"Your majesties have been called together to hear the statement of the practical issues of the conflict which has been decided between the armies of the Federation of the Anglo-Saxon peoples and those of the late Franco-Slavonian League.

"Into the motives which led myself and those who have acted with me to take the part which we have done in this tremendous struggle, there is now no need for me to enter. It is rather with results than with motives that we have to deal, and those results may be very briefly stated.

"We have demonstrated on the field of battle that we hold in our hands means of destruction, against which it is absolutely impossible for any army, fortress, or fleet, to compete with the slightest hope of victory; and more than this, we are in command of the largest organised army and fleet now on land or sea. We have been compelled by the necessities of the case to use our powers unsparingly up to a certain point. That we have not used them beyond that point, as we might have done, to enslave the world, is the best proof that I can give of the honesty of our purposes with regard to the future.

"But it must never be forgotten that those powers remain with us, and can be invoked afresh should necessity ever arise. It is not our purpose to enter upon a war of conquest, or upon a series of internal revolutions in the different countries of Europe, the issue of which might be the subversion of all order, and the necessity for universal conquest on our part in order to restore it.

"With two exceptions the internal affairs of all the nations of Europe, saving only Russia, which for the present we shall govern directly, will be left undisturbed. The present tenure of land will be abolished, and the only rights to its possession that will be recognised will be occupation and cultivation. Experience has shown that the holding of land for mere purposes of luxury or speculative profit leads to untold injustices to the general population of a country. The land on which cities and towns are built will henceforth belong to the municipalities, and the rents of the buildings will be paid in lieu of taxation.

"The other exception is even more important than this. We have waged war in order that it may be waged no more, and we are determined that it shall now cease for ever. The people of the various nations have no interest in warfare. It has been nothing but an affliction and a curse to them, and we are convinced that if one generation grows up without drawing the sword, it will never be drawn again as long as men remain upon the earth.

"All existing fortifications will at once be destroyed, standing armies will be disbanded, and all the war-ships in the world, which cannot be used for peaceful purposes, will be sent to the bottom of the deepest part of the ocean.

"For the maintenance of peace and order each nation will support a body of police in which all citizens between the ages of twenty and forty will serve in rotation, and this police will be under the control, first of the Sovereign and Parliament of the country, and ultimately of an International Board, which will sit once a year in each of the capitals of Europe in turn, and from whose decision there will be no appeal.

"The possession of weapons of warfare, save by the members of this force, will be forbidden under penalty of death, as we shall pre-suppose that no man can possess such weapons save with intent to kill, and all killing, save execution for murder, will henceforth be treated as murder.

"Declaration of war by one country upon another will be held to be a national crime, and, should such an event ever occur, the forces of the Anglo-Saxon Federation will be at once armed by authority of the Supreme Council, and the guilty nation will be crushed and its territories will be divided amongst its neighbours.

"Such are the broad outlines of the course which we intend to pursue, and all I have now to do is to commend them to your earnest consideration in the name of those over whom you are the constituted rulers."

As the President of the Federation sat down the German Emperor rose and said in a tone which showed that he had heard the speech with but little satisfaction:

"From what we have heard it would seem that the Federation of the Anglo-Saxon peoples considers itself as having conquered the world, and as being, therefore, in a position to dictate terms to all the peoples of the earth. Am I correct in this supposition?"

Tremayne bowed in silence, and he continued:

"But this amounts to the destruction of the liberties of all peoples who are not of the Anglo-Saxon race. It seems impossible to me to believe that free-born men who have won their liberty upon the battle-field will ever consent to submit to a despotism such as this. What if they refuse to do so?"

Tremayne was on his feet in an instant. He turned half round and faced the Kaiser with a frown on his brow and an ominous gleam in his eyes:

"Your Majesty of Germany may call it a despotism if you choose, but remember that it is a despotism of peace and not of war, and that it affects only those who would be peace-breakers and drawers of the sword upon their fellow-creatures.

"I regret that you have made it necessary for me to remind you that we have conquered your conquerors, and that the despotism from which we have delivered the nations of Europe would infallibly have been ten thousand times worse than that which you are pleased to miscall by the name.

"You deplore the loss of the right and the power to draw the sword one upon another. Well, now, take that right back again for the last time! Say here, and now, that you will not acknowledge the supremacy of the Council of the Federation, and take the consequences.

"Our soldiers are still in the field, our aerial fleet is still in the air, and our sea navy is under steam. But, remember, if you appeal to the sword it shall be with you as it was with Alexander Romanoff and the Russian force which invaded England. We have annihilated the army to a man, and exiled the Autocrat for life. Choose now, peace or war, and let those who would choose war with you take their stand beside you, and we will fight another Armageddon."

The pregnant and pitiless words brought the Kaiser to his senses in an instant. He remembered that his army was destroyed, his strongest fortress dismantled, his treasury empty, and the manhood of his country decimated. He turned white to his lips, and sank back into his chair, covered his face with his hands, and sobbed aloud. And so ended the last and only protest made by the spirit of militarism against the new despotism of peace.

One by one the monarchs now rose in their places, bowed to the inevitable, and gave their informal adherence to the new order of things. General le Gallifet came last. When he had affixed his signature to the written undertaking of allegiance which they had all signed, he said, speaking in French:

"I was born and bred a soldier, and my life has been passed either in warfare or the study of it. I have now drawn the sword for the last time, save to defend France from invasion. I have seen enough of modern war, or, as I should rather call it, murder by machinery, for such it only is now.

"They spoke truly who prophesied that the solution of the problem of aerial navigation would make war impossible. It has made it impossible, because it has made it too unspeakably horrible for humanity to tolerate.

"In token of the honesty of my belief I ask now that France and Germany shall bury their long blood-feud on their last battlefield, and in the persons of his German Majesty and myself shake hands in the presence of this company as a pledge of national forgiveness and perpetual peace."

As he ceased speaking, he turned and held out his hand to the Kaiser. All eyes were turned on William II. to see how he would receive this appeal. For a moment he hesitated, then his manhood and chivalry conquered his pride and national prejudice, and amidst the cheers of the great assembly, he grasped the outstretched hand of his hereditary enemy, saying in a voice broken by emotion:

"So be it. Since the sword is broken for ever, let us forget that we have been enemies, and remember only that we are neighbours."

This ended the Conference. From St. Paul's those who had composed it went to Buckingham Palace, in the grounds of which the aerial fleet was reposing on the lawns under a strong guard of Federation soldiers. Here they embarked, and were borne swiftly through the air to Windsor Castle, where they dined amicably together as friends and guests of the King of England, and after dinner discussed far on into the night the details of the new European Constitution which was to be drawn up and formally ratified within the next few days.

BRITON OR BOER?

A TALE of the FIGHT for AFRICA

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

CHAPTER I.

High Times on the Rand.

It was the fifteenth of December, 1896, and the Rand was holding high revel. Money was flowing like water, as, indeed, it is in the habit of doing in Johannesburg the Golden; but just now it was flowing even more freely than ever, mostly in the form of champagne at twenty-five and thirty shillings a bottle, and whisky and soda at eighteen-pence a time

The New Ophir seemed, in fact, to have gone upon a general spree. Commissioner Street was a scene of intermittent revelry from end to end. Everybody who met anybody else with whom he was ever so slightly acquainted shook hands effusively, and promptly adjourned with him to the nearest bar to have a drink and discuss the great, good news, and drink the Old Man's jolly good health.

From the bar of the Rand Club to the lowest canteen down along the Reef, more liquor was being passed over the counter to the minute than had ever passed before, even when Johannesburg was booming its best. More than this, too, the bars witnessed the strange spectacle of well-dressed, carefully-groomed Outlanders—Englishmen, Americans, and Colonials, hobnobbing with big, ill-clad, shaggy-bearded Boers, shaking hands with them, clapping them on the back, and clinking glasses just as though no such thing as the Reform Committee or the Jameson Raid had ever been heard of.

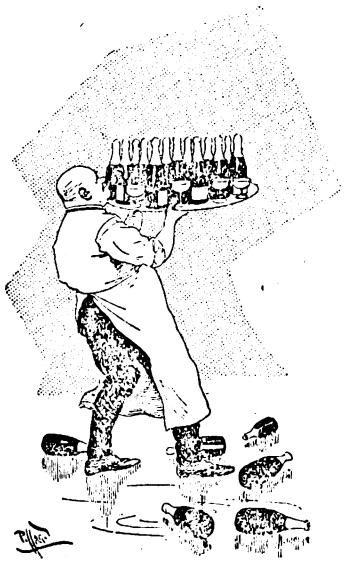
Everybody was the best of friends with everybody else, not an Outlander had a bad word even for Dr. Leyds and the Hollander Ring of monopolists, concessionaires and official peculators which revolved about him.

The space between the Chains was the scene of better and brisker business than had ever been known before, even at the best of times, and men of millions were walking about smiling like the most guileless of seraphs, and giving good things away to all and sundry with a freedom and urbanity that would have made an unsophisticated stranger believe that their principal object in heaping up riches was to have the satisfaction of bestowing a portion of them upon other people.



No one who knew Johannesburg ever so slightly would for a moment dream that such a hard-headed and business-like community would go off into such a fit of genial hysterics as this without adequate cause, and this in the present case was not very far to seek, since everybody was talking about it with a wealth of vocabulary and picturesqueness of expression, even more than usually characteristic of Johannesburg conversation.

To put the matter shortly, the reason for the unrestrained hilarity of the Golden City stood as follows:

Ever since the release of the Reform leaders and the cashing of the little cheques they left behind them when they bade adieu to their gaolers at Pretoria, the President and his government had pursued a policy of conciliation towards the Outlander population which, to the astonishment of the whole world, not only passed the bounds of fairness, but even trenched closely on the borders of generosity. Old offences were forgiven if not forgotten, duties were reduced, taxes had been made lighter, and one or two monopolies had even been abolished; in fact, the Boer lion showed every sign of an honest disposition to lie down with the Outlander lamb without going through the formality of first having the lamb for supper.

And now the climax had been reached and the crowning act of generosity had been accomplished. On the first of December the Volksraad had passed and the Executive had published a decree, duly signed by the President and the Secretary of State, giving the franchise and full burgher rights to every Outlander of full age who had paid his taxes regularly and had owned property to the value of £500 and upwards in the Transvaal for a minimum of three years.

The decree was to come into force on the sixteenth of December (Amajuba Day), and was to be formally proclaimed by the President at the great Annual Independence Festival under the shadow of the monument at Krugersdorp.

There was doubtless a certain amount of irony in the choice of the date, but this was put down to the Boer conception of humour; and as everybody was much too pleased to feel in a critical mood, it was taken as a sort of cumbrous joke such as Oom Paul made when he opened the Jewish Synagogue in Johannesburg with the words: "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ I declare this place of worship open!" and smiled at accordingly.

As a matter of fact, no one, saving only a certain strong, silent man far away in the heart of the Northern wilds and a few irreconcilable cavillers who thought that they could see farther through the fog of Pretorian diplomacy than anybody else, was in any humour to find fault with the situation; and the world at large, and the Little Englanders in particular, drew rhetorical pictures of the good old President in which his grey hairs seemed to be already shining in the light of a halo of saintship.

A chorus of his admirers all the world over arose, asking—nay, almost demanding—that the complete independence of the Transvaal should be acknowledged by the Paramount Power in return for this great act of forgiveness and generosity, and that Great Britain should withdraw the barrier which she had placed between the Boer Republic and its legitimate desire for free access to the sea.

And now, on the eve of Amajuba Day the Rand was celebrating the near approach of its political emancipation with a luxuriant magnificence worthy of a city of millionaires. There was racing on the racecourse; an athletic tournament, followed by a huge garden-party given by the Wanderers' Club, in Kruger's Park; the theatre and the music halls were thrown open free for the night by Mr. Barney Barnato, who bought all the seats in them, and then, in the formula of his early profession, invited the public to "walk up."

Mr. J. B. Robinson arranged for a special service of free trains between Pretoria and Johannesburg. Mr. Alfred Beit, to whom the olive branch of forgiveness had also been extended, capped this by running specials for three days at his own expense from Cape Town and Kimberley. Mr. Solly Joel arranged for a service from Port Elizabeth and Natal, whereupon Mr. Barnato, thinking he was getting left behind, quietly sent a circular-note round the hotels and bars to the effect that he would pay the drink bill of Johannesburg for the evening, and there were those who said that this proved to be the biggest order of all.

The day's festivities, so far as the élite of the Rand society and the haut ton of Pretoria were concerned, wound up with a ball at the Rand Club, the like of which, for brilliancy and splendour, had never been seen in South Africa before.

The club house at the corner of Commissioner Street and Loveday Street came as near to being a roofed-in, walled-off section of Paradise as unlimited money and a somewhat florid taste could make it. Everyone who was anyone was there, saving only the good President himself, who true to the austere principles which had made him refuse an invitation to a State Ball in England on account of the shocking costumes of the ladies, had sent his young and handsome State Secretary to represent him, while he remained to smoke many pipes and indulge in a quiet orgy on coffee on the stoep of his house in Pretoria, now and then exchanging a phrase of ponderous endearment or elphantine sarcasm on the pomps and vanities of the wicked world with Tant' Sanna, and anon lapsing into silent contemplation of great things to come.

Certainly he could have chosen no more acceptable substitute than Doctor Cornelius Leyds, especially in the eyes of the ladies who, with the richness of their costumes, the splendour of their jewels, and in some cases the grace of their forms and the beauty of their faces, gave their chief charm to the gorgeous rooms of the Rand Club.

So far at least as the ladies were concerned—and that after all was everything—he was the lion of the evening. Rumour had credited him, perhaps justly, with having completely abandoned his old hostility to his fellow Outlanders, and with having exerted all his great influence with the President and the Volksraad to secure the generous concession over which Johannesburg was now rejoicing.

And yet, if the truth must be told, the handsome young

Everybody was the best of friends with everybody else.

Secretary had not been a couple of hours in the midst of what not a single newspaper on the Rand could refrain the next morning from calling "the festive scene," before he began to feel a little tired of it.

There was altogether too much gorgeousness to suit his really refined tastes. The scent of the flowers was too strongly blended with artificial perfumes. Too many of the women were in one sense over, and in another, underdressed. There was a lack of genuineness about too many of the complexions. There was too much jewellery and too little taste to please his fastidious judgment. Most of the men's voices were too loud and their diamond studs too big; and altogether there was an aggressive assertion of mere crude wealth that jarred upon him and set him already wishing for the hour at which he could decently take his leave.

He had been standing for some minutes near the top of the big dining saloon which was being used as a ballroom, exchanging views and criticisms on the more interesting personalities of the company with a short, sturdily-built man with a powerful head and a round, good-natured face, lit up by a pair of bright, clever eyes, who looked shorter than he really was in comparison with the Secretary's tall and athletic figure.

He wore several orders on his left breast, and the collar and cross of the Order of Jesus lay snugly on the snowy expanse of his well-glazed shirt-front. This was Baron de Matalha, sometime Portuguese Ambassador, though an Englishman by birth, and one of the astutest diplomatists between the Cape and the Zambesi.

It was getting on towards midnight when the Secretary, smothering a yawn, chanced in the act of doing so to look up towards the door. It happened also at the same moment that the heavy purple velvet curtains which hung over the doorway were drawn aside and a woman entered leaning on the arm of a man.

The Secretary had seen the same thing happen a score of times within the last few minutes, and had hardly noticed it, but now all his ennui vanished in the instant of the first glance, his eye brightened, and a faint flush sprang into his somewhat sallow cheeks. He caught his companion by the arm and said with an eagerness which he took no trouble to conceal:

"Tell me, Baron—you know everybody—who is that? The girl I mean. The man is only interesting because he seems to be her father."

The Baron looked up half quizzically, and with a twinkle in his eyes, for none knew better than he the naturally masculine weakness of Mr. Secretary Leyds for a pretty face, and he did not see why it might not be indulged with no thought of disloyalty to Madame la Secretaire, who, as it happened, was at present away on a six months' tour in Holland and Germany. He rubbed his plump hands softly together, then he said with a quiet little chuckle running through his tones:

"Ah, my dear Doctor, I thought that a look upon the most beautiful face in South Africa would suffice to charm away the boredom, which I see this over-dressed, over-jewelled assembly has been inflicting upon you. I took the liberty of arranging her coming as a little surprise for you just about now, as I knew that an hour or so of this sort of thing would be enough to tire you."

"Ah, then you do know them?" said the Secretary as eagerly as before. "So of course you can introduce me. Who are they?"

"The old gentleman is Prince Paul Regna, a Polish nobleman of very old family, and, curiously enough for a Pole, very considerable fortune. The air of Russian-Poland does not agree with him just now, and he is travelling for his health round the world. In fact, if his fortune were not invested in Paris, he might not have the means of travelling."

"Yes, yes, my dear Baron," said the Secretary with some little impatience. "That's all right, but who is the lady? His daughter or his——"

"No, no, my dear Doctor," said the Baron with one of his blandest smiles. "Not his wife. But excuse me just a moment and you shall know, as I see you wish to know."

With that the Baron trotted off down the room to meet the new comers. The Secretary saw him salute them with his courtliest bow, and then he turned, and the three came towards him, the lady walking in the middle.

Experienced, nay, one might almost say hardened, as the Secretary was, something told him, vaguely yet unmistakably, that a new experience, nay, perhaps, even a crisis was about to come into his life. The ballroom with its gorgeous decorations, the sheen of splendid costumes, and the glitter of multitudinous jewels faded into an obscure blur which he thought of afterwards as a nebula in the sky with one brilliant star shining through the midst of it.

The loud hum of conversation, which had grown louder as the trio walked up the room towards him, died down to a faint, distant murmur. He saw and heard but two things with distinctness—one was the loveliest face he had ever looked upon, lit up by a great pair of liquid grey-blue eyes and crowned with thick coils of bright gold-brown hair, worn in complete and happy defiance of the ruling fashion, and the other was the little Baron's smoothest tone saying:

"The Princess Vavara Regna, who has expressly desired to be introduced not only to His Honour's representative, but also to the State Secretary."

He bowed in acknowledgment of the most graceful salutation he had ever seen a woman make, and murmured something, for the awkwardness and indistinctness of which he could afterwards have kicked himself; and then through the re-awakening buzz of conversation about him he heard a low, sweet, clear voice saying in the most exquisitely pronounced English—the language in which the Baron had made the introductions:

"If the Baron has told you anything about us you will understand, Mr. Secretary how it pleases us to make the acquaintance of one who has done so much for the cause of justice and freedom as you have."

If the tones had been less sweet or less even, or if the lovely eyes had not looked up to him with the light of such a perfect innocence shining in them, the Secretary might well have suspected some lurking irony beneath the compliment. But even had he done so, the suspicion would have vanished the next instant, for the Princess, with a delightfully frank defiance of conventionality, put out a little ungloved hand, which lay in his just for an instant, and then was gently and quickly withdrawn. Yet in that instant it somehow seemed to him that here, at the turning point of his political career, and on the eve of the greatest coup that had ever been planned in South Africa, his fate had all unexpectedly come to him, though he was naturally far from dreaming that the little hand whose warmth and softness was still setting his nerves a-tingle was destined to hold many more fates than his in its gentle yet pitiless grasp.

CHAPTER II.

An Experiment in Telegraphy.

Mr. Secretary Leyds never had any very clear idea as to how the next few minutes after his introduction to the Princess Vavara passed.

He shook hands with the Prince, who was a tall, sparely built man a little on the wrong side of fifty. His features were rather sharp in spite of their distinctly aristocratic moulding, his eyes were brilliant grey looking out under dark, straight brows, and his thick, carefully-trimmed hair seemed to have been slowly grizzling for some years, though his moustache and favourite were still dark with an apparently natural hue. His manner was a combination of repressed energy, perpetual alertness, and the easy repose of a man of perfect breeding and the best social experience.

But the Baron, like the astute and considerate diplomatist that he was, soon managed to monopolise the Prince's attention, leaving the Secretary free for pleasanter converse. Then the strains of an inviting waltz came floating up the room. The Princess, whether instinctively or by intention, began to mechanically draw her glove on, the usual words were said, and then the Secretary's arm stole round the slimmest, supplest waist that it had ever encircled, and he seemed to glide away into Paradise in the most fitting companionship that he could have chosen.

Dancing to perfection was one of his many accomplishments, and by no means the least useful of them, and now for the first time since he had left Berlin he had a partner worthy of him.

Naturally they had not gone very far before a good many eyes, some admiring and some perhaps a trifle envious, were turned upon them. He, quite apart from his official position, was undeniably the handsomest and most distinguished man in the company, and she was by far the most beautiful woman, but even apart from her beauty she could still have been singled out at a glance from all the other women in the room.

Her dress was as perfect in its taste as it was simple in its style, and while the others were mostly loaded with gold and blazing with jewels, she wore only a broad, old-fashioned looking collarette of dull gold round her throat, and a single big straw-coloured diamond which flashed like a golden star out of the darker haze of her hair.

The minutes of the waltz passed like a dream to him, and when it was over it seemed he had only really waltzed once in his life. But then into the midst of the pleasant half-reverie in which he seemed to have been living since he shook hands with her there came the imperative summons of sterner things. It was already after twelve and before morning he had a good deal to do—more indeed than he had ever done in his life before, for on the work of those few hours depended the making or marring of the coup which, as he believed, was to make or mar him.

"I didn't know how short the distance was between the Transvaal and Paradise until we began that waltz," he said, when the music had died away and her hand was resting on his arm. "And now, alas, I must get back to earth and the things that are earthy."

"That was very prettily put, Mr. Secretary," she said, with a quick upward look and an almost imperceptible laugh running through her tone, "quite the very reverse of what I should have expected in a country that I had been led to believe had hardly emerged from barbarism and was chiefly inhabited by half-savage farmers, who scarcely ever washed and always went to bed with their clothes on."

"Ah! that is only the English opinion of the Republic. You musn't take that as worth very much."

"Oh, I am beginning to learn that already, although I have only been here a day or two. Those English who want the world for their own have not forgiven Amajuba yet, any more than the French have forgiven Waterloo."

"England has not had her Waterloo in South Africa yet, Princess," said the Secretary, looking down at the lovely face that was suddenly turned up to his. There was an unconscious emphasis on the "yet" and a thrill of angry vibration running through the brief pregnant sentence which startled her and brought a look of innocent inquiry into her eyes.

"I should very much like to commit the indiscretion of asking you what you mean," she said with a sweet softness which the Secretary instinctively felt to be a trifle dangerous. "But from what you said just now I see that our first dance has, for the time being, been our last. We, too, must be thinking of getting back to Pretoria if we can manage to get a place in a train, for we have had rather a tiring day. I am an inveterate sightseer, you know, and I might never again have the chance of seeing Johannesburg en fête. We only really came in for half-an-hour or so to see the finale and to give the Baron a chance or redeeming his promise to introduce us to his Honour's representative—and the State Secretary."

"And in doing so you have given the Baron an opportunity of making me his debtor for life. And so you are staying at Pretoria? I am delighted to hear it because you will be safer—I mean, of course, more quiet and more comfortably situated than you could be here, and besides it enables me to do just a little trifle towards repaying you for the pleasure of that delightful waltz by offering you a compartment in my special train. It leaves at half-past twelve. Will that be too early for you?"

"That is really more than kind of you," she said, looking up at him again with a smile that would have repaid a hundred such services, "but really I don't think we ought to trespass so far on so short an acquaintance."

"It has lasted years already," said the Secretary with half unconscious impetuosity. "At least, it seems so to me. As for trespass it is out of the question. May I ask where you are staying at Pretoria?"

He was half afraid that the Princess might have resented the very obvious warmth of his tone, and that he was going to get a gentle but effectual snub, but there was no shadow of displeasure in the frank, innocent eyes that looked up into his, nor any note of anger in her voice as she replied:

"We are staying at the Grand, and my window is nearly opposite the window of that room in the Government Building where so many things must have happened within the last twelve months or so.

"Of course I don't know anything about politics; it is better not to do so in my country, but still I must confess that when I saw the lights there last night before I went to bed, I had a distinct desire for a sort of Röntgen-ray telescope that would enable me to see through the blind or the wall and a telephone or something that would have told me what you were all talking about. The walls of that room must have heard a good many things that Mr. Chamberlain, for instance, would have liked to hear over yonder in London."

As she said this she noticed an absolute change come over the Secretary's face. The frank, pleasant expression vanished in an instant, though only for an instant, and it became dark, saturnine, and almost repulsive. Then, as quickly as it had come, the cloud passed away and he said:

"I see you have the ordinary idea of statemanship-Princess. All plotting and counter-plotting, nations waylaying nations, as it were, in the dark, and Ministers laying pitfalls for other Ministers as it used to be a hundred years ago. I can assure you it is a much more innocent and commonplace business nowadays, especially since Mr. Chamberlain taught us how to play the game of Diplomacy with the cards on the table. But come, you have not told me whether I may have the pleasure of taking you to Pretoria or not."

"I must leave that to papa," she said. "Suppose we go and ask him."

There was the gentlest possible emphasis on the "we," barely perceptible and yet just enough to convey a shadowy suggestion of companionship which the Secretary found very pleasant.

The Prince, after a little courtly demurring, accepted the really serviceable offer, and after the Baron had amused himself by making a very few and very brief introductions among his own particular circle, and thereby raising an appreciable amount of envy and general uncharitableness in the souls of many outside that circle, the Secretary's carriage was announced and a few minutes later the four were on their way to the Park station.

The special consisted only of an engine, a compartmented saloon, and a brake van, and it traversed the forty-six miles in the record time of an hour and ten minutes. When it pulled up at Pretoria platform the Princess was beginning to think that the Secretary had not been very far wrong in what he had said about the length of their acquaintanceship. They parted at the station after having made arrangements at the Secretary's earnest insistence to go and see the great Independence Gathering at Krugersdorp the next day in the President's special train.

The Prince and Princess drove straight to the hotel; the Baron took a Cape cart to his own chambers; and the Secretary drove off in his neat little brougham to the house he had just built for himself overlooking the park.

But when he got there the brougham only waited for a few minutes, during which he went in and came out again with a little locked leather satchel in his hand; then he drove rapidly down to the Government Building, and dismissed his carriage under the porch.

When the Prince and Princess reached the hotel they went straight upstairs to the Prince's room. This was No. 47, and opened out on to the balcony which runs round the two sides of the building. Immediately opposite is the Government Building, and almost in a straight line from the window is the top of the side entrance from which the private Government wires cross the street to a telegraph-pole about four yards from the balcony.

The Prince knocked softly at the door, which was rather a singular thing for him to do, seeing that it was his own room. The door was open by a clean-shaven young man, who, from his dress, seemed to be something between a confidential servant and a secretary. He bowed low as they entered and then locked the door behind them.

"Have you made the preparations, Dmitri?" the Prince said in Russian.

"Yes, Nobleness, everything is prepared. The wire works excellently, and I have already taken a message by way of trial. It is to the terminus at Malmani desiring repetition of news from Mafeking. Here is the translation of it."

"Very good," said the Prince. "And you have sent it on?"

"Yes, Nobleness, nearly half an hour ago. The reply has not come yet. I have been waiting for it."

"Very good again; then we are in time to receive it," said the Princess with one of her prettiest smiles, "before we pass it on to our friend the Secretary across the road. What a really charming man he is, and how very angry he would be with me if he only knew!"

As she said this she went to what looked like, and in fact was a type-writer case standing on the table near the window. She lifted it up and disclosed, instead of a type-writer, two dainty little telegraph instruments, a receiver and a transmitter, and from each of these a fine insulated electric thread ran from the table through the open window over the rail of the balcony.

From there one of them ran up to the private Government wires, which it was wound once completely round, and the other was similarly involved with the wires on the other side of the telegraph-post. She glanced over to the lighted windows of the Executive Chamber with a pretty smile on her lips and a wicked, laughing look in her eyes. Then she said:

"Put the lights out, Dmitri, and make the coffee," and sat down to the instruments. Dmitri extinguished two of the three lamps that were burning in the room; the third was a little lamp completely shaded save where it threw a narrow fan of light on the table in front of the operator. From the street there was no more glow apparent in the windows than might have come from a shaded nightlight.

The hours came and went in silence broken only by the soft clicking of the instruments and an occasional gently-spoken word or two as sheet after sheet of cypher was passed from the Princess to her father for translation according to the code which lay before him as he sat beside her at the table.

Then as the clock of the Government House chimed half-past four, the lights in the Executive Chamber went out, and Mr. Secretary Leyds, President Kruger, and Vice-President Joubert, went home to bed, all perhaps to dream dreams of coming greatness, and the first possibly to mingle other and fairer visions with them in happy ignorance of the fact that an exact copy of every message that had been dispatched from and received in the Executive Chamber during the night lay under the pillow of the lovely Polish exile whose eyes might have lent an added brightness to the golden prospect of his illimitable ambition, but for the existence of the demure little Dutchwoman whom he had sent away to her home on the banks of the Y in view of the trouble to come.

By the time it was light enough to have seen them from the street the almost invisible wires had vanished, and as soon as the telegraph office was open Dmitri went across the square and despatched a message to Mr. Michael Ostroff at the Central Hotel, Lorenço Marquez, requesting that his master the Prince's luggage might be sent up without delay.

Within a couple of hours from the despatch of this message Mr. Michael Ostroff went on board a smart looking little steam yacht which lay a couple of hundred yards from the end of the jetty, and steamed straight out to sea, past Inyack Island until the little yacht was lost to the sight of a solitary watcher on Reuben Point in the vast smooth expanse of the Indian Ocean.

CHAPTER III.

Light Words on Weighty Matters.

A couple of hours' sound and dreamless sleep, followed by a bath and the pleasureable occupation of making a most bewitching toilet, sent the Princess Vavara down to breakfast with an excellent appetite and looking as fresh and alert as though she had gone to bed with the sun instead of with the dawn and quite prepared for the fatigues of a day of sightseeing, which, as she now knew, would also be a day of no little excitement.

The Prince too, came down looking as though he had passed the night between the sheets instead of sitting at a table translating cypher telegrams, and both were in the excellent spirits that might have been expected to inspire people who had done a thoroughly satisfactory night's work. They had a table to themselves in the big dining-room of the Grand Hotel out of ear-shot of anyone but the waiter, and as he didn't understand a word of Russian they felt justified in conversing with a certain amount of freedom.

"I would give something considerable," said the Princess as he put down her half-emptied cup of the coffee specially brewed by Dmitri in place of the intolerable stuff purveyed by the Transvaal hotel-keepers. "Yes, I really would give a good deal to be in Mr. Chamberlain's room in Downing Street when he gets the news of to-day's proceedings. I wonder whether his eye-glass will fall out when he reads the first telegram, which I suppose will reach him from Petersburg. What a set of fools these English are after all! It makes one wonder how they ever got hold of as much of the earth as they did."

"There is no wonder about that, my child," said the Prince gravely, looking up rather wearily from a piece of fish that was unusually hard and stringy even for a Pretorian breakfast-table. "It is not the English who are fools; it is the people they are foolish enough to allow to govern them. Despotism is bad, perhaps—one may say that here even, though, this place is the heart of a despotism but where empire-making and keeping are concerned democracy is worse.

"The English, as you have seen in the House of Commons, elect one party to carry on the business of the nation, and another to prevent them doing so, and then some of them elect another party—those little Englanders, as they call them—that, I believe, is the way they spell traitor in England, and then, of course——"

"They proceed to prove the wisest of men wrong in what he said about there being wisdom in the multitude of counsellors," said the Princess, putting down her fish-knife and fork in despair.

"Exactly," said the Prince, handing her the menu. "This fish is intolerable. A continent that can produce no better fish than this hardly deserves a better rule than that of the Boers. Yes, it is really quite pathetic to see what is actually the greatest empire in the world befooled and defied by a little twopenny-halfpenny state like this almost entirely encircled by British possessions. I wonder how far these good Boers would have got with their armaments if the surrounding territory had been Russian instead of British?"

"And I wonder," said the Princess with a little, low laugh, "what sort of an answer our good friend the Secretary would have got if he had sent that divinely impudent message of his to the Nevski Prospekt instead of Downing Street?"

"An instant summons to disarm backed by the dispatch of fifty thousand troops," said the Prince with not a very pleasant smile. "Russia allows no open sores like this in the midst of her dominions. But there—that is somewhat idle talk, for Russia is not cursed with politicians, and so she has never had an Amajuba Hill."

Here the waiter came with the inevitable outlets, and when he had put them down and filled the empty coffee-cups Prince Paul went on in his low, gentle voice:

"Really it is almost pathetic to stand by and watch the beginning of the break-up of the greatest empire the world has ever seen. I am their enemy, as every good Russian must be, and yet I say the sight is pitiful, for the English are a gallant race and have done many wonders in the world; but that was in the old days before telegraphs were invented to paralyse the hands of the real empire-makers."

"They acted on their own judgment and of their own strength, and before the news got home or politicians had time to snarl about it the Empire was richer by a province or two. Nowadays if a little freebooting expedition is arranged news flashes home, orders flash back, and before the expedition has got twenty miles on its road it is disowned and denounced, all aid is cut off, and the result is——"

"Doornkop!" said the Princess softly with one of her sweetest smiles. "Ah, well, we manage these things a little better in Russia, don't we? But still you must confess that this little coup d'état of the Secretary has been most exactly planned so far. What a useful man we should make of him in Petersburg."

"Yes," said the Prince with an approving nod. "He is undoubtedly a most capable young man, but you must remember that Uncle Paul and the General are also very able old men. To my mind Leyds has shown his greatest cleverness in making them act upon his views as though they were their own. I consider that to be the acme of statesmanship in a young man."

"And the result?" asked the Princess, putting her elbow on the table and leaning her chin in the palm of her hand. "What is your candid opinion of that?"

"For the present, at least," replied the Prince very deliberately, "there can only be one result, and that is the natural and legitimate consequence of the policy of fatuity tempered with fright which the British Government has been pursuing for the last year or so. The sages of Downing Street have been sitting still and watching the Boers arming throughout the country, and meanwhile they have been apologetically sending two or three hundred men into their own dominions to fight the niggers, apparently thinking that the Boers were arming to do the same.

"They must know, even if they are English politicians, that the vast majority of the Dutch element in the Cape Colony and Natal are not only hopelessly disloyal but exceedingly well armed. At least if they don't know now they will by to-morrow morning, for if Leyds' calculations are correct, as they probably are, there will be between eighty and ninety thousand Boers and Afrikanders under arms soon after sunrise, and I don't suppose that if every English soldier and loyal Colonial who has got arms and can use them, including even the troops who are busy with the niggers in Matabeleland, were to turn out there would be much more than twenty thousand of them, and of these not much more than five or six thousand would be actually trained to fight; while these Boers are always in training for their own peculiar style of warfare. No, I don't think there can be any doubt about the result—at least the immediate result."

"And after that?" the Princess murmured inquiringly over the edge of her coffee-cup.

"Ah!" said the Prince even more deliberately than before. "That is trenching on a much wider question. You see South Africa, with its gold and diamonds, and its illimitable agricultural possibilities is hardly the kind of country that could be properly left to the tender mercies of such people as these. They will do a useful work in striking the blow that will detach a large portion of the British Empire, for when the English Colossus has lost such a big limb as this it may reasonably be expected to bleed appropriately. But after that—well, we shall see. By the way, I hope Ostroff got that telegram all right. Ah, the idea just struck me at the right time. Here comes Dmitri with what looks like his answer."

He took the brick-red envelope and opened it, then with a glance at the contents he threw the paper across to Vavara and said:

"You see the luggage is coming up at once. That will do, Dmitri, except that we shall want a carriage for the station in fifteen minutes!" Then as Dmitri disappeared he went on: "How very much better that form of communication is than cypher. I wonder what Mr. Secretary Leyds as censor of telegrams would have thought if he could have guessed the meaning of that."

"I would rather know," laughed the Princess, "what our dear and deluded young friend will say, probably under his breath, when he gets the news of the friendly visit of our Eastern squadron to Delagoa Bay just twenty-four hours before the Germans are expected. By-the-way, papa," she went on with the most perfect coolness, "it's a decided pity that this excellent young man is married to a staid Dutch vrow, isn't it, though, of course, that can't be allowed to matter? Do you think he is in a fair way to fall in love with me? I decidedly thought he was last night, but of course that may only be my feminine vanity; you would look on with more dispassionate eyes."

"As far as my own experience takes me," said the Prince with an approving smile, "I should be inclined to say that it won't be very long before you'll have him at your feet. Without any flattery, I have never seen the comedy played better. If I am any judge of male human nature I should describe him as a man who, after several successful comedies in that line, is beginning to play his first tragedy.

"And yet you know, my dear Vavara," he went on with a quizzical note running through his voice and a slight crinkling at the corners of his eyes, "if anything were to happen—which the Fates forfend—to Madame, there are many meaner destinies than might befal the wife of a man—especially a young, handsome, and very able man like Leyds—who will probably before long be President of the United States of South Africa, with practically illimitable wealth at his command, and the means of buying a well-equipped fleet or two, and setting-up in business as a full fledged Republican despot—for I suppose he and his Hollanders will take their cue from South America in the matter of governing."

"If I did not see that you were joking, papa, I should be inclined to be angry," said the Princess with a faint flush on her cheeks and a flash in her eyes. "What!—a Hollander, and a man who would have to become a widower first. Why I would sooner marry an Englishman. Now I think it's time to go and get ready," and with that she rose from her chair and walked towards the door followed by the eyes of every man and woman in the room.

The Prince finished his coffee and went after her with a soft little chuckle at her last words. As he reached the vestibule a Victoria, drawn by a beautiful pair of greys, pulled up at the door, and the next moment the Secretary was standing before him holding out his hand.

Vavara was about half way up the first flight of the broad stairs in front of the door. As she stopped and turned half round to see who the new arrival was, the young Doctor looked up and thought he had never seen a more beautiful picture. She turned and came downstairs again, looking for all the world like a girl who has unexpectedly met the man who may be her lover, and the pretty lips, which a minute or two before had been curled in scorn at the mention of his name, were smiling their sweetest as she answered his morning greeting.

"I am glad to see that your late hours have had no evil effect on you, Princess," he said as his hand closed on hers.

"Late hours?" she said. "We don't call two o'clock very late at home. We don't go to bed with the sun, you know, as your good, simple-minded peasants do here. I can assure you I passed a most excellent night. And you, Mr. Secretary?"

"I never slept better or dreamed pleasanter dreams in my life," he said with more meaning in his tones than his words.

"I am sure you deserve them, whatever they were," she said with a smile of delightful frankness, "for I have no doubt you were working pretty hard over yonder."

"How do you know that?" he said a trifle sharply.

Her eyes met his with a steady glance of perfect innocence and frankness as she replied:

"I saw your shadow on the blind just as I was putting my light out. Now I must go and put my hat on. Our carriage will be here in a minute or two."

"But I have brought mine with the purpose of asking you to make use of it, if you will so far honour it and me."

Vavara shot a quick glance at her father, who instantly took the cue and said:

"Really, Mr. Secretary, you are allowing us to get too deeply into your debt. Still the offer is too good-natured to be refused. Vavara, go and get your things on. One should never keep good horses waiting."

"Or good Secretaries either," the Princess murmured just audibly, as with a pretty half nod towards them, she turned and went up stairs again.

"We have time to divide a small bottle of Goublet, Prince, if you have a mind," said the Secretary. "His Honour won't be coming up for nearly half-an-hour yet, so we can easily be at the station before him. To tell you the truth I shall not be sorry if you will join me, for I had very little sleep last night and plenty of hard work—seeing that all the preparations for to-day were in proper order, you know."

"I shall be most happy," said the Prince. "Yes, I suppose you had rather a busy night, and you will have even a busier day I presume," he went on as they sat down at one of the side tables in the vestibule and a waiter brought the wine. "It will be a spectacle which I can assure you I shall consider it a great privilege to witness. The concourse of a brave people celebrating the freedom which its own valour won from a powerful tyrant."

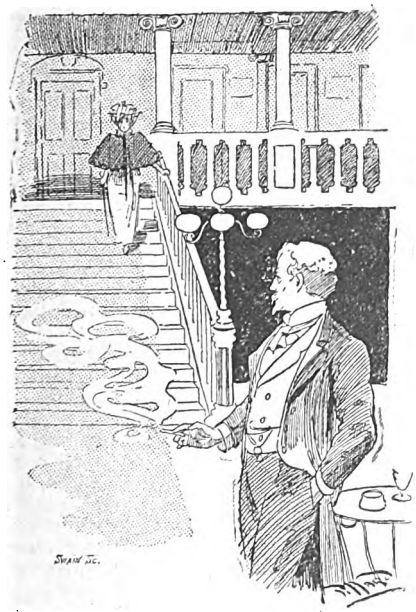
"From a tyrant that once was powerful, you mean, Prince," said the Secretary with a sneer that he took no trouble to disguise. "A nation that could make such an unmitigated fool of itself as England made of herself after Amajuba may safely be looked upon as what the French call un pouvoir fini. Besides England is not ruled by statesmen now; she only has politicians, and with them one can do anything."

"As you did over the Jameson business, eh?" laughed the Prince as he raised his glass to his lips. "Well, I am no friend of these grasping English as I think I told you last night, so here's to the drawing of the Lion's fang's, or such stumps as he may have left, and prosperity to the United States of South Africa — and their future President!"

The eyes of the two men met as the last words were spoken slowly and deliberately. The Secretary's face flushed, and his eyes kindled, but Prince Paul's was as calm as if he had uttered the merest commonplace.



"I will answer your toast to-night, Prince," said the Secretary, and as he spoke the Prince noticed a little catch in his voice. "At present I will content myself with thanking you for it. Here's to all you say."

Then they drained their glasses together and the Prince heard the Secretary's clink ever so faintly against his teeth. His eyes were fixed on the staircase and the flush on his cheeks had deepened. The Prince looked round, and, as he expected, saw his daughter coming down the stairs.

CHAPTER IV.

Amajuba Day, 1896.

A really pretty woman seldom looks more fascinating than she does when she is frowning good humouredly; at least so the Secretary thought when Vavara came towards the table looking in mock displeasure at the empty champagne glasses and saying:

"Mr. Secretary, this is hardly what I expected to find one of the leaders of a simple-lived, pastoral people doing a few minutes after eight o'clock in the morning. I hope you are not beginning to corrupt them with the wickednesses of European civilisation. You know the example of those in high places goes far."

There was an undercurrent of irony, almost indeed of chaff running through her tone that the Doctor hardly relished. He somehow didn't like the idea that she should know the Boer character as he knew it. He felt that if she did, not even the leader of such a people could hope to stand very high in her favour. Still he comforted himself with the thought that after all she could not know very much and that only from hearsay probably in England, and everybody knew the truth was never told there about the Boers except perhaps by the Little Englanders whom the Boers themselves laughed at. As he rose from his seat he said:

"I plead guilty, Princess, to the champagne if not to the corruption. You may call it a relic of the bad habits I learnt in Europe."

"Ah, yes," she said very sweetly. "In Berlin, I suppose—when you went to have your throat attended to. I am so glad to see how completely it is cured."

Now politically, if not physically speaking, his throat was rather a sore point with the Secretary for, in spite of the ingenuous explanations of Baron de Quarles and his own emphatic statements, evil minded sceptics wilfully persisted in making unpleasant allusions to political matters whenever that throat was mentioned. And yet, keen reader and all as he was of human character, the fair, frank face before him told him nothing, and the tone in which the words were spoken rang so absolutely true that there was nothing for him but to utter a few conventional words of thanks and then suggest that it was time to start for the station.

But a spirit of mischief seemed to have taken possession of the Princess Vavara that morning, possibly as a natural consequence of the complete success of her night's work, and as they were driving up Markt Straat she looked back at the big block of Government Buildings and said:

"Is it true, Mr. Secretary, that a few years ago your Parliament used to meet in a little one-storeyed thatched house, and that in those days Pretoria was only a little village?"

"Yes," said the Secretary. "That was how the English left it. They never seemed to think the country worth developing."

"But it must have cost a great deal of money to make all this change. Where on earth did it all come from? From the gold mines, I suppose."

"Or rather from those who made the gold mines," the Prince chimed in with a laugh. "No offence, Mr. Secretary, those people are only fit to be taxed. If they had been worth anything more they would either have taken the country or swamped the Government by this time. They are numerous enough and rich enough to do it, I suppose."

"Undoubtedly, but they have no ideas beyond money-making in spite of their talk about reform. Why, just imagine, in that fiasco which they call the Revolution they never pulled up a rail or cut a wire until one of their most prominent leaders rode down from Park Station to Roodeport on a luggage train and pulled up a few rails to prevent the ammunition train getting to our people at Krugersdorp. He had no idea the train he rode down on was the ammunition train, and that he pulled up the rails behind instead of in front of it. What can you do with people like that except tax them?"

"And yet you are going to practically admit the whole lot to the Franchise to-day?"

"Yes, we are—on certain conditions, which you will hear from the President's proclamation."

"I suppose it would be indiscreet to ask you if it would be possible to gratify our curiosity beforehand?" the Princess asked in the tone of one who expects "no" for an answer.

The Secretary was silent for a moment, during which he gave a little pull at his handsome moustache, then he said with a little laugh:

"For the first time, Princess, I am going to refuse you, not because I wish to disappoint a very natural curiosity, but because I absolutely decline to spoil for you what I think will be the finest dramatic effect you have ever seen."

"That is just what I deserve for my indiscretion, for now, of course, you have increased my curiosity tenfold. I wonder if I could get it out of the President after you have introduced us."

"You are at the most perfect liberty to try, my dear Princess," laughed the Secretary. "Do you speak the Taal?"

"What's that?"

"The combination of unpleasant sounds and imperfect grammar which our good burghers are pleased to call a language. It is not a musical tongue, and I must confess that His Honour doesn't speak it to advantage, but you will be able to judge of that for yourself to-day."

"But doesn't His Honour speak English?"

"The old gentleman understands it perfectly, and speaks it very passably, but hatred of England, and all things English, is, and very properly too, part of his religion, and so officially the language is a dead letter to him. Well, here we are. I don't suppose he will be very long after us. If you'll follow me I'll get you a good place. Ah, there is the Baron. Come, I will put you into his charge, as I shall be busy for a few minutes. You couldn't be in better hands. He is the best natured and most obliging man in Pretoria."

"Except one," murmured the Princess as the Secretary handed her out of the carriage.

They passed through the double lines of the Guard of Honour, composed of the newly-organised State Artillery, gorgeous in new uniforms and showing a thoroughly German precision of dress and attitude, as was only natural seeing that about half of them had served their time in the German Army, and that the whole corps was drilled and almost entirely officered by Germans.

The Baron came to meet them at the station gates resplendent in his Orders, and arrayed in the whitest and stiffest of shirts and the glossiest of broadcloth, and beaming with good nature and justifiable importance. The Secretary went and joined the other members of the Executive who were waiting to receive the President, and as he stood among them the Prince could not help saying to the Baron:

"Don't you think our friend the Secretary shows to great advantage among those other people? What an exceedingly common-looking lot they are, and how frightfully they are dressed! Why didn't they remain faithful to the ancient costume of their country? Some of them would look quite picturesque dressed like those men in the long boots and broad hats that you see going along beside the bullock-waggons."

"Wait till you see His Honour himself," whispered the Baron with a wicked twinkle in his eyes, "but for Heaven's sake have your facial muscles well under control. Ah, there he comes!"

"What a very warlike turn-out for the ruler of such a peace-loving-people," said the Princess in a low tone to the Baron. "Why, the Emperor himself is not guarded like that when he drives about Petersburg. Surely you have no Nihilists in Pretoria?"

"No," said the Baron. "Only Outlanders and Englishmen."

"To say nothing of German Jews and Hollanders," added the Prince with a gentle smile. "I wonder which will prove the most dangerous in the long run? But really the old gentleman seems to like to be well guarded."

As they were saying this a small, neat brougham, drawn by a pair of bright bays, was coming up the road at a rattling trot in the midst of a cloud of dust. Six mounted police in black patent riding boots, close-fitting white breeches, blue tunics, and white spiked helmets, rode in front, two more were at each side, and six behind, each with a loaded revolver at his hip and the butt of a loaded rifle resting on his thigh.

The Guard stood to attention as the carriage approached. It pulled up at the end of the double line, a couple of sentries strode forward, one opened the door and the two stood, one on either side of it, with the rifles at the salute.

Vavara saw a big, ungainly form, almost elephantine in shape and proportions, climb down awkwardly through the narrow door. It was arrayed in shiny broadcloth, and a broad sash, not at all unlike the adornment affected by Good Templars on parade, had been apparently thrown over the badly-fitting frock coat, which, as usual, was buttoned by a single button across the chest.

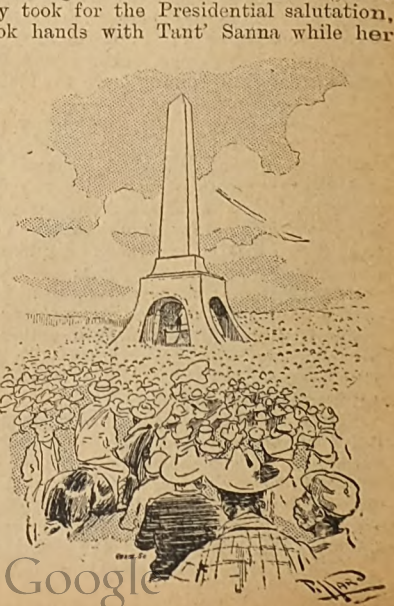
As the figure turned she saw a few orders and stars sparkling on the black cloth. A not particularly good silk hat was planted firmly on the back of a big head, and from under it looked a very big red face, set off by a long, ragged fringe of grey hair that ran from ear to ear under the heavy chin.

Then the figure turned again, after bobbing clumsily in acknowledgment of the salute of the Guards, and helped the female counterpart of itself out of the carriage, after which Oom Paul and Tant' Sanna walked up arm in arm between the files of the Guard attended by the members of the Executive, hat in hand.

A few moments later the presentation took place, and Princess Vavara felt her dainty little hand resting in the limp grasp of a huge hairless paw, and found herself looking up into one of the most grossly animal faces she had ever seen. She repressed an almost irresistible shiver, and hid the change of expression that came over her face by a graceful curtsey, which won from Oom Paul a fat, approving smile. Then she heard something between a chuckle and a grunt which she correctly took for the Presidential salutation, and then she shook hands with Tant' Sanna while her father was being presented to His Honour. After that the Presidential party with the élite of the Executive boarded the special train, and left the station amidst a chorus of cheers, and a salvo of rifle-shots.



At Johannesburg there was a tremendous ovation waiting for the good President who was about to do the loyal Outlanders justice at last, and at Krugersdorp the train seemed to Vavara to be running through innumerable multitudes of people and whole towns of white-tented waggons. Indeed, as she said to the Secretary, she could never have believed there were so many people in all the Transvaal.

There was very little interest either for Prince Paul or his daughter until the President rose on the platform under the base of the Monument of Independence to make his long-awaited proclamation. But as she looked round over the sea of stern, rugged faces that surrounded the platform and the monument and watched the varying waves of expression that swept over them she saw that every man and woman was hanging on the rough fast-flowing words as though they were the very words of life and death, as in good truth they were destined one day to be. And when the climax came, prepared and all as she and her father were for it by their previous knowledge, it seemed to come upon both of them like a thunderclap out of the silence of a summer evening.

The President had begun his oration as usual by recounting the brave deeds of the Voortrekkers and the triumphs of the War of Independence. Then he went on to the reform movement in Johannesburg and the Jameson Raid, and this brought him to the Proclamation itself. He read it through to the last paragraph, and then a deep hush fell over the vast assembly, and Boer and Outlander looked at each other in the face in silence. Hands were clenched and here and there cheeks grew pale, for that last pregnant paragraph proclaimed the abrogation of the Convention of London, and the absolute independence of the South African Republic, and restricted the promised franchise to those of the Outlanders who were ready, not only to abjure their allegiance to their own countries, but to spend their means and, if necessary, shed their blood in defence of the land which henceforth would claim them absolutely as its own.

As the President thundered out the last words he threw the parchment down and launched out into an exhortation aglow with rugged eloquence, calling upon his people and his children to stand by him in the last great struggle of the life that he had devoted to them and their country. Suddenly in the midst of his peroration he stopped, picked up a little bundle from the table, and shook it out.

It was a Union Jack.

A mighty chorus of howls and hoots and hisses instantly greeted the hated flag, and in the midst of it the President spread it out before them. Then, with a sudden wrench of his powerful hands, he ripped it in twain, and, flinging the two pieces to the ground, the shouted at the top of his great voice:

"So shall Africa be torn from England! We and our fathers made Africa, and we will have it. Our brethren in the South are only waiting to join hands, as they have already joined hearts, with us. What we have won with the rifle we will keep with the rifle. Stand fast for the Land, my children, and the God of your fathers will stand by you! By to-morrow morning there will be a hundred thousand burghers under arms from the Krokodil to the Cape. Do not you be the last among them, my children. Strike straight and hard for land and home and freedom. Stand side by side as brothers should, and forget not Eendracht maakt Macht!" *

No words could even faintly depict the scene which followed when the storm of cheering had died down into the calm of reaction. Great, rugged, grim-faced men whose whole lives had been battles with the wilderness and the enemies of the Land fell into each other's arms and sobbed like children. Some caught up their wives or little ones in their arms and kissed them frantically, and some gripped the barrels of their rifles with one hand, and the hand of a friend or comrade with the other, and eye met eye in a silence that said more than words.

But on the great deputation that had come from Johannesburg to present an address of thanks to the President after the reading of the Proclamation the last fatal clause fell like an exploding shell. Once more the sinuous diplomacy of the Boer had cheated and outwitted them. It was not political freedom that was given to them but the choice between commercial ruin and taking arms against the country of their birth. To refuse the Franchise would, they well knew, mean confiscation and expulsion, even if they got off with their lives. To accept it meant, in addition to treason, taking the chances of a long and bitter war which would bring paralysis of industry, stoppage of trade and financial panic as certainly as the rising sun brought the daylight.

When the first shock of the panic had passed they were staring mutely into each others' faces. A prominent citizen and millionaire who had been appointed to read the address said in a somewhat husky voice:

"We are spoofed again, boys, and badly too, this time. These chaps can't play a straight game; the Lord didn't make them that way. Well, the Old Man's got us on toast this time and any of you that likes can read the address, for I'm hanged if I do. Any takers?"

"Yes," jerked out another member, "I'm taking the next train back to Johnny'sburg. This is no place for us. Let's get while we have whole skins."

And so they went, sadder and wiser men, to await the bursting of the cloud that had so suddenly fallen and blotted out what they had so fondly believed to be the golden dawn of better days for the Rand.

* "Union makes strength," the motto of the South African Republic.

BRITON OR BOER?

For years past Britain and the Transvaal have been spoiling for a fight, and it was left to that well-known author, Mr. George Griffith, to write a strong and exciting serial nearly four years ago graphically describing a huge war between the two countries.

This story, coming so soon after the Jameson Raid, was read with unusual interest.

Now that Briton and Boer are in deadly conflict it will be interesting to read the story, and see how far the imagination of the author has actually come true.

It deals with how the countries fought out their final fight for the possession of the richest region of the earth and one of the fairest portions of the British Empire.

The chief characters are not fictions of the imagination, but life pictures of the very men who are now fighting.

Mr. George Griffith says: "In the romance of which the first chapters appear in SHORT STORIES dated Feb. 24th, I have attempted to answer in the form of an essay in prophetic fiction the question which forms the title of the story: 'Is the Briton or the Boer, the Englishman or the Dutch-Afrikander, going to rule South Africa?'"

The Second Man Wins.

"THE country will have no able-bodied men left if this goes on. Both the Mogrows are going and I hear that——"

Elsie Banham interrupted her hostess.

"It seems to me that if a man has any special qualification which would be useful to his country, he should place it at its disposal. In fact, I'll go farther. I think every man if able and not directly wanted at home should go out."

Was it accident which made her glance at a man apparently talking to her next-door neighbour.

John Manbers had made Nathaniel's talk and admire while he was a student. Still more had he done so since, and just now his name was continually on the students' lips as almost certain to be chosen to accompany Sir James Crooner as first assistant to that eminent wound specialist, on his merciful mission to the seat of war.

Feeling just as sanguine herself about his receiving the appointment, Elsie Banham had steeled her unwilling heart and had spoken as she did to Mrs. Treller.

She knew how keen Manbers was on the appointment, and her remark, loud enough for him to hear, was meant as her encouragement to the man to whom, though he had not as yet spoken, she felt her heart was given.

Apparently, however, he had not heard or did not realise she had looked his way. He felt that there was still a chance that his claims might be passed over by the authorities in favour of Dr. Sivier, who had the advantage of John Manbers of some more years experience in surgery, and was, in fact, on the high way to very first rank in the science.

Manbers felt Sivier was his rival in the matter, but he also knew the latter was fated to be his rival and perhaps a successful one, in a matter much nearer his being. He knew that Sivier had long aspired to the hand of Elsie Banham, and he could scarcely at all tell at present whether the girl had made up her mind. She was very kind to him, and he had allowed himself to be buoyed up by a very distinct hope that some day he would win her.

Her remark had reached him in spite of his seeming indifference, and in the few subsequent moments he had made up his mind that if he could by any means whatever get to South Africa, he would do so.

His ruminations, which had begun to make his conversation drag, were interrupted by the entrance of one of the sons of the house. One of the "Natt" medicoes.

The youth only noticed his mother and Miss Banham talking as he came in, or his remark might not have been uttered at that precise moment.

"I say, mother," as he shook hands with Miss Banham, "isn't it a shame? Sivier's going out after all. They haven't given the job to Manbers. Sivier told Davis this evening that it had only just been decided. I am certain they've chosen the wrong man, for—Oh! I beg pardon, Mr. Manbers, I didn't see you. I hope——"

He stopped at a loss for words to excuse his behaviour.

Manbers, white with evident disappointment at the news, braced himself to mumble something of a reply; and as everybody began commiserating with him, he rose with a short laugh, saying he must take his leave.

He shook hands with Elsie last. The first news had disturbed her keenly in a way—she knew how anxious he had been to go. This feeling rapidly gave way to another of relief and secret joy at his not going.

She smiled as she gave him her hand, saying with the semblance of a blush:

"I suppose everybody can't go."

This could not disguise from him the fact that her former remark had conveyed to him that she would think more of him if he went out. He would not tell her so, however, and with a mere "Good-bye" he went.

For some days nothing more was heard of him save from Treller, who saw him at the hospital continually. Then—the authorities having allowed him some leave which was owing—he suddenly disappeared, to nobody's astonishment till his absence had extended to some weeks.

Sivier had gone out, but not before he had tried his luck with Elsie. She, however, with a firmness, which was perhaps not so apparent to him as it was meant to be, refused him.

He was a master of craft and noticed in his visits which became frequent as his time for going grew near, that she did not appear altogether well, that her energy had lost some of its vivacity. He, however, told himself that even if this were due to a certain affection for Manbers, it would soon be replaced by a much stronger one for himself, when he had returned with, in her eyes, the added advantage of having responded to the call of duty in South Africa.

When he had gone, and still no news of Manbers came, she began to feel that it was all a mistake, and that he had never cared for her to any degree.

Friends were useless to her; she mourned her broken heart in secret, and would have given anything for some occupation to take herself out of herself.

* * * * *

"Do you hear that, Sivier? They're sending all the right division forward. The chief's determined to force matters somehow, and we shall have our work cut out before night, that's certain. We're not going to occupy those hills without some awful carnage."

Sivier nodded to his chief without speaking. Doctors were bustling in and out of the temporary hospital, which was some three miles to the rear of the main column.

Everything was being done that could be done in view of an engagement which must have taken place within a few days; and now the silent bustle of the surgeons and their attendants became accentuated as the news spread that their services would be wanted earlier than was expected.

One of them stopped by Sivier, who was arranging in readiness the paraphernalia to be necessary before long in their merciful work.

"We're awfully undermanned. The staff of men and nurses wants trebling. Heaven knows how we shall get on if our men have bad luck."

"Good luck will give us our fair share," said Sivier cynically. "What's that remark somebody made about a victory being the next evil to a defeat."

Another man joined in the conversation.

"There's a batch of nurses coming within the next few hours. Ah! Sivier, there's something I wanted to tell you, but it's clean gone out of my head. I fancy it was that some man or other had been asking if you were here. Some man in the ranks of the regiment which arrived yesterday. Yes! that was it. Said he was one of the Nathaniel men, who had managed to get out, he said, in the character of a dispenser, and had worked the oracle to get to the front in the ranks. Do you know who it is?"

"Haven't the faintest notion," replied Sivier, "some poor devil of a student, I suppose, who claims acquaintance on the score of being lectured to. Can't be much good probably."

"It's good news that more nurses are due," chimed in another. "It would be all the better though, if more men had come. Any man, by the way, like your friend, for instance, would prove a god-send in odd jobs."

They separated again and the work of preparation for the casualties went on.

Fighting had commenced some time, and now that the big division on the right had gone forward, they expected they would be busy very soon.

An hour afterwards the first lot of wounded came in, and then relay after relay.

The engagement was not allowed to last long, the commander intending to continue on the morrow, so the column took up their position as far forward as they had secured.

The general sent word back of what he had done, and requested that the medical corps should assist as much as possible in fetching back the wounded —the combatant force being worn out with the rushing assault though it was comparatively short.

Most of the wounded were in, and night was coming on. Sir John Crooner, who was in charge, came to Sivier and said:

"Look here, will you go out with this last batch and make sure there are none left behind who are alive. It's going to be a bad night and we must be certain, humanly speaking, there are none left."

Sivier accordingly with some stretcher bearers and attendants went off to make the last survey of the battlefield.

Now and then when they reached the scene of action, they came across poor fellows dead to a superficial observer but with just a flicker of life left, and each was sent off to the hospital.

Sivier was walking a little ahead of the small corps. For a moment he could see no more bodies about, and then, twenty yards to the right, he caught sight of an object, which he hurried off to investigate. He was hoping this was the end of his task to get back and get some rest if possible.

He was not without a soul, but that soul was devoted to the attainment of personal aggrandisement, and much though he desired his reputation to be enhanced in his skilled treatment of the wounded, he had little or no heart to be touched at their miseries.

The small body kept on their survey of the scene some short distance away.

Coming up to the spot, Sivier turned his lantern on the apparently lifeless form lying face uppermost, limbs stretched out.

He started back with a short cry as his lantern's ray fell on the face. It was Manbers. Blood lay about his thighs, he had evidently lost a lot. The eyes were closed. Sivier recovered himself sufficiently, quickly to kneel down and feel for any signs of life without calling the attention of the bearers by his surprise.

He had been too astonished at first to have any but the instinctive thoughts of his profession, but in shorter time than it takes to tell he had realised what Manber's death would mean to him.

"Dead!—thank God!—I think," he said. "Dead!"

He was scarcely waiting to verify his opinion.

As he dropped the arm he was holding, the eyes opened and Manbers groaned.

"No—not—dead—yet," he jerked out convulsively. "That's—you, Sivier. Thank—God—someone's come. I'm—nearly—gone."

Sivier, his face perfectly colourless, gazed at him. Again for a moment he hesitated, and then a look of concentrated hate came over his face. He saw Manbers, unattended to, could not live a couple of hours, and the demoniac purpose fastened itself on his heart.

Without a word, he left his victim—he was certainly his murderer—and hurriedly went to meet the others who were now barely ten yards away, thinking that Sivier's long stay meant they were wanted.

Speaking rapidly, and finding time to feel thankful his face could not be seen in the darkness, he said:

"It's all right, the poor fellow's dead. I thought at first not, but he's quite gone."

Unsuspecting, they retraced their steps to the rear and reported that, as far as they could see, no living were left.

Arrived at the hospital, Sivier buried himself in his work of attending those wounded wanting care, and tried to forget.

He took no notice of surroundings. It was perhaps fortunate the others were too much engaged to notice his appearance.

An hour afterwards, he was preparing to leave off his work, and seek some relief in sleep of some sort.

As he left the improvised ward, two of the other men walked behind him. One of them called to Sivier.

"Those new nurses have come you noticed, I suppose. Did you hear about one of them. She was bathing the head of a poor fellow of the Brentshires, when he caught sight of the fellow in the next bed who was only slightly wounded, and he asked whether somebody or other had come in. He said the poor fellow had been shot endeavouring to rescue the speaker. The nurse recognised the name and fainted. She had evidently expected this man was all right and knew him, or else she did not know he was attached to this column. Anyhow they brought her to and she asked for particulars and now she's missing. They imagine she's gone to find out for herself. The other man was able to tell pretty well where it took place."

Sivier showed little interest—in fact had apparently taken no notice of the details, and his answer showed that the tale had not excited his interest at all.

"The Colonel's sent out a party to find her, or I'd go myself," said the first man. As they left the ward, the searchers arrived. Though a moment before, Sivier's existence had been a mere ordinary detail to the two speakers, one of them has said he will never as long as he lives forget Sivier's face as they encountered the party.

It has been surmised that the nurse who had really intentionally obtained an appointment to the identical column Manbers was in, was Elsie Banham.

The news of his injury, perhaps death, was an awful shock to the poor girl, but Providence had guided her steps, and the search party had found her holding his head in her lap and tearfully waiting for help which she knew would come.

Poor Manbers was too far gone to tell her sufficient particulars of Sivier's treachery, but the latter's terrible discomfiture as he met them told her quite enough.

"My God!" he exclaimed, as the awful thought went through him that Manbers was still alive.

He tried to tear himself away from the group, but not before the half-glazed eyes of Manbers met his, and he knew instinctively that all was known.

In the weeks of terrible uncertainty to Elsie that preceeded Manbers' recovery, they were not told the reason for the shot which roused the camp on that first night of their meeting, or of the discovery next day that Sivier, whose professional career had been so brilliant, had put an end to his own life.

S. B.

THE SAVING OF GUN No. 5.

It was "Gun No. 5" in Smith's Battery, but we of the 2nd Brigade always spoke of it as "Shuman's Gun." We did so because Shuman was sergeant of the third section of the battery, and because we came to know him well, along with many of the other gunners, before his gun had fired a hostile shot. It was a rifled nine-pounder, the same as all others, but for some reason it had a voice peculiarly its own. With thirty guns playing to right and left we could pick out No. 5 without a miss.

At First Bull Run it was the Sixth Regiment which supported and saved Smith's Battery from capture, and it was Company "H" which lay in line directly behind No. 5. That was the battery's first fight—our first fight—and there were good reasons for one to be proud of the other. The enemy came charging and yelling three different times, and each time, as they neared the guns, the artillerists fell flat and we rose up and poured in a volley which cumbered the earth with dead and wounded. In the last charge they reached Shuman's gun and began to drag it away. Only Shuman and two or three gunners were left. When the sergeant saw that his gun had been captured, he sprang up with a wild, desperate look on his face and cried out to us:

"They've got my gun, boys—they've got my gun! Rally, Company 'H,' for your honour's sake, rally and get it back."

And with our captain crying "Halt!" at the top of his voice, and with the brigadier cursing and storming that we should move without orders, we dashed forward as one man. There was only a sputtering of musketry before we were upon them. Then it was the bayonet and clubbed musket—even the fist. In five minutes we had heaped them up or driven them off, and the gun was recaptured. At Second Bull Run, as the Sixth was extended in battle line, Company "H" just fitted into a gap into a half destroyed stone wall. The gallant Kearney had fallen at Chantilly, and the blue masses had been slowly crowded back to the old battle ground. As regiments and brigades fell back, the feet of living men kicked aside the skulls and crushed the bones of the dead of months before. Exultant and implacable, the grey masses followed, and there was desperate fighting over that vast graveyard.

"There they come—get ready—here is where we roll 'em back!"

As a regiment in grey moved straight on for the gap, while other regiments moved upon the flanks, Company "H" poured in its fire and defied death. It beat back the regiment—ten to one—once—twice—thrice. Then it was decimated—and more. Of ninety-five men, only sixty could handle a musket.

"I can't spare a man! You must die where you are!" replied the brigadier when asked for reinforcements.

The sixty men were reduced to fifty-five—to fifty—to forty, and we were yet holding the gap and holding the enemy when there was a hip-hurrah from the rear and up came "Shuman's Gun" on the full gallop.

No care for the dead—no care for the wounded. The gun swung into position and unlimbered, and Shuman's voice was heard above the crash of battle shouting:

"Down on your faces, Company 'H'—I'm going to use canister!"

It was but a single gun from the battery—but it was Shuman's gun—and as we fell on our faces the wicked missiles pinged and screamed above us and shrivelled up the head of the advancing column as fire destroys a dry bush.

The gunners worked with bullets flying about them as thick as leaves falling of an autumn day, and the gun held the gap and saved a brigade. And, though the whole army was pressed back and the foe gained another victory, those of us who lived laid our grimy hands on gun or wheel and accepted it as a comrade.

When Hooker went down into the wilderness to flank Lee out of Fredericksburg, the Second Brigade was with him, and Company "H" gathered wild flowers by the wayside and in the forest and made wreaths to hang upon the muzzle of Shuman's gun.

We were in the path of Stonewall Jackson as he advanced silently through the woods in the dusk of the evening and fell like a thunderbolt on the Federal army.

Surprised and panic stricken, we gave way and became fugitives, and of the artillery Shuman's gun was almost one of the first pieces captured. The sergeant fell back with us, crying and wringing his hands, as men do when death has taken all they love.

"They've got No. 5, boys—they've got my dear old gun!" he kept wailing, and we could say nothing to comfort him.

For half an hour it looked like a rout of the whole army. Then the Federals halted in their tracks and turned at bay. Shuman was still with us, and of a sudden he swung his hat and cheered and exclaimed:

"Don't you hear her, boys—old No. 5! There she goes again! The rebs have got her, but she's right ahead of us and we'll have her again!"

And above the crash and the roar we caught the peculiar tones of Shuman's gun, and Company "H" cheered and pressed forward until it became a wedge for the brigade. Yes, down there at the edge of the forest, where we had cut down a few score of trees as an abattis, the enemy were using old No. 5 against us. It was the weakest spot in their line.

A thousand men seemed to define the fact at once, and paying no heed to orders, a thousand men pressed forward. But Company "H" was first of all. Shuman's gun was the magnet. We leaped over the wounded and dead—we cheered and shouted—we dashed forward and the gun was ours.

And when it was ours again we hugged it and called it pet names, and we cared so little for the cyclone of death sweeping over those fields that we lifted the sergeant up and paraded him around. Hooker was driven back in disgrace, but we sang songs as we marched back to the river. We had not been defeated—we had retaken old No. 5.

There came a day, before Grant marched down over the same highways in search of the same old gray lion, when Sergeant Shuman was commissioned lieutenant. He had earned his promotion and more, but he would not accept it. As sergeant he would be in charge of No. 5. As lieutenant he would be in charge of a section.

And, too, there came a day when the overworked guns were ordered to be turned over and new ones issued. A piece of artillery is not like a man. When it has been fired about so many times the metal is weakened. When Company "H" heard of that order every man talked mutiny, and the crew of No. 5 were ready to desert. We went to our captain, and he to the colonel, and somehow it was fixed to keep No. 5 in the battery. Gun and caisson showed fifty-two scars of bullet and ball, and every spoke of the wheels had been stained with blood over and over again.

Shuman's gun was with us as we fought to the right or left at Petersburg, seeking to break through and seize the railroads; but when Grant finally settled down to wear out the foe we made a discovery and had to admit an unpleasant fact.

Old No. 5 had seen her best days. In her last fight her shot and shell had not been true, and grape and canister had dribbled from her muzzle. Even Sergeant Shuman sorrowfully admitted that she had been strained by the hundreds of discharges, and that the next one fired might kill friend instead of foe.

And one day, the order to turn in the old field pieces was reissued, and we bowed our heads and realized that we were helpless. The gun must go to the foundry to be broken up and come back to us in new form, and we gathered around it to say good-bye. There was tenderness and gentleness and love in the way we smoothed the scarred metal—in our touch of spoke and tire and box.

"How she spoke to 'em at Antietam!" whispered one.

"And how she moved 'em at Second Bull Run!" added a second.

"And she was red hot at Gettysburg!" put in a third.

And old No. 5 stood there ready to be hauled away to the boneyard, and of her crew only Shuman was left alive. He had seen five full crews bite the dust since that gun fired its first shot.

"They are coming for the gun—where's Shuman?"

He knew the gun was to go away that afternoon, and as he leaned against it with eyes fixed on the earth at his feet no man disturbed him. We knew he was remembering the hard fought battles—the critical minutes of the desperate charge—the flames which had leaped from that black throat to blast advancing men.

"Where's Shuman—call Shuman!"

No one had seen him for two or three hours. Men passed up and down calling his name, and the corporal who had come with four horses to drag the gun to the landing understood our feelings and waited.

By-and-bye a soldier who had been searching about came back to the gun and said:

"Thanks, corporal, but you may take it along now."

"But Shuman—wait for Shuman!" we protested.

"You need not wait. He is lying dead down there in his tent!"

And the men about the gun uncovered their heads and cast down their eyes, and drooping his voice to a whisper the corporal said:

"Start her up easy, boys, and pick out the best road. So the old gun goes, and Shuman goes, and I'll be blowed if it isn't a queer deal!"

WHEN Charlie Briggs came rushing into my room one night in December a few years ago, I must confess that I noticed a strange look in his eyes, and an unwonted fire in his speech and conduct altogether; yet I paid no heed to these things, for I knew—or thought I knew—my man. As events have proved, I was wrong, but I do not think anybody else, knowing Charlie as I did, would have acted differently. He was a rather excitable, moody chap—full of foolish fancies and strange ideas. I recall the fact that when we sat round the fire in the old days at the club and told stories, it was Charlie who excited our feelings by the most blood-curdling tales imaginable, accompanying the narration by such extravagance of gesture and passion that it was with a sigh of relief that we heard the dénouement, and saw him sink back in his seat, exhausted. When, therefore, he came into my room with his whole frame pulsating wildly with excitement, I merely motioned him to a seat and passed him my cigar case.

He took out a cigar, bit the end of it off, and then commenced to strike matches and throw them into the fire unused, while he chewed his cigar with a grim eagerness.

"Tom!" he exclaimed at last, "do you remember our talk the other day about heredity and all that sort of thing?"

"I don't recollect," said I.

"Well, I've been reading that bally French author—I forget his name—and I'm thoroughly convinced that there's something in it after all. Why, he gives instances where people have committed cold-blooded murders, not because they wanted to, but just because they couldn't help it, it ran in their blood. The notion takes my fancy. Just think of a man going up to his wife or his friend and committing murder, just because it's in him and he can't help himself. I tell you what, the law ought to be altered to meet such cases. A fellow is merely the instrument of Providence, as it were. He can't help himself, he merely obeys an instinct that is inherent in his being. What do you think, old man?"

"Well," I replied quietly, "it's a rum subject, and not congenial to me. If you weren't so serious I should say you had had a Scotch or two to-night."

"Oh, rot!" he exclaimed. "You fellows always turn my ideas into fun. Why can't you——"

"Your ideas!" I interjected. "Like your cheek! It's the French—What's-his-name's ideas."

"I tell you what, young man," said Charlie, oracularly, "I admit that chap has started the idea in my brain but——" here he paused and clenched his hands—"I can give him points. He has mooted the thing, but I can see deeper than he ever did. I am a living example of heredity! Oh, don't laugh—what I am telling you is right."

"Where do you mean to lecture on the subject?" I asked banteringly.

"What I'm telling you is gospel, on my honour, Tom," he went on, stalking the room as he spoke. "I have given some thought to the matter. It seems to me that whilst a man may live as harmlessly as a dove up to a certain age, he may suddenly realise his responsibility to his ancestors, so to speak. You see, what is inbred, what is in a man's heart, will be sure to work itself out. What is the name of that yarn—oh, I forget—it doesn't matter—something about what's bred in the bone. Now listen. I've come to give you advice. As sure as I'm a living sinner, it will do you good. When you hear of a murder or anything of that sort, don't you go and blame the fellow in every case."

"Much obliged to you," I answered.

"You don't take me seriously," he protested. "I assure you, what I've told you is true. Believe it or not, I tell you I'm a living example of—Now, look here, Tom—quick! See my face? Doesn't that convince you?"

I glanced at his face, which was almost unrecognisable.

"Horrible!" I yelled at him. "Get out, you silly ass!"

In an instant he was himself again.

"Now, at certain times of the day I feel like making that mess of my features," he said. "Of course it's no pleasure to me to do it. I simply must."

"Well, all I can say is that if you must, don't come here with that ugly—I beg pardon, Charlie——" I hesitated, for a shade of annoyance had appeared on his face. "I mean, old man, don't honour me by a visit when you've got 'em coming on you."

"Tell me," he said eagerly, "what did my face look like just then?"

Digitized by Google

I examined his countenance steadily for a few seconds. No—he was not joking. The fellow was quite serious.

"You looked like—well, I can't tell you. Go out and have a Scotch."

"All right," he exclaimed, seizing his hat and going out.

I met him the next evening at the club—not the old one—but a more sedate one where the fellows talked about art and literature, and kindred subjects. We didn't tell blood curdlers there.

As soon as he caught sight of me, he ran to my side, and, shaking my hand heartily, exclaimed: "What rubbish did I favour you with last night, old man?"

"Oh, you talked the merest nonsense," I answered.

"You must forgive me," he said imploringly. "Take no notice of it—there's a good chap. I wasn't myself."

"No, you weren't yourself," I laughed, "and it's a good thing, too, for if you had been, I should have kicked you out! But, as it is, I always carry a loaded revolver on my person. The precaution is necessary when one associates with victims of heredity."

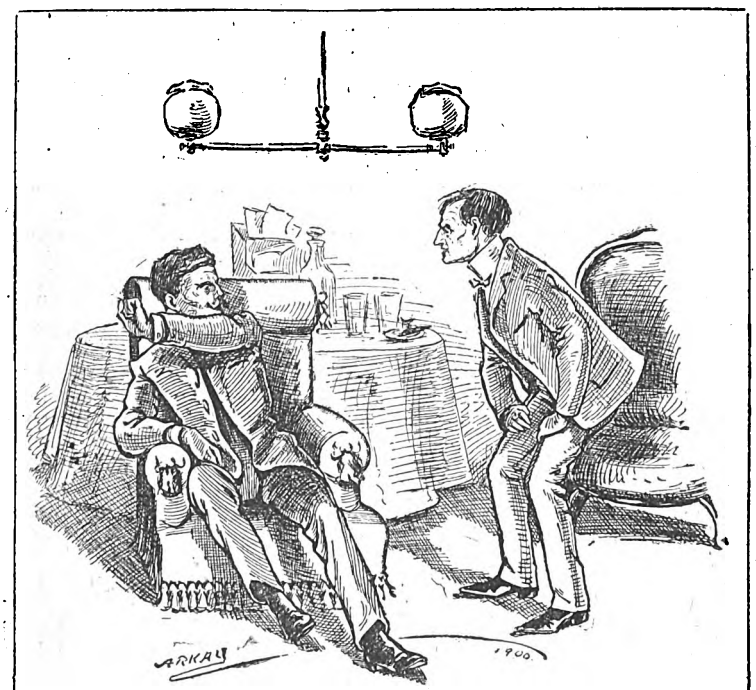
When I mentioned the weapon I thought his face grew hard and he bit his lips, but when I had finished, he appealed to me thus:

"Oh, don't be a fool — forgive me, won't you?"

"Certainly, my dear boy," said I, and the incident dropped. Shortly afterwards, we went out for a stroll. It was a fine, breezy night; the air was hard and cold; the moon raced across the heavens. and the street lamps shone through a haze of fog. Had we walked slowly, we must have been numbed with cold, for the frost bit to the bone, but we were young and impulsive, and covered the ground quickly.

On the Thames Embankment we paused for a moment and surveyed the shivering group of half-starved men and women, who were huddled together like a flock of sheep.

"Poor devils!" said Charlie, gazing at them. "Heaven only knows how they suffer. Born into a life where there is nothing but death for them. Death for their hopes—their poor, half-starved brats—and, presently, death for their own bodies. Just consider. These poor beggars never know what it is to smoke a cigar or gush over a book, or go to the theatre. Ugh! what a life!"



"Horrible!" I yelled at him. "Get out, you silly ass!"

As soon as Charlie started talking, the difficulty was to get him to stop. He was at all times a brilliant conversationalist, but I think he excelled himself that night. He rose to the heights previously unattainable. His flights of rhetoric still linger in my ears like an oft-recurring dream. I can hear him quote poetry by the canto, dwelling on the strongest parts like a child lingers over the name of the hero in a fable. If I had known what had happened before he met me that evening, I think I should still have admired him, only in that case it would be the sort of admiration which is compelled, not drawn—the fascination of the serpent that is ready to strike.

He seemed fresher, more buoyant than I had ever known him, and capable of saying something interesting about everything we saw. His fancy seemed heightened—freed from the dull influence of the body—and, as he talked, there passed before my mind's eye pictures of life in its broader aspects—life in climates that froze man to the marrow, or scorched his skin like parchment.

Death, that phantom of the night, posed before me for an instant, too, dark, and black-robed as usual. If Charlie could have sat down, and committed to paper the thoughts of his brain that night, the world of books would have been enriched.

We hailed a cab, and drove through crowded London. Away in the busy thoroughfares, the pulses beat quicker, the traffic moved to a livelier tune, and the scenes in my mental panorama shifted with ever increasing rapidity.

"What a number of people there are in London!" remarked Charlie rather insipidly after a silence which succeeded one of his loftiest flights.

"Yes," said I; and then I added, for sheer devilment, "Plenty for you to choose from."

I felt his grip on my arm grow tighter.

"What do you mean?" he said sharply.

"Oh," I said, "the other night you were talking of obeying the behests of your ancestors."

He made no reply to this sally, and just at the moment an incident occurred which diverted my thoughts. The newsboys were crying out something in their best style, and, judging from the vehemence with which the words were distributed, something extraordinary had occurred.

Wondering whether we were at war with a European coalition, or what other startling event had taken place, I leaned out and signalled to an urchin to bring me one.

"Last edition, sir!" cried the boy. "Horful murder in town! 'Scape of the miscreant!"

We stopped, and I purchased a paper.

I was about to open it when Charlie said "Don't be a fool! Why do you want to read that thing here?"

"Why not?" I said, wonderingly.

"You seem in a desperate hurry to read of the decease of one of your kind!" he growled, sulkily.

I took no notice of him, however, but went on reading. It appeared that a horrible murder had been committed in the open street in broad daylight that evening. The victim was a gentleman who was standing in his door, when a well-dressed man, in a brown suit, had rushed at him with the ferocity of a tiger, and smashed his skull with a loaded stick, or something of that nature.

Reeking with blood, the victim fell against the door, and the murderer, possessed by a thirst for blood, paused and drove a knife into the prostrate body up to the hilt, and then fled.

Despite all the efforts of Scotland Yard, the murderer was still at large, and the greatest indignation was felt by the populace.

I offered to read the paragraph out to Charlie, but he refused almost angrily, explaining that he never read a paper in the street.

"You shall read it at my place if you like, old man," he said, presently, when he was, apparently, in a better temper. "You'll come to supper with me, won't you?"

"I don't mind," I answered, and shortly afterwards we pulled up at his place in Grafton Square.

"Nice to have the house all to oneself, isn't it?" said Charlie, when we were seated indoors. "My landlady, bless her heart, has gone away for the day, and I'm all alone in my glory. Do you like sauce?"

"No thanks," said I.

"Do you know," said Charlie after supper, "I think you shall read that out to me now. I like to hear of such crimes, and I'll tell you why. We hear a lot of talk about the physical degeneration of the race, and all that sort of thing. Well, when a murder is committed it shows that the virility of the race is still existent. You see, it takes a bit of muscle and nerve to kill anybody. I've often thought, when reading an account of a brilliant bayonet charge by our fellows, what brutes they must be. Fancy an officer cutting a man's head off, or slashing the sword through flesh and sinew, and, shortly afterwards, coming home to a drawing-room and acting the gentleman! Why, it's a brutal game, take it at its best. Of course, mind you, if we hadn't the men to do it, we should be in a queer street, and it shows that the race is not losing fighting power. At the same time, what I'm trying to show is that physical ascendancy is a brutal and an ungodly thing."

"There may be something in what you say," I replied shortly.

"Now old man," said he, leaning back in his chair and smoking hard, "start away."

"What?" said I.

"Read that murder case out to me," said Charlie.

"Oh, I don't think I will, old chap," I answered. "The fact is, I don't like such gruesome details, and the subject is not pleasant. I'm afraid I'm a chicken-hearted fellow, Charlie."

"Oh, hang that!" he exclaimed. "Read it!"

"Excuse me," I answered; "I don't think you'd enjoy it."

"I know you're a chicken-hearted fellow," said Charlie, rising from his seat. "and that's the very reason why you shall read it. Start away!"

"Did you say shall read it?" I inquired; "because, if you did, you're forgetting yourself! I shall not read it!"

Charlie crossed the room at a bound.

"By Heaven! you shall read it!" he cried, his eyes dancing before me like burning coals.

I rose from my seat and faced him. His face was perspiring freely, and his hands were shaking with excitement.

"Sit down, old man," I said quietly; "you want a little drop of Scotch."

"Tom, you hear me," he cried. "I'll have that paper read! Your will is nothing to mine. I'm your master, this is my house, and I'll have my own way here!"

"You must be joking," said I. "Really, the joke has gone far enough. I know your penchant for practical jokes, but this is surely too much."

"Don't drive me to desperation, Tom," he cried, holding himself back with some difficulty. "Read it!"

"Look here,

Charlie," I said. "I know what a joke is and I understand a joker. But I give you fair warning. If you come a foot nearer I shall hit you between the eyes."

"What!" he roared, taking off his coat hurriedly. "You'll hit me! Why, I'll lay you out in two minutes!"

I did not take off my coat, but stood on the defensive.

"What is the matter with the man?" I exclaimed, and at that instant he startled me by shouting at the top of his voice: "I'll teach you to defy me! I've killed one man to-day, and I'm going to finish you this night!"

My head swam for just an instant, as I glanced at his clothes, and saw that they were brown — the same as described in the paper.

I strove to collect my scattered senses, and face the situation calmly.

I beat him down again, until I was sick of the work.

I was unarmed, whereas, doubtless, he had the knife I looked at his face and saw murder written there in plain letters.

He dashed the table out of his path and came rushing for me. I saw the glitter of steel. My hands flew instinctively to the nearest chair. I picked it up and swung it as he came, catching him full on the head and sending him down with a great clatter. He struggled to rise, but I beat him down again until I was sick of the work.

Ten minutes from the time he commenced I had him bound and helpless. I went out and sought a policeman. A tall man came up to the door.

"Have you seen a policeman about?" I asked.

"I'm a detective," he said. "Can I come in?"

I brought him in and showed him Charlie.

"I've been watching this house all the evening," he remarked. "I had suspicion, but could not take any decisive step without having more ground to work upon."

He stooped and felt in Charlie's pockets.

"Here's another knife, and there's blood on it," he said, drawing out a red-stained knife. "This is the one he used, no doubt."

Poor Charlie was hanged.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Fortune's Sport," by Mrs Williamson, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. James Chapman, Off Dewsbury Road, Hunslet, Leeds. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 26th. Post-cards only, please.

Not Enough Regret.

A DRILL instructor, who was the terror of every recruit, and the remorseless tyrant of the awkward squad, was putting a firing party through the funeral exercise. Having opened the ranks so as to admit the passage of the supposed cortège between them, the instructor ordered the men to rest on their arms reversed. Then, by way of practical explanation, he walked slowly down the lane formed by the two ranks, saying as he did so:

"Now, I am the corpse. Pay attention."

Having reached the end of the party, he turned round, regarded them steadily with scrutinising eye for a moment or two, and then remarked, in a somewhat solemn tone of voice:

"Your hands are right, and your heads are right, but you haven't got that look of regret that you ought to have." J. C.

A Steel Monopoly.

A COMPANY of an Irish regiment, now serving in South Africa, were fighting their way hand-to-hand through a village against stubborn resistance.

One man who had bayoneted his opponent, after vainly endeavouring to extract his bayonet, as a last resource, hurriedly placed a cartridge in his rifle and practically shot the man off.

One of the civil officers close by turned to him and expostulated with him for what he considered his brutality.

"Well, sor," replied the Irishman unabashed, looking round at his comrades in the thick of the fray, "I can't have this one man monopolising of my bayonet."

Archbishop Temple and the Pink Bedroom.

ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE on one occasion was entertained by a clergyman during the absence of the clergyman's wife. On leaving, the host politely expressed the hope that when next his lordship honoured the house Mrs. Temple would accompany him.

"No, thanks," the Archbishop laconically replied, "Mrs. Temple doesn't like roughing it."

The clergyman's feelings were deeply hurt, and he unburdened his soul to his wife on her return.

"Why, my dear," she exclaimed, "you didn't surely put the Bishop in the pink bedroom, did you?"

It appeared that he had.

"Oh, then, that's it! I put all the plate in that bed." W. E. T.

"Which One?"

A CLERGYMAN, who is a prison chaplain, tells the following good story about one of the prisoners:

"I entered the cell of a prisoner," said the chaplain, "a hardened-looking man, with a countenance not exactly beatific.

"'Ah, my good man,' I said, 'what would your poor wife say did she know you were here? But perhaps she knows of your terrible position?'"

"'Which one do you mean, guv'nor?' said the convict. 'I'm in for bigamy—hitched on to four of them!'"

A Yeomanry Anecdote.

To show the relative positions in life of members of yeomanry corps the following anecdote may be cited:

A regiment in the North on permanent duty were going recently through their movements when a private, not suiting his sergeant, the latter was reprimanded with:

"Private Jackson, if you don't pay more attention I shall report you."

The private rejoined:

"Aye, du it if thou dare, an' aw'll raise the' thy rent."

The effect may be imagined. J. C.

A Compromise.

AN ardent disciple of vegetarianism advertised recently for a servant, and stated that preference would be given to a girl willing to devote herself to the vegetarian creed of her mistress.

One shrewd applicant for the situation said:

"Well, ma'am, it's like this. I'm a Wesleyan myself, but I'm not what you'd call prejudiced against the Vegetarians, and I don't mind attending the Vegetarian Church once on a Sunday to please you!" W. C.

He Went.

NOT long ago a practical jokist conceived the idea of frightening passers through a country churchyard by dressing himself up as a ghost.

One night, about half-past eleven, a burly old farmer was coming along, when out jumped the apparition.

"Well, who are you?" asked the agriculturist.

The ghost wailed forth some sentence ending with "ghost."

"Now, look here," said the farmer, as he began to drop across him with a stick, "you clear off. It is time all you confounded ghosts were in bed."

The ghost went. E. N.

Shot by an "Ad."

At the time of the Maori War a friend of mine had a strange experience.

The publishing office of a local newspaper was close to the scene of some of the hottest fighting.

During the struggle the Maoris ran short of ammunition for their guns, and, raiding the newspaper offices, charged their guns with type and stereo-blocks.

This novel ammunition proved very effective. One of the white invaders was severely wounded with a patent medicine advertisement, another was crippled for life by a church bazaar announcement, and the editor, who had taken refuge with the British troops, had a narrow escape of being hit with one of his own poems!

A cabby was one day standing by his cab, when a Johnnie came up and stood quizzing at it, and the following conversation took place:

Johnnie: "Is that your cab?"

Cabby: "Yes."

Johnnie: "I thought it was a cats'-meat barrow."

Cabby: "And so will a lot more people if they see puppies smelling around. You will oblige me by shifting."

A Problem for the Police.

An American correspondent gives the following as an example of the rigid formality with which the officials in some parts of Russia act:

Russian Official: "You can't stay in this country, sir."

Traveller: "Then I'll leave it."

Official: "Have you a permit to leave?"

Traveller: "No, sir."

Official: "Then you cannot go. I give you twenty-four hours to make up your mind as to what you shall do."

A Man and His Wife.

An old story in a new guise is sent in by a reader.

A man was seen leaving his model dwelling, while from the window above his wife poured after him ceaseless volleys of what is politely known as "langwidge." But in the enthusiasm of her eloquence, she leaned out too far and fell on to the pavement. A horrified spectator hurried after the husband with the news. As he was breaking it, the man, with a face full of suppressed feeling, murmured, "Don't make me laugh; I've got a cracked lip."

The Time to Get Married.

They were talking about the Scriptures, and, of course, her knowledge of the Bible was proper and more accurate than his.

"In the Bible," said she, "one can find directions for conduct in all the circumstances of life."

"I'm afraid I can't accept that proposition," said he.

"Why not?"

"Where does it tell one when to get married?"

"It says that now is the accepted time," replied she demurely. Subsequent events proved that she was right.

Burst from Bondage (a Novel).

He was immured in the darkest dungeon beneath the castle moat.

"If I had only a saw, a file—anything," he moaned as he looked at the solid bars across the solitary window.

Then an idea struck him.

His face brightened up like a warehouse conflagration.

Rapidly running over his supply of collars which had just come from the laundry, he selected one fitted for his purpose.

Five minutes later the great middle bar of the window, dexterously severed by the sawlike edge of the laundered collar, fell apart.

He was free!

All She Required.

A certain shopwalker in a large establishment is noted for his severity to those under him in business. One day he approached a junior assistant from whose counter a lady had just moved away.

"You let that lady go without making a purchase?" he asked severely.

"Yes, sir, I——"

"And she was at your counter fully ten minutes?"

"Doubtless, but then you see——"

"Exactly. I saw that, in spite of all the questions she put to you, you rarely answered her, and never attempted to get what she wanted."

"Well, but——"

"I shall report your carelessness."

"Well, I hadn't what she wanted."

"What was that?"

"Half-a-crown. She's a book canvasser, getting subscribers to the 'Life of Moses.'"

And the shopwalker retired crestfallen.

Character Not Good.

In some rural districts of England there are held annually hiring fairs, where farmers and others attend to engage servants.

At one held in Gloucestershire last autumn a farmer opened negotiations with a lad who seemed suitable for his purpose. Various questions having been asked and answered, the farmer inquired at last:

"Hast got a character from thy last place?"

"No," replied the boy; "but my old gaffer be about somewhere, and I can get he to write I one."

"Very well," was the reply, "thee get it and meet I here again at four o'clock."

The time came, so did the farmer and the boy.

"Hast got thy character?" was the query.

The answer came short and sharp:

"No; but I ha' got thine, and I bean't a-coming."

The Boers' Irish Brigade.

A corporal in the Scots' Fusiliers, writing to his brother in Coventry from Frere Camp, says:

"Just before the battle the Irish Brigade (Boers' side) sent a note to our Dublin Fusiliers saying that they would be glad to get the opportunity to wipe them (the Dublin Fusiliers) off the face of the earth; but the note was returned by the Dublins to say that they would walk through the Irish Brigade as the devil did through Athlone."

BARTY'S BOLD VENTURE.

THE Rev. Marsden Tracey rang the bell violently:

"James, summon the servants into this room at once."

"All of 'em, sir?"

"Yes, all of them. And James, are there any others in the kitchen?"

"Only Sir Reginald's coachman, and Mr. Austley's groom, sir."

"Send them here as well."

In a few minutes a somewhat disorderly procession, blinking with astonishment, straggled into the room, headed by James the white-haired butler, and brought up in the rear by the odd boy, whose whimsical face was sicklied over with a look of dismay.

"My dear," continued the vicar, speaking to his wife, "will you request Miss Macalister to join us. If Mary is not asleep, she must do without her nurse for a time." Then he turned to a lady of striking appearance, and said: "Madame, may I ask you to summon Annette?"

"No! No!" she began, with an excited gesture, "there is no need to send for Annette, dear sir; she has been with me for twenty years, and I will answer for——"

"Pardon me, madame," interrupted the vicar in a decisive tone, "but she must be present."

In response to a call, a tall, thin woman of foreign air, and with a nose so large that it was a limb rather than a feature, came into the room. As soon as she entered, the vicar locked the door, and put the key in his pocket.

"A very serious thing has happened," he said. "Madame Benedetti has lost her diamond cross, the gift of the Emperor, Alexander the Second."

Sir Reginald lifted his eyebrows, and a low murmur of consternation came from the assembled domestics.

"Madame tells me that she promised to show it and other of her presents, to the ladies after dinner. For this reason her maid left it in its case on the dressing-table, and when she came up for it after dinner, discovered that it was no longer in the room.

"Someone must have taken it during the time we were at dinner, or soon after. Can any of you offer any explanation as to its disappearance?"

"I don't think anyone in the kitchen could have took it, sir," said the kindly old cook; "we haven't had a minute to spare to go upstairs if we wanted."

"Speak for yourself, Mary," said her master sharply. "Again I ask, can anyone explain this matter? because with the permission of my guests, I propose to have every inmate of the house at the present time searched. As no one speaks, may I beg you, madame, as the one person beyond suspicion, to put on your cloak and go to the police, which is just above this house, and desire Inspector Walsh and his wife to come here at once."

We looked at each other in bewilderment, not unmixed with suspicion. A short time before we had been honoured guests—now we were apparently under police surveillance.

Until this sudden transition, the dinner-party had been a brilliant success. The vicar had been quite at his best. Musician, novelist and parish priest, with an unrivalled acquaintance with the foibles of men and women, he had maintained his reputation as one of the most entertaining men in England.

But the bright, particular star of the evening was his friend, the famous cantatrice Madame Benedetti—most seraphic of singers and most good natured of women. She had promised to sing for us, and so anxious were we to listen to that superb voice, that when the mystic nod had been given by Mrs. Tracey, which is the signal that sends the female fleet sailing out of the room, we had not hesitated to follow at once to the drawing-room.

Trained to observe the faces of people, I had noticed a change in Madame Benedetti's expression upstairs. She looked concerned and annoyed, and subsequent events showed that her countenance faithfully reflected her feelings. She had discovered the loss of those famous diamonds which were as familiar to concert-goers as the ample form upon which they rested.

In due course madame returned, accompanied by Inspector Walsh and his diminutive wife. One by one the guests were taken into the smoke-room or the library, and as the footman expressed it, "were turned inside out." Then, in their turn, the servants had to submit their persons to a rigorous search. A kitchen-maid promptly went into hysterics, declaring herself to be as innocent of the theft as that metaphorical personage the "babe unborn." Mr. Austley's groom, too, showed a suspicious unwillingness to yield himself to the inquisitive fingers of the Inspector; but the investigation revealed nothing more detrimental to his credit than half a roasted chicken.

The precious stones remaining undiscovered, other police were introduced into the house, and all its chambers and appurtenances were subjected to the most vigorous scrutiny. Even the bed-chamber to which my patient, Miss Forrest—the consumptive niece of Mrs. Tracy, had been confined during the day by illness, was not exempt from a careful search.

Many curious things came to light, but not the diamond cross. That magnificent piece of jewellery, valued at six thousand pounds, which had marked the admiration of the Emperor of All the Russias for the genius of Madame Benedetti, had disappeared as completely as though the brilliants had burnt themselves up in the light of their own sparkling.

By the vicar's advice, a reward of one hundred pounds was offered for information which should lead to the conviction of the thief. Still nothing was heard, and in two or three weeks more, the sensation of the hour had passed into the limbo of forgotten things.

About two months after this piece of excitement, as I drove in from the country, I noticed that Blind Barty's pitch was vacant: yet it was Saturday evening—his busiest time. The weather, too, was eminently suited to the calling of a mendicant, but Barty's wizened little figure and unshaven face—not omitting the moving legend he wore suspended round his neck—were nowhere to be seen. As his medical adviser, and as one well acquainted with his habits, I wondered what had become of him.

Although Barty could not look on the wine when it was red, he knew its taste particularly well. Once in his cups, he had walked off the quay into the river, and had been with difficulty rescued and resuscitated. With unconscious humour he ascribed his mis-chance to the fact that the riverside was "badly lighted." At various times, while "on the spree" as his wife called it, he had fallen down an area, been run over by a green-grocer's cart, and collided with innumerable lamp posts. Many and dishonourable scars attested the number and variety of his injuries and escapades.

Fearing lest he had come to grief, I alighted from my dog-cart, and made my way along the narrow street in which he lived. As I drew near his cottage, the door opened, and a small boy darting out, headed with precipitate swiftness in the direction of the police-station. From the interior of the house came a loud, thick bellowing, mingled with voices of wailing and lamentation. As I came up to his house I saw a boot come through a window, narrowly missing a spectator's head. The blind man was busy, pelting his family circle with any minor article of furniture which came readily to hand, while his curses would have brought a blush to the face of the Foul Fiend Himself.

These disturbances were not unusual, poverty or riches would produce them. If his harvest of coppers had been abnormally plentiful, or if the British public had passed his money-box unheedingly by—in either case he was apt to become riotous, and show a reckless disregard for his household goods.

To-night, Barty appeared to be entering into the festivities with more than usual zest. As I entered, a piece of coal struck the wall near me, and exploded like a shell. He turned fiercely towards me, and then began to grope for another lump of coal with which to salute what he took to be the constable who usually ministered to him on these occasions.

At the sound of my voice he ceased his labours, and allowed himself to be led to his seat by the fireside. Turning his sightless eyes in my direction, he said: "It ain't drink this time, Doctor."

"Well, what is it this time," I demanded sternly—"madness—or have you come into a fortune?"

"That's just it, Doctor," he said, rising in his excitement, and standing with his hands grasping the arms of his chair: "I 'ave come into a fortune. I've nobbled the one hundred pounds! Yes: the whole bloomin' lot! I feels that pleased that I must do something."

Then I understood the meaning of Blind Barty's demonstrations.

"Man!" I burst out, "is this really true?"

"The Inspector said the money was as good as in my pocket," he replied. "Besides," Barty went on convincingly, "she has confessed."

"She?" I ejaculated, and my mind reverted immediately to the woman of the immense nose, and of the eyes set closely together. I had distrusted her from the first.

"Tell me all about it."

Barty drew a packet of cigarettes from his pocket, and I waited with the utmost impatience whilst the blind man selected his weed, and proceeded to destroy the scientific theory that the raison d'être of smoking lies in being able to see the curling fumes.

"I'm just thinkin', doctor, what a wise chap I was to keep my own counsel," and he gave a nod worthy of Lord Burleigh.

"There's no need to keep it now," I said: "go on."

He gave a grin which displayed his sunken gums to the worst possible advantage, and went on:

"You remember the night of the Vicar's dinner-party, sir?"

"I have every reason to do so," I answered.

"It was a Friday, at the tail end of October, and a cold, damp evening with falling sleet. I was late that night, and chilled to the bone. Although it was after nine o'clock, my boy George hadn't come to take me home, and I was trying to keep myself warm with thoughts of how I should punch that young rascal's head for leaving his poor blind father so long in the cold. It's the way with them boys doctor; let them get their nose outside the——"

"Yes! yes!" I interposed, "but to your story."

"I was a-goin' to tell you," he went on deliberately, "that I was waiting there when I heard someone walking up and down on the other side of the street, and by-and-bye the gent comes across and he says to me:

"'Why the deuce don't you go home on a night like this, and go to bed?' and he chucks a sixpence into my

box. Before I could tell him about my boy George, he turns away and walks up the street again.

"D'reckly after, I hears someone else coming along from the Vicarage way, and two of 'em stops. The gentleman as gave me the tanner says:

"'Have you got it?'

"Then he laughs and say's: 'By Jove! you are a good 'un. Come down here,' and they comes across the road and goes down Brewer's Hill just behind where I was standing.

"Next day I heeard all about the robbery, and I says to myself—I'll bet my life the chap as gave me the sixpence is in it. When they told me there was a reward of one hundred pounds, I kept my ears pretty wide open I can tell you, for I knew I could swear to his voice anywhere."

"But, why in the name of fortune did you not communicate with the police?" I inquired.

Barty—the truth must be told—spat upon the ground violently; "Not any police for me, thankee. If I told them anything about it, they'd only go and muddle it. If they did happen to tumble on the man by mistake, they'd collar the reward—not me."

"But you told me just now it was a woman who confessed."

"So it were. I'm a-leanin' up to that. This afternoon I was at my pitch, when all at once I heard the same steps that I heard two months ago, but the steps of the other party, d'ye understand, not the gent's."

"Do you mean to say you can recognise people by their steps?"

"Yes;" he answered with an air of triumph, "as easily as you can their faces. I knowed the steps, because the party walked in a dragging sort of way, and because she was wearing them india-rubber things for keeping out the wet, just as she did on the night when the things were took.

"Well, I knowed it was the same person by the walk and the jemimos, but I was certain I was right when I heeard her cough. I noticed it that fust night—not what we calls a churchyard cough, but a reg'lar tearing cough, as makes you sorry for anyone as has it.

"She was on my side of the road, and—I don't know what made me do it, doctor—as she goes by me, I puts out my hand like this and catches her by the dress, and I says: 'Stop! What about them diamonds at the Vicarage?'

"She gave a sort of screech that made my blood run cold, and falls on the pavement. Then a crowd came around, and I was so turrified that I didn't know my own name for a minute or two. Very soon a constable comes, and someone tells him that I had assaulted a lady and knocked her down. I was more turrified than ever. But when the Inspector comes up, I sticks to my story, and he says: 'Barty, there's something in this,' and he takes the lady back to the place she'd come from.

"In a bit he comes back to me and he says: 'You've done the trick this time, Barty, for the lady has admitted that she took the diamonds.' So I shuts up shop for the day, and when I gets back to my old woman, I admit my feelings were too much for me."

Leaving the blind man to chuckle over his good fortune, I went on to my house, to find the Vicar at the front door, alternately plucking the door handle and pounding with the knocker.

"My niece is dying!" he said; and without another word, we tore through the streets to the Vicarage.

Our speed availed us nothing, for an attack of hœmorrhage—the result of weakness and excitement—had mercifully released the unfortunate girl from the need of appearing at the bar of an earthly court of justice.

Questioned by her aunt, she had admitted that whilst the guests were at dinner, she had risen from her bed, abstracted the diamonds from the diva's room, put on her macintosh and overshoes and had gone out to meet someone whose name she resolutely declined to disclose, but to whom she had "lent" the jewels to save him from ruin.

"Someone I love," she said, passionately, in answer to inquiries as to the man's identity.

Her failing strength forbade those about her to press her further with questions, and she died without having spoken the word they wished.

A few days after Miss Forrest's death, a package came to her, addressed in the handwriting of her scapegrace cousin, the son of the Vicar's only brother. It contained Madame Benedetti's diamond cross and a letter:

"My Dearest Old Girl,

"I have landed my coup at last, and have got into still waters again—for a time at any rate. I released the valuables from old Levenstein yesterday, and send them on to you. The old rascal grinned when he handed them back: I rather think he suspected something.

"I shall never forget how splendidly you got me out of the tightest corner I was ever in in my life.

"In haste, with heaps of love,

"Yours ever,

"Frank.

P. S. "You can easily put the cross in some place where it will be 'discovered.' Burn this as usual."

THE ANGEL OF THE REVOLUTION

By GEORGE GRIFFITH

CHAPTER LXX.

THE MORROW OF THE STRIFE.

SHORTLY after noon on the following day the Ithuriel, with Natas, Natasha, Arnold, and Tremayne on board, rose into the air from the grounds of Buckingham Palace and headed away to the northward. The control of affairs was left for the time being to a committee of the members of what had once been the Inner Circle of the Terrorists, and which was now the Supreme Council of the Federation.

This was under the joint presidency of Alexis Mazanoff and Nicholas Roburoff, who was exerting his great and well-proved administrative abilities to the utmost in order to atone for the fault which had led to the desertion of the Lucifer, and to amply justify the intercession of Natasha which had made it possible for him to be present at the last triumph of the Federation and the accomplishment of the long and patient work of the Brotherhood.

There was an immense amount of work to be got through in the interval between the pronouncement of the judgment of Natas on the Czar and his Ministers and the execution of the sentence. After twenty-four hours in Newgate they were transferred to Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, and there, under a guard of Federation soldiers, who never left them for a moment day or night, they awaited the hour of their departure to Siberia.

Communication with all parts of the Continent and America was rapidly restored. The garrisons of the League were withdrawn from the conquered cities, gave up their arms at the depôts of their respective regiments, and returned to their homes. The French and Italian troops round London were disarmed and taken to France in the Federation fleet of transports. Meanwhile three air-ships were placed temporarily at the disposal of the Emperor of Austria, the Kaiser, and the King of Italy, to convey them to their capitals, and furnish them with the means of speedy transit about their dominions, and to and from London during the drawing up of the new European Constitution.

A fleet of four air-ships and fifteen aerostats was also despatched to the Russian capital, and compelled the immediate surrender of the members of the Imperial family and the ministers of the Government, and the instant disarmament of all troops on Russian soil, under pain of immediate destruction of Petersburg and Moscow, and invasion and conquest of the country by the Federation Armies. The Council of State and the Ruling Senate were then dissolved, and the executive passed automatically into the hands of the controllers of the Federation.

Resistance was of course out of the question, and as soon as it was once known that the Czar had been taken prisoner and his army annihilated, no one thought seriously of it, as it would have been utterly impossible to have defended even Russia against the overwhelming forces of the Federation and the British Empire, assisted by the two aerial fleets.

The Ithuriel after a flight of a little more than an hour, stopped and descended to the earth on the broad, sloping, and now snow-covered lawn in front of Alanmere Castle. Lord Marazion and his daughter, who as it is almost needless to say, had been kept well-informed of the course of events since the Federation forces landed in England, had also been warned by telegraph of the coming of their aerial visitors, and before the Ithuriel had touched the earth, the new mistress of Alanmere had descended the steps of the terrace that ran the whole length of the castle front, to welcome its lord and hers back to his own again.

Then there were greetings of lovers and friends, well known to each other by public report and familiar description, yet never seen in the flesh till now, and of others long parted by distance and by misconception of aims and motives. But however pleasing it might be to dwell at length upon the details of such a meeting, and its delightful contrast to the horrors of unsparing war and merciless destruction, there is now no space to do so, for the original limits of this history of the near future have already been reached and overpassed, and it is time to make ready for the curtain to descend upon the last scenes of the world-drama of the Year of Wonders—1904.

Tremayne was the first to alight, and he was followed by Natasha and Arnold at a respectful distance, which they kept until the first greeting between the two long and strangely-parted lovers was over. When at length Lady Muriel got out of the arms of her future lord she at once ran to Natasha with both her hands outstretched, a very picture of grace and health and blushing loveliness.

She was Natasha's other self, saving only for the incomparable brilliance of colouring and contrast which the daughter of Natas derived from her union of eastern and western blood. Yet no fairer type of purely English beauty than Muriel Penarth could have been found between the Border and the Land's End, and what she lacked of Natasha's half Oriental brilliance and fire she atoned for by an added measure of that indescribable blend of dignity and gentleness which makes the English gentlewoman perhaps the most truly lovable of all women on earth.

"I could not have believed that the world held two such lovely women," said Arnold to Tremayne, as the two girls met and embraced. "How marvellously alike they are, too! Surely there must be some relationship. They might be sisters?"

"Yes, I am sure they are," replied Tremayne. "Such a resemblance cannot be accidental. I remember in that queer double life of mine, when I was your unconscious rival, I used to interchange them until they almost seemed to be the same identity to me. There is some little mystery behind the likeness which we shall have cleared up before very long now. Natas told me to take Lord Marazion to him in the saloon, and said he would not enter the castle till he had spoken with him alone. There he is at the door! You go and make Muriel's acquaintance, and I will take him on board at once."

So saying, Tremayne ran up the Terrace steps, shook hands heartily with the old nobleman, and then came down with him towards the air-ship. As they met Lady Muriel coming up with Arnold on one side of her and Natasha on the other, Lord Marazion stopped suddenly with an exclamation of wonder. He took his arm out of Tremayne's, strode rapidly to Natasha, and, before his daughter could say a word of introduction, put his hands on her shoulders, and looked into her lovely upturned face through a sudden mist of tears that rose unbidden to his eyes.

"It is a miracle!" he said in a low voice that trembled with emotion. "If you are the daughter of Natas there is no need to tell me who he is, for you are Sylvia Penarth's daughter too. Is not that so, Sylvia di Murska—for I know you bear your mother's name?"

"Yes I bear her name—and my father's. He is waiting for you in the air-ship, and he has much to say to you. You will bring him back to the castle with you, will you not?"

Natasha spoke with a seriousness more weighty than her words, but Lord Marazion understood her meaning. He stooped down and kissed her on the brow, saying:

"Yes, yes. The past is the past. I will go to him, and you shall see us come back together."

"And so we are cousins!" exclaimed Lady Muriel, slipping her arm round Natasha's waist as she spoke. "I was sure we must be related to each other, for though I am not so beautiful——"

"Don't talk nonsense, or I shall call you Your Ladyship for the rest of the day. Yes, of course we are alike, since our mothers were twin-sisters, and the very image of each other, according to their portraits."

While the two girls were talking of their new-found relationship, Arnold had dropped behind to wait for Tremayne, who, after he had taken Lord Marazion into the saloon of the Ithuriel, left him with Natas, and returned to the castle alone.

That evening, when the lamps were lit and the curtains drawn in the library at Alanmere, the same room in which Tremayne had seen the Vision of Armageddon, Natas told again and for the last time the story of Israel di Murska, the Jewish-Hungarian merchant, and Sylvia Penarth, his beautiful English wife, whom he had loved better than his own faith and people, and whose awful fate was now avenged as no human wrong had ever been avenged before.

He told, too, how he had taken his child-daughter out of the keeping of his wife's sister and her husband in order that he might educate her as an instrument of vengeance on his enemies, and of the old quarrel, now healed after twenty years of bitterness, which had arisen from this cause when he devoted her young life to conspiracy and plotting instead of letting her take her place in the world in which Lady Muriel had grown up.

He told, too, without the slightest reserve, how he had cast his spell over Tremayne and subjugated his will to his own purposes, and how he had intended to bind him for ever to the Brotherhood by giving Natasha to him in marriage, when "the Fates willed it otherwise," as he said in concluding his story, "and I was saved from doing a great wrong, for the intention to do which I have done my best to atone."

He paused for a moment and looked across the fireplace at Arnold and Natasha, who were sitting together on a big, low lounge that had been drawn up to the fire. Natasha raised her eyes for a moment and then dropped them. She knew what was coming, and a bright red flush rose up from her white throat to the roots of her dusky, lustrous hair.

"Richard Arnold, in the first communication I ever had with you I told you that if you used the powers you held in your hand well and wisely you should, in the fulness of time, attain to your heart's desire. You have proved your faith and obedience in the hour of trial and your strength and discretion in the day of battle. Now it is yours to ask and to have."

For all answer Arnold put out his hand and took hold of Natasha's, and said quietly:

"Give me this!"

"So be it!" said Natas. "What you have worthily won you will worthily wear. May your days be long and peaceful in the world to which you have given peace!"

And so it came to pass that three days later, in the little private chapel of Alanmere Castle, the two men who held the destinies of the world in their hands took to wife the two fairest women who ever gave their loveliness to be the crown of strength and the reward of loyal love.

For a week the Lord of Alanmere kept open house and royal state, as his ancestors had done five hundred years before him. The conventional absurdity of the honeymoon was ignored, as such brides and bridegrooms might have been expected to ignore it. Arnold and Natasha took possession of a splendid suite of rooms in the eastern wing of the castle, and the two new-wedded couples passed the first days of their new happiness under one roof without the slightest constraint; for the castle was vast enough for solitude when they desired it, and yet the solitude was not isolation or self-centred seclusion.

Tremayne's private wire kept them hourly informed of what was going on in London, and when necessary the Ithuriel was ready to traverse the space between Alanmere and the capital in an hour, as it did more than once, to the great delight and wonderment of Tremayne's bride to whom the marvellous vessel seemed a miracle of something more than merely human skill and genius.

So the days passed swiftly and happily until the Christmas bells of 1904 rang out over the length and breadth of Christendom, for the first time proclaiming in very truth and fact, so far as Christendom was concerned, "Peace on earth and Good-will to Man."

* * * * *

But in the East the red tide of battle was still surging fiercely to and fro as the swarthy hosts of the Moslems fought their way through and through the countless swarms of Mongols that kept pouring eastward only to die like flies in innumerable multitudes before the irresistible tempest of valour and enthusiasm that the raising of the Banner of the Prophet had let loose upon them.

The Council of the Anglo-Saxon Federation, well aware that no peaceful arguments would have any weight with these fiery warriors, drunk with battle and mad with triumph, had decided to let the Moslem and the Buddhist fight out the Armageddon of the East between them until the fittest survived.

All the approaches to Europe were rigidly guarded to prevent any incursion. The Mediterranean was patrolled by dynamite cruisers, which permitted no Turkish vessels, or, indeed, any that did not fly the Federation flag in addition to its own, to pass between Europe and Asia or Africa. The Dardanelles, the Bosphorus, and the Black Sea were held by an overwhelming naval force, and four millions of men were kept under arms ready to be concentrated at any point at which the hosts of Sultan Mohammed Reshad might approach too near to the area of Federation control.

Malcolm's Christmas.

It was six o'clock on a cold November evening; snow lay on the ground; a few flakes were falling through the clear air.

Before a mansion in Park Lane a gentleman paced irresolute; his eyes dwelt anxiously upon one window in particular, across which the shadow of a woman was sometimes thrown.

Presently a hand drew back the curtain, and a face looked out into the street.

"She is not looking for me," said he, bitterly. "Ah! how shall I tell her?"

He almost staggered as he mounted the steps to the door, and even then stood irresolute, latchkey in hand, ere he entered the house.

"Is that you, Malcolm?" said a sweet voice.

"Yes, I am late."

"Then you must make haste; we dine out to-night."

The speaker came forward to the lighted hall; a beautiful woman, whose exquisite toilette glittered with gems. He turned from the vision with something like a shudder.

"How shall I tell her?" he murmured, as he wearily mounted the stairs.

He rang the bell as he entered his room.

"Tell Mrs. Hastings I am indisposed. I shall not be able to accompany her this evening."

The message sent, he sat down and buried his face in his hands.

His thoughts roved idly to the vision of his youth, in which he, supremely happy in a loving wife, hewed down every obstacle in his path and made himself a famous man. What was the reality he bitterly asked himself.

He had deliberately married a woman who had frankly assured him she could never love him—he had thought he could give all and demand nothing in exchange.

He shuddered as he recalled the loneliness and dreariness of the one year of married life.

A knock at the door interrupted these reflections; his wife stood there as he answered the summons, and his eyes, blinded by her dazzling beauty, discerned no new expression in the haughty face.

"You are ill?"

He did not reply; he stood looking down on her as one in a dream.

"Your room here is cold!" she said. "It is a bitter night. Will you not come to my boudoir? The fire is pleasant there."

He stared at her, then shook his head. "I have often told you," he said with scorn, "that I cannot breathe in such luxurious surroundings. My tastes are simple."

She glanced round the room, which, in comparison with hers, was simplicity itself.

"Then if I cannot do anything for you," she began——

"The carriage is waiting, madam," said a servant approaching.

"I shall return early," she said. "Au revoir."

Again he was left to his bitter thoughts. Too restless to keep still he wandered about the house from one magnificent room to another. At length he entered the boudoir, in the furnishing of which an expensively artistic taste was visible. He cast a scornful look on the luxurious room.

"It smothers one," he muttered.

His eyes, which restlessly wandered from one thing to another, now rested on a half-finished portrait, which, short-sighted though he was, he perceived to be a man's face. For a long time he hesitated to approach nearer. It was mean to take advantage of his wife's absence; yet as he thought thus, he moved forward, and peered into the pictured face. He started back in intense surprise—the colour rushed over his face.

"Do you think it good?" his wife's voice said at his side. For the hours had passed, and she had returned, and he was now looking at it for the tenth time.

"I am too much surprised at your choice of a subject to give a critical opinion," he replied.

"Your head makes a fine study," she replied calmly.

He bit his lip, with a cruel sense of her coldness.

"You are surprised to find me here?"

"A little. But come to the fire; you have a thoroughly chilled appearance. Stephen tells me you have not dined. I have ordered a light repast for you. You can take it here."

He was conscious of feeling cold and faint. She drew him forward to an easy chair; and, the tray, with food and wine, appearing as though by magic, he found himself eating and drinking at her request, and he glanced up more than once inquiringly into her eyes. He read nothing there to lighten his heart.

She took up a piece of embroidery and sewed diligently.

"By the way," she remarked, in a casual manner, "is it true that the Middleton Bank has stopped payment? Have you not shares in it?"

He made no reply. Her eyes met his with some anxiety.

"My whole fortune was invested there," he replied.

"Then you are ruined?" she said calmly.

"Utterly."

Both were silent then. Isabel's eyes glanced round the luxurious room, then she looked at her husband.

"I suppose it will not affect any of my personal property," she said anxiously. "You do not know. I believe that my Uncle Herbert, who died a week ago, has left me his house."

"No! I was not aware of it. Where is it?"

MERIT REWARDED.

That real merit is the outstanding feature of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies is a statement which is capable of easy and abundant proof. The fact that so many thousands of consumers continue to buy them year after year speaks volumes for their worth, and is a reward which only attaches to merit. Chivers' Jellies are prepared in a healthy Cambridgeshire village, by up-to-date methods, with the most scrupulous cleanliness and care, and flavoured with ripe fruit juices. The high class quality and delicious fruity flavour of these dainties gives immense satisfaction all round. Here is a tribute from a Free Church Minister: "We have tried many other kinds of Jelly, but have long decided to speculate no more, as we have been disappointed each time. We really find none like Chivers'." A Wholesale Grocer writes: "I have just been testing other Jellies which have been sent to me for trial, and have decided that no other Jelly can compare with Chivers' both for texture and flavour." A lady says: "Without a fault, simply perfection." Another lady remarks: "I have not found any so good as yours." Here is the testimony of The Lancet: "An excellent Jelly possessing a flavour of quite a natural character."

Sold by Grocers and Stores in packets, Half-pints 2½d., Pints 4½d., Quarts 8d. A free sample will be sent on receipt of post-card. S. Chivers & Sons, Histon, Cambridge. Please mention this paper.

"Oh! A farm right in the country," she replied, flushing under his intent gaze.

"You will not be destitute then, even if I fail to earn money at once," he said with keen sarcasm.

"That is well," she said quietly.

"You were frank when I asked you to marry me. You said you would do so to escape poverty—to assure yourself a life of luxury—you said I was not the type of man you could ever love."

"Have you remembered my foolish words?" she said flushing.

He laughed bitterly.

"A man does not easily forget such words as these," he said. "On my part, I promised never to obtrude my love for you."

"I absolve you from any idea that you have ever done so," she replied coldly.

"I promised to keep you as a princess; you were only to wish, and your wishes should be fulfilled. Have I hitherto kept my promise?"

"Every tangible wish has been gratified," she said gravely.

"At least you do me justice," he said, rising to his feet. "But now the failure of this bank makes it impossible to me to continue my practice of forestalling your wishes."

"You will have to give up this house?"

"Certainly; it takes a princely income to keep up."

"Will everything have to be sold?"

"Everything of value belongs to my creditors."

There was a silence.

"I have not had time to think. Possibly I may try my luck in Canada as soon as I can make arrangements for your comfort here."

"It would be a good plan," she remarked quietly. "You appear to like an outdoor life. You enjoy farming, do you not?"

"My father was a farmer. I inherit an instinct for outdoor pursuits."

She yawned a little and looked bored. He hastily rose and went away, bitterly hurt.

"At last!" she cried triumphantly, "at last!"

She sang a little roulade as she moved about the room. He heard it in the distance.

"She can sing when I am in such trouble. It is too cruel!"

* * * * *

A few days later he found her busied in packing her trunks.

"I am going to make a few visits while you are arranging for the sale," she said. "You may not hear from me for a few weeks, but I shall be safe and in good hands."

There was a pitiful appeal in his eyes—which might have gone to the heart of any woman—not to desert him in this bitter hour. His lips moved voicelessly, as if he would have made an appeal. She turned away, and went on with her packing.

When he came that evening she was gone. Every little token of her personal presence had vanished as though it had never been there. He received two short letters during the next few weeks; just an assurance that she was comfortably situated.

As she gave him no address he did not attempt to answer her letters. Two days before Christmas he received another letter from her.

"I am in a village called Shepstone," she wrote. "It is important to my comfort than you come to me at once. Catch the three o'clock train from Euston. A trap will be waiting for you. Come to-morrow—Christmas Eve."

He had just time to catch the train, for the letter had been delayed on its road to him. As he dashed on through the gathering gloom he mused sadly enough on his future. The heart seemed gone from his efforts to begin life again. For whom should he work? For a woman whose whole soul was wrapt up in self, in love of ease and luxury?

"I am the kind of man no woman would love," he said to himself. "Yet I am not without the qualities which should command esteem. I am incapable of an insincerity; to love once is to love eternally with me. Should I have done the bidding of this calm, selfish woman to-night did I love her less?"

Arrived at Shepstone he was instantly accosted by a man, who said he had brought a trap to meet him. Then he was driven swiftly for miles over the hard frozen roads through country enveloped in snow—too moody in humour to care to talk to his silent driver.

At length they entered a private drive, and presently reached a little cluster of buildings.

"That's the house—where you see them lights; she has lights in every window," said the man as he drove to the door of a quaint, old-fashioned farmhouse. The door opened as if by magic, and Malcolm stumbled blindly into the lighted hall. The door closed behind him.

"Welcome home, dear Malcolm," said a sweet voice at his side. His beautiful wife stood there, her eyes dancing with fun—and—what else did Malcolm begin to read in those lustrous eyes?

"Isabel!" he cried. He suddenly bent down over her—as her soft arms clasped his neck.

"Oh, Isabel! am I dreaming?" he cried, as he clasped her close.

"Take of this big coat," she replied, "and come into the kitchen. Do you think you could eat your supper just once in the kitchen, Malcolm—because you know I am going to cook it for you."

"Only tell me where we are. Is this Heaven—have we died suddenly—or am I wandering in dreams of bliss that might be mine—if—if—Isabel loved me?"

"There is no if," she said, drawing him to the glowing fire. "Oh! my love—how blind you have been. I have loved you for many a long month—but how could I tell you so—when you would believe I cared only for the presents you lavished upon me. Malcolm, this is my home, and I give it to you, it is Uncle Herbert's old farm and homestead. Won't this do as well as going out to Canada. He died leaving me this and all his immense wealth—wealth no one dreamed of his possessing."

"This is indeed a blessed Christmas Eve," said Malcolm, unwilling to lose his wife for an instant from his sight—and following her from pantry to kitchen as she bustled about her housewifely duties.

Ah! What an hour of bliss followed the cosy supper—how much to tell, how much to hear, what arrears of loving confidences to be made up.

And what a Christmas day was that which followed—what a truly divine service that which they so gratefully attended in the morning!

Blissfully, the day sped by—and plans for the future and bright visions of the happiness to be theirs filled their cup to the brim.

God speed them in their journey onward—sorrows will pass lightly over their heads, for they love one another.

The Brain Gymnasium.

ON this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors, with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set are comparatively easy of solution, while others are designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the sender of the greatest number of correct solutions, and to the senders of the ten next highest number of correct ones will be presented either one of our silver-plated pencil cases or a copy of a popular six-shilling novel. Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, March 5th, 1900.

NOT HEAVY TO HIM.

The man on the elephant's back is nothing to the elephant. The big beast doesn't mind him any more than one of those immense dray horses you see in London minds the brass ornaments on his harness. Yet on my back or yours the man would be a load; and, if fastened to a lark's wings, the little brasses would hold him to the earth.

Thus, we are reminded, my thoughtful friends, that there are no absolute facts. The burden depends on the back. Albeit Samson walked off with the gates of Gaza, an ordinary garden gate would, I am sure, prove all that we should want to lug. It follows that weight or heaviness can, as the advertisements say, "be supplied in a variety of styles."

When, for example, Mr. Sidney Challanger mentions in a letter that at a certain period he was "heavy," he does not mean that he tipped the scales at a stone or two more than usual. His horse would have felt that, in case he rode one; but the truth is that at the time referred to he was actually under his proper weight by several pounds.

What he wants us to understand is that he was heavy to himself; it was not an increase of weight but an increase of weakness, having practically the same result. His explanation is that in the early part of 1890 he began to feel ill and out of sorts. He went about in a mazy way, feeling badly without knowing what the trouble was or how to account for it.

"I had," Mr. Challanger goes on to tell us, "a nasty taste in the mouth and no relish for my meals." But eat we all must, or starve; and eat he did. Not much, though. At best it was a forced business. Nothing tasted natural or good, and he took just enough to keep him going until the next meal time should come round.

"And even for that I had to suffer," he says. "After getting it down I had, almost immediately, a sense of fulness or distension at the stomach and pain at the chest as if a bit of food had lodged there—which couldn't be."

No, nothing lodged anywhere. What there was of it went straight down into Mr. Challanger's stomach, where it at once began to ferment and produce a gas which caused the feeling of fulness, while the irritated nerves set up the pain. It was not too much food but food not digested—food turned sour in the stomach—with the whole body behind it failing of the needed stimulus and nourishment of food, and wondering what the matter was. It was this state of matters that made him, to use his own words, "heavy, drowsy, and languid."

Any river in England, after a long drought in summer, looks just as Mr. Challanger felt—heavy, drowsy, and languid. And for an identical reason—the lack of necessary supplies. Wait an instant, though! Don't miss the point.

The rain, when it comes, fills the river by a thousand little channels falling directly into it. Not so as to food and body. Between them is a process; a mechanical, chemical, and vital operation—digestion. Mark you that, and act accordingly. Whether in the sky or on the ground water is water—the same thing.

But food and body are not the same thing. The first must be transmuted into the second by the miracle called digestion; for of all God's ways in nature none is more awful, more amazing, more glorious. And, when impeded or overborne, none which punishes the interference more certainly and swift.

"I got little or no sleep," continues our friend, "and awoke in the morning tired out, as after a hard day's work. Presently I could hardly walk, for very weakness, and from time to time had to give up work altogether. No medicine helped me—and I tried plenty.

"After three wretched years of this, Mrs. Bird of Tallistorn, told my wife about Mother Seigel's Syrup, and, through her, advised me to try it. She said my ailment was indigestion and the Syrup would cure it. And it did. One bottle greatly relieved me. I could eat freely, and food agreed with me. I persevered with the remedy and got strong as ever. All the pain and heaviness left me, and I felt light and energetic, although I have gained in weight."—Sidney Challanger, Gladstone Villa, Cwm, near Waunllwyd, Mon., August 30th, 1898.

TAKE CARE

when drinking Cocoa to have the pure article only, as many so-called "Pure" Cocoas contain added matter that is not only unnecessary, but often positively harmful.

CADBURY'S

COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE

And untampered with, and can be taken with the greatest benefit in Childhood, in Youth, or in Old Age.

THE BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL*—Article on "Drugged Foods," June 4th, 1898—says:

"There is a general consensus of opinion that the addition of active drugs, belonging to the classes of nervine stimulants to beverages and articles of dietary in ordinary domestic use is not for the benefit of the community, and is likely in time to produce a deterioration of the public health. . . At the present moment we are beset by another danger arising from the addition of kola to certain articles of food. . . Kola has been found on analysis to contain 2·13 per cent. of caffeine. Caffeine is undoubtedly a useful drug when employed in suitable cases and in appropriate doses, but if taken habitually in large quantities it is capable of inducing an undesirable condition of over-stimulation of the nerve centres."

When asking for Cocoa, insist on having CADBURY'S—Sold only in Packets and Tins—as other Cocoas are sometimes substituted for the sake of extra profit.

STRENGTHEN YOUR HANDS

Strengthen your Grip. Strengthen your Wrist.
Develop Enormous Strength in Fingers.
Cure Writer's Cramp. Cure Bicycle Cramp.
Cure Cold Hands. Cure Trembling Hands.

With a "Health and Strength"

WRIST MACHINE

Physicians and Athletes have generally concurred that the wrist is the weakest portion of the human frame. It is the portion of the anatomy where strength is measured.

A person with weak wrists is a weak person constitutionally. When the wrists are strengthened the entire muscular system is made stronger.

There is no point in a man's anatomy where lack of strength is felt so much as in the wrist, nor where great strength is so useful, often seriously affecting his bread-winning power. With a systematic use of this machine only ten minutes twice a day you can double the strength of your hand in one month, and increase the size of your forearm very materially.

Purchasing and using a pair of Wrist Machines—one in each hand—saves half the time occupied in exercising both hands with one machine, and also ensures a more equal development of strength in the two hands.

LOVE WAR ADVENTURE ROMANCE PATHOS HUMOUR

No. 583.] For the Week Ending March 3rd, 1900. [One Penny.

My Strange Night-call.

I had just retired to bed after a hard day's work, fagged and weary, wishing that I were almost anything but what I was—a doctor practising in a densely populated working-class neighbourhood. There the calls were plentiful, but the fees meagre, the said fees having to be collected in small weekly sums by my agent—an arrangement which seriously lessened the sum total of my annual income.

I was then unmarried (though I may say I am now fifty, with sons and daughters in plenty), and therefore had no sympathising ear into which I could pour my troubles.

I was stretching out my weary limbs, when clang went the night bell. Such was the force used on the bell-wire that I was certain that it had broken, and therefore lay still, thinking, however much the knob at the door was manipulated, I should not be disturbed.

In this I was mistaken. A few moments, and I was again disturbed—almost startled—by the savageness of the ring.

I went downstairs, turned up the gas in my surgery, and unbarred the door. It was pushed open impatiently, so impatiently that I was compelled to retreat, or otherwise I should have been bruised.

A lady entered, closing the door behind her.

She was tall, well-dressed, and seemed agitated. I could not clearly discern her features, but I saw through her veil a pair of dark flashing eyes fixed upon me.

Without waiting for me to speak she said:

"You have been long in coming, doctor. But let that pass! I want you to accompany me at once. Are you ready to go?"

I was struck by the voice—it was certainly that of a lady, but so intensely charged with sorrow or anguish, I knew not which, that its tones seemed to curdle my blood, and a shiver ran down my back as though someone had poured ice-cold water there.

Seeing me pause, startled, she hurriedly continued:

"You must come, sir; make your fee as high as you like, it shall be paid. It is a case of life or death! Good heavens, sir, she may be dying now while you stand there hesitating. Quick!"

All rights reserved.]

Without a word I returned to my bedroom and dressed. I did not like the case. The lady's manner perplexed and not a little terrified me. Yet I felt compelled to obey. Someone was in danger; it was my bounden duty as a doctor to give professional service. These thoughts flashed through my mind as I quickly dressed.

On again reaching the surgery, I noticed the lady's eyes fixed on the door through which I entered. She had evidently never taken them off it since I made my exit.

"I am ready," I said.

"You have got your instruments?"

"No; will they be needed?"

"I—I don't know; better bring them, sir."

I took my case of instruments from the cupboard in which they were kept, and placed them in my overcoat pocket.

"Allow me," I said, but the door was opened before I could reach it, and the lady was standing on the steps.

What a terrible night—or rather morning—it was! Neither moon nor stars were visible.

The lady walked on in front—it was more a trot than a walk; I followed, wishing I had refused to come out at all.

Turning a corner, I suddenly observed a vehicle. It was not a carriage; it was not a hansom; to this day I don't know what to christen that strange conveyance.

It was something on four wheels, with a dark cloth—probably tarpaulin—thrown over it.

I noticed that the horse was black, and the driver was muffled up so that his face would not be recognisable even with better light.

The lady opened the door and bade me to enter. She sprang in, closed the door, and sat down opposite me without a word.

The driver lashed the horse, and away we rattled over the stones.

I was familiar with every street in the district, and nearly every house; I could almost have traversed it blindfold.

But soon the district was left behind. On, on, we went through the heart of the town; on, on, till the wheels of the conveyance no longer rumbled over rough stones, but glided almost noiselessly over the country roads.

I became doubly nervous as we rode along. What did it all portend? Where was I being carried? A fear possessed me that all was not as it should be. I was checked in my agitated musings by the sudden stoppage of the vehicle. Where we were I did not know any more than the man in the moon, excepting that we were in the country, and must be miles away from my surgery.

It was a mercy, at least, that we had arrived at the end of our journey, and I should find out the object for which I had been brought so far from home.

The mystery was deepened, however, when, instead of our alighting, the door of the vehicle was opened from the outside, and in stepped two men, closing the door behind them; then the journey was resumed.

A sudden determination possessed me to know what all this mystery meant. I wet my lips with my tongue, for they were dry and hot; then I said, speaking as clearly as I could:

"I have the right to know where I am being conveyed, madam, and why the two men have entered the vehicle without my permission?"

I waited for several seconds, but there was no answer. This made me desperate.

I rose to my feet, and was about to reach the handle of the door that I might open it and get out, when the two men sprang upon me, forced me back into my seat, and in less time than it takes me to write the words I felt my hands tied and my eyes blindfolded.

"Villains," I shouted, "you shall suffer for this indignity. Have you brought me into this lonely place to murder me or what?"

"Don't be ridiculous, Doctor Smith; no harm is intended you. If you do come to harm, it will be your fault, not ours."

It was the lady who spoke.

She spoke calmly; I thought there was a strain of contempt in her voice.

"It is some villainous plot," I exclaimed excitedly, "into which an honourable gentleman of my profession has no right to be dragged."

"You will be asked to do nothing beyond exercising your professional skill, for which you will be handsomely paid," replied the lady.

"Why should you drag me so far—why should you pick me out as your instrument? Could you not engage one of my profession nearer to your own home?"

"That is our affair; we chose you."

"But how did you know me—how get my name?"

"We read the letters in the public prints to which your name was attached, and we have formed a high opinion of your skill."

I called myself an idiot for having written to the newspapers. If this was the sort of notoriety I was to get by making my name widely known, better have continued obscure for ever.

Just then the conveyance stopped a second time. I heard the door open, and the two men descended.

"You have been long in coming, doctor."

I was startled by heavy breathing close to my ear; then the lady whispered—this time I thought with less acridness:

"Dr. Smith, I beg of you not to make any disturbance. So long as you are quiet and do as requested you have nothing to fear—not a hair of your head shall be injured. Refuse, and I dare not answer for the consequences. You are in desperate hands, who will brook no delay or opposition. I again beg of you to ask no questions; do as you are requested, and you will never repent. Remember!"

All this was said rapidly. The lady's mouth was close to my ear; I could feel her hot breath as she spoke. The concluding caution came sharp and clear, and it seemed to me almost tenderly.

Then she left the conveyance, and I heard the command:

"Get up, doctor; give me your hands."

I rose and stretched out my bound hands, which were at once grasped by the hand of some person.

I was led along a gravelly path; my nose informed me by the musty smell pervading the atmosphere that there were bushes and trees near.

Presently (and though the voice of the speaker was not the voice of the lady I had seen, yet I felt convinced it was the voice of a woman) I was told to be careful as there were steps to mount up.

Up we went, until I counted twenty; then I noticed a faint glimmer of light through the handkerchief fastened over my eyes. I heard a door cautiously closed, and I knew I was a prisoner in some house or building, and at the mercy of my gaolers.

I was now led over a stone floor and ushered into a carpeted room. Again I heard a door close behind me, and the click of a key turned in the lock. Then the hand that had guided me left my own, and I was standing alone.

I was not left to myself. The bandage was gently loosed from my eyes, my hands were set at liberty.

At first I realised only that I was in a large, magnificently-furnished bed-room, dimly lighted; nor was I left to take in more than a rapid glance. Then the lady who summoned me was once more at my side, and whispered:

"Look round."

At that moment lights were turned up. I looked round. My heart almost ceased beating at what I saw.

Fully twenty masked figures in men's habiliments stood not ten paces from me in a half circle with their right arms stretched out, and grasping in their hands pistols, ready cocked, pointed at my head. Twenty pistols ready to fire at me should I prove refractory.

The lights were suddenly lowered, and only one lamp burned brightly on a round, inlaid table that stood beside a bed.

"You see what you may expect," whispered the lady, "if you refuse to do what you are brought here for. On that bed lies a girl. She has had the misfortune to receive a bullet in her breast. It will be your duty to extract the bullet with as much skill and care as possible. Afterwards you will write out full instructions how to proceed with the wound, answer any questions you may be asked, and, your work being done and your fee paid, you will be conducted back to your home. I need not caution you to keep silent for ever as to this night's work. Should you ever reveal what you have done, or put the police on our track, we have the means of vengeance, and your life will be the forfeit! Come!"

She led me to the bed.

In all my experience up to now, I never beheld so beautiful a creature as the one before me. She lay on her back with her arms thrown over her head, her wealth of golden hair lying on the pillow. I cannot describe her features; it would be folly to attempt it. They were perfect as human features can be.

Her face was pale; indeed, but for the short, quick breathing, in the soft light thrown from the lamp, she might have been taken for some divine piece of statuary chiselled by a master hand.

She bore the operation quietly, patiently, with scarcely a moan. I verily believe I was the greater sufferer of the two.

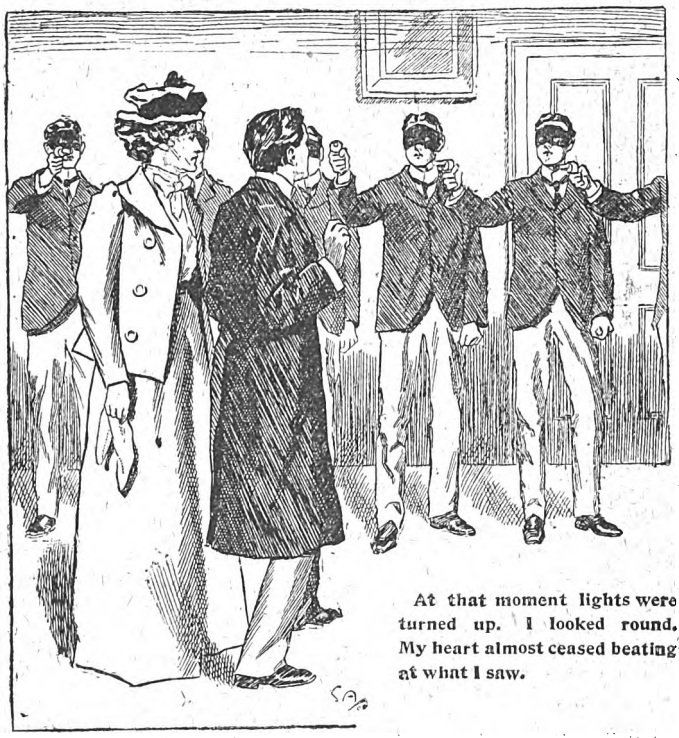
I had to probe deeply before I discovered the bullet; I felt her lovely form quiver; a slight moan left her lips, nothing more. When I had performed the task, examined the wound, and done what I could, she rewarded me with the sweetest smile that ever illumined the face of fair woman.

Pens, ink, and paper were brought me by the first lady, and I wrote full instructions—indeed by this time I had become deeply interested in my lovely patient—how to treat the wound, and what was to be her diet.

At the foot of the sheet I put these words:

"If any dangerous symptoms appear, do not fail to seek my aid. You are safe with me now and ever.—J.S., M.D."

"You have done your work well, doctor, for which I thank you—nay, I could almost fall on your neck and kiss you. She is my only child, and you may perhaps guess how I love her."



At that moment lights were turned up. I looked round. My heart almost ceased beating at what I saw.

"Madam," I said, "this has been a strange experience for me. I do not know who you are, nor the mode of your life; but I am glad to have rendered a service to that lovely creature whom you call your daughter. One request I should like to make."

"What is it?"

"Let me touch her cheek with my lips!"

The lady paused a moment. I saw her breast heave and swell as her dark eyes flashed upon me through her veil.

"Granted," she said; "but I beg you will do it quickly and unseen by the others present."

I turned to the bed, apparently to see that all was comfortable. I put my ear to her face, as though listening to her breathing. Then, for just one moment, my lips pressed her cheek.

Turning round I saw the veiled lady with the bandage ready for my eyes.

"Is it necessary?" I asked.

"It must be; I dare do no other," she answered.

Then I submitted to be blindfolded once more, but my hands were left free.

"Here is your fee—a hundred guineas," said the strange lady.

"A hundred guineas!" I exclaimed; "it is too much—ten would have been sufficient."

"You are welcome. Remember, we have bound you by no oath, but not a word to a living soul of what you have seen and done. I should be sorry to be your enemy."

"Madam, I am silent as the grave!"

I need not prolong my story by relating the return journey.

I was taken back alone in the strange conveyance used to convey me thither.

* * * * *

Everybody old enough will remember the startling discovery made by the police, some fifteen years ago, of a band of female house-breakers.

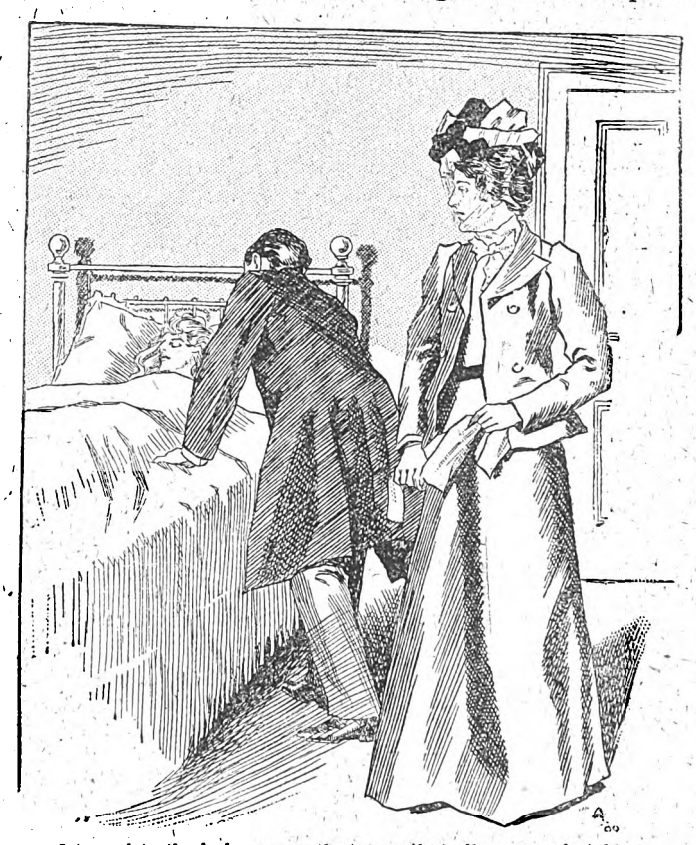
The whole country was roused to intense excitement by the revelations then made.

The newspapers for weeks provided the most thrilling accounts of the depredations the gang had committed, dressed in men's clothing—robbing gentleman's mansions and the better-class houses.

Only three of the gang were captured, an elderly woman and two young ones; the rest escaped, and nothing could persuade those captured to betray their companions in crime.

The elderly woman was said to belong to a Continental family of title, and it was supposed that she was the leader of the gang.

On the day of the trial I went to the court, for strong suspicion had taken possession of me that my strange episode some years back had a connection with the gang of female burglars. The court was crowded, but I managed to secure a position where I could get a good view of the dock.



I turned to the bed, apparently to see that all was comfortable.

When the prisoners were brought into the dock I at once recognised the face of the elder culprit! Casting her eyes round, they fell upon me. By the slight start she gave on seeing me, I knew she recognised me.

She gave a faint smile, put her fingers to her lips and wafted me a kiss.

So artfully was this done that even the lynx-eyed reporters failed to notice the action, and so missed what might have been a very romantic bit of news for the millions who read an account of the trial next day.

She and her two companions were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment, and so ended the great female burglar case.

I have often wondered what became of the fair creature whose cheeks I pressed with my lips for the first and last time when she lay so patient, and looking so beautiful, after my operation.

Did she die of her wound? If living, will she read what I have written?

If she reads my narrative, I hope she will pardon my giving to the public what has been locked up in my own breast so many years, the telling of which cannot bring harm to the gang of thieves who practised their unwomanly calling nearly a quarter of a century ago.

THE MAD MARE OF EYLAU.

It was in the autumn of 1805, when the officers of the Grand Army were making their preparations and completing their equipages for the battle of Austerlitz. I already had two good horses, but I was searching for a third and better one—a big-hearted charger. The latter was extremely difficult to find, for, prices were very high, and I had little money. But hazard served me marvellously.

I encountered a German scientist, named M. d'Aister, whom I had known when he was a professor at Sorèze. He had become preceptor to the children of a rich Swiss banker, M. Scherer, who was established in Paris, and associated with M. Finguerlin. M. d'Aister apprised me that M. Finguerlin, then very opulent and maintaining a vast establishment, had an extensive stable, one of the leading animals in which was a beautiful mare named Lisette, an excellent beast from Mecklenburg, of attractive appearance, light as a deerhound, and a very surefooted animal. She had but one defect, a terrible one and which was fortunately displayed but rarely. She bit like a bulldog, and threw herself furiously on persons who displeased her. It was on this account that M. Finguerlin had determined to sell her.

I offered a thousand francs, and Lisette became mine, although she had cost M. Finguerlin five thousand. For many months this beast gave me considerable trouble; it required four or five men to saddle her, and the only manner in which her bridle could be put on was by covering her eyes and fastening all four of her legs together. But once one was upon her back, she was found to be an admirable mount.

After she had belonged to me for some time, however, as she had already bitten a number of persons and had not even spared myself, I concluded to get rid of her.

About this time I took into my service a man named Francois Woirland.

He was warned of Lisette's bad character, and, before approaching her, he provided himself with an exceedingly hot leg of mutton, and when the beast threw herself upon him, he thrust the meat at her and she seized it between her teeth. It burnt her gums, her palate, and her tongue, so that she immediately dropped it, and from this moment she was perfectly submissive to Woirland, whom she dared not attack. I employed the same means and obtained a similar result. She thus became easy of approach to myself and my domestic, and even became slightly more tractable for the grooms of the staff, whom she saw every day, but woe to strangers who passed too close to her.

Such was the mare upon which I was mounted at Eylau at the moment when the débris of the army corps of Marshal Augereau, crushed by a hailstorm of grapeshot and bullets, were endeavouring to reunite near the big cemetery. You will probably remember that the Fourteenth Regiment of the line occupied a solitary position upon a small hill, which they could not quit except by order from the Emperor.

The snow having ceased to fall momentarily, we could perceive this intrepid regiment, surrounded by the enemy, waving its eagle in the air to show that it still held out, and asking for aid.

The Emperor, touched by the courage and devotion of these fine soldiers, resolved to make an attempt to save them, and ordered Marshal Augereau to send an officer to them.

The latter was to tell them to quit the hill, form a small square, and work their way toward us, while a brigade of Cavalry would march to meet them and second their efforts.

It was before the grand charge made by Murat; it was almost impossible to execute the Emperor's will, because a cloud of Cossacks separated us from the Fourteenth of the line. It became evident that the officer who should be sent towards the unfortunate regiment would be killed or captured before reaching them. However, the Emperor's order was positive, and the Marshal was obliged to conform to it. It was the usage in the Imperial Army for the aides-de-camp to arrange themselves in order at fixed distances from their general, the one at the head attending to the order of the moment, then placing himself at the rear when his mission was fulfilled. Thus each carried the orders in turn, and the dangers were equally divided.

A brave captain of the engineers named Froissard, who, although not an aide-de-camp, was attached to the marshal's staff, found himself at the head of the line, and was charged to carry the order to the Fourteenth. Froissard sped away at a gallop. We lost sight of him in the midst of the Cossacks, and we never saw him again nor learnt what became of him.

The marshal, seeing that the Fourteenth made no movement, sent an officer named David. He met the same fate as Froissard, and we heard no more of him. It is probable that the two men, having been killed and despoiled, were not recognised among the numerous corpses with which the field was covered. For the third time the marshal called for the officer on duty. It was my turn!

On seeing the son of his old friend approach, and, I dare add, his favourite aide-de-camp, the good marshal's figure shook and his eyes filled with tears, because he could not dissimulate the fact that he was sending me to an almost certain death. But the Emperor's orders must be obeyed; I was a soldier, and they could not make one of my comrades go in my place, even if I would have suffered such a thing, which would have dishonoured me. But, in making a sacrifice of my life, I considered it my duty to take all possible precautions to save it if possible.

I had remarked that the two officers who had gone before me had carried their sabres in their hands, which led me to believe that they had endeavoured to defend themselves against the Cossacks. This was useless, according to my idea, because it compelled them to arrest their progress to combat against a multitude of enemies, who finished by overwhelming them. I accordingly conducted myself otherwise and, allowing my sabre to remain in the scabbard, I considered myself as a rider who, wishing to win a prize at a race, directs himself as rapidly as possible and by the shortest line towards the desired goal, without occupying himself with what is upon the right or left of his road. Now, my goal being the little hill occupied by the fourteenth of the line, I resolved to proceed thither without paying any attention to the Cossacks.

This method succeeded perfectly. Lisette, lighter than a swallow and rather flying than running, seemed to devour space, leaping over mounds of stones, broken gun-carriages and hardly extinct bivouac fires.

Thousands of Cossacks were scattered over the plain. The first who perceived me acted like hunters in a game-drive, who, seeing a hare rise before them, mutually announced his presence by their cries. But none of these Cossacks tried to stop me, in the first place on account of the extreme rapidity of my flight, and also probably because, being in such great numbers, each of them thought it would be impossible for me to evade his comrades further on. So well did my plan work that I reached the Fourteenth without either myself or my excellent mare having received the least scratch.

I found the Fourteenth formed into a square upon the summit of the hill; but as the slope of the ground was very slight, the enemy's cavalry had been able to execute several charges against the French regiment. These had all been repulsed, and the brave little band was surrounded by so many of the enemy's dead, both men and horses, that they formed a species of rampant which thenceforth rendered the position nearly inaccessible to cavalry.

I transmitted to the officer in command the order to quit his position and endeavour to join the body of the army, he observed to me that the enemy's artillery, which had for over an hour been firing upon the Fourteenth, had caused such losses that the handful of soldiers remaining would be infallibly exterminated if they descended into the plain. Furthermore, he had not time to prepare for the execution of this movement, as a column of Russian infantry was marching upon him, and was then not more than a hundred yards away from us.

"I see no means of saving the regiment," said the chief of the battalion. "Return to the Emperor, give him the farewell of the Fourteenth of the line, which has faithfully executed his orders, and carry to him the eagle which he gave to us, and which we can no longer defend; it would be too painful for us, while dying, to see it fall into the enemy's hands."

The commander then handed over to me the eagle, which the soldiers—glorious remnant of this intrepid regiment—saluted for the last time with cries of "Vive l'Empereur."

The eagles of the infantry were very heavy, and their weight was augmented by a big, strong oaken handle, upon the summit of which they were fixed. The length of this handle embarrassed me considerably, and, as the staff deprived of its eagle could not constitute a trophy for the enemy, I resolved, with the commander's assent, to break it.

But before this could be accomplished the column of Russian infantry, reached the hill, and threw themselves furiously upon the feeble remnant of the unfortunate Fourteenth, the soldiers of which had lived for many days upon potatoes and melted snow. Our brave soldiers defended themselves valiantly with their bayonets, and when the square had been pierced they grouped themselves into various clusters, and sustained for a long time this unequal combat.

During this frightful mêlée, many of our men, in order not to be struck down from behind, backed up against the flanks of my mare, who, contrary to her usual habits, remained quiet. If I had been able to move, I would have urged her forward, in order to withdraw with the eagle from the field; but it was absolutely impossible for me to press my legs together so as to make the animal understand my wishes. Not only did they fight all round me, but taking me for the chief of the French, because I alone was on horseback, they made me the object of their special attention, numerous balls constantly whistling past my ears.

Among the French who had backed up against the left flank of my mare was a quartermaster whom I knew, having often seen him in the marshal's tent. This man, attacked and wounded by several grenadiers, fell under Lisette, and seized one of my legs in attempt to raise himself, when a Russian soldier tried to pierce his breast. The grenadier lost his equilibrum, and the point of his bayonet, badly directed, sunk into my mare's thigh. Recalled to her ferocious instincts by the pain, Lisette precipitated herself upon the Russian, and he was soon a mangled corpse.

Then, throwing herself furiously into the midst of the combatants, Lisette, kicking and biting, overturned everything that opposed her passage, and soon carried him out of the struggle to the base of the little hill. Then, taking the road by which she had come, she directed her way toward the cemetery of Eylau at a rapid gallop.

Thanks to the hussar's saddle in which I was seated, I was able in all this turmoil to keep my place upon the mare's back, but a new danger awaited me. The snow had begun to fall again, and the big flakes obscured the air. I had gone nearly to Eylau when I found myself in front of a battalion of the old Imperial Guard, who, not being able to distinguish objects at any distance, mistook me for a Russian officer leading a cavalry charge.

Immediately the entire battalion fired upon me. My cloak and my saddle were riddled with balls; but I was not wounded, nor was my mare, who continued her rapid course, traversing the three ranks of the battalion with the same ease that a snake passes through a hedge.

But this last flight had exhausted Lisette's forces. She had lost a quantity of blood, one of the large veins of her thigh, having been severed, and, all at once, the poor beast sank down and rolled to one side, I rolling to the other.

Stretched out upon the snow among the mass of dead and dying, unable to move in any way, I insensibly and painlessly lost consciousness. It seemed as though some one were rocking me softly in a cradle. Finally I swooned completely, and was not even reanimated by eighty squadrons of Murat, going to the charge, passing near me, and perhaps over me.

* * * * *

When I regained my senses after being unconscious for four hours I found myself being carefully tended by my own servant while greatest of joys, the glorious eagle lay safe at my side.

My brave charger was found where she fell. If a reminder of the service she rendered me is needed I have it in the shape of one of her hoofs which lies, mounted, always on my writing table.

Thus ends the story of the Mad Mare of Eylau.

TOLD IN THE SINGLE MEN'S HUT. (A True Story.)

The single men's hut in Australia is a rough shanty, with bunks arranged round pretty much the same as they are on an ordinary steamer, albeit not so luxurious. Here men herd, and feed, and sleep, and smoke, and yarn after dark. Imagine such a place if you can, and you can easily believe that many yarns of peril and sudden death get told in a place of this description.

"How did you get that big scar on your forehead?" said one of the chums to me.

Naturally I said "Don't bother."

"But tell us, old man, for there's always a yarn attached to a scar, and it's a beastly night. Come! tell us."

"Well," I said, "some years ago I was skylarking, doing some boundary riding, and too often going to a certain roadside inn, to which a pair of lovely blue eyes attracted me a precious sight more than did the drink. At that time I was riding a wild brute of a mare—as wild as they make them. She had been handed over to me because at that time I never cared what I rode, and, in fact, as you know, I don't care much now.

"The night I left the inn was unusually black; but with the kiss of the blue-eyed one still warm on my lips, I swung myself into my saddle, and set the mare going to some tune. She was very rough at first and seemed inclined for a fight, so I sat down for it, and dug in my spurs for all I was worth, and banged it into her well with the handle of my stock whip, and eventually started her, in what I thought, was the right direction.

"She took hold of the bit as if she meant to pull my arms out; but I stuck it, and eventually got on better terms and we went along very well.

"Now begins the story really. I had just loosed myself in the saddle and lit my pipe, thinking only to have a quiet canter home, when the mare slid up on her haunches and made a dead stop. I didn't. Clean over head I must have gone into space. She, with her equine instinct, had discovered the shaft of a disused mine, and down that shaft I went, quite fifty feet, I should think. Why didn't it kill me? Because there was a bed of soft earth at the bottom and upon this I fell, but in falling, I hit my head against some old timber, and half skinned it.

"How long I lay before I came to myself again, I don't know.

"When that event did take place, I was horrified at my situation. Drenched with blood, with barely anything upon me except matches and about a pint of cold tea in my flask,—I always carry it in preference to grog, although I'm no teetotaler—this was all I had to face the music with.

"The first day I didn't take much notice of it, being too much hurt. On the second, however, I began to explore the old workings, with the result of finding a small pool of particularly filthy water. Still even this was a little godsend in one way. A man can go a long time on water. But now another horror came on—I could not sleep, and of food I had none, and the horrible position in which I was, got on my nerves to such an extent, that, I began to tremble in every limb. Moreover my head was very painful, and I must have been somewhat delirious.

"Daylight found me very weak, not only from my previous exertions and want of sleep, but from hunger. Three nights had passed without my eating, though, up to the present time, I had not felt the want of anything in consequence of being excited by my endeavour to escape. On rising from a mound of earth, which had now been my bed for three nights, I found my knees giving way and shaking from the combined effects of cold and hunger. I felt so weak that it was with difficulty I could crawl across the chamber of the mine with the intention of exploring the workings to see if there were any means of escape through them.

"You will say, 'Why did you not think of this before?' In the first place I had expended all my matches the first night, and then again, feeling that the only way of escape was by the shaft, all my energies had been concentrated in that direction; but now that failed I was induced to seek for some old timber props or slabs out of which I could make a sort of scaffold.

"Entering one of the passages on my hands and knees and groping cautiously along the ground—in case there might be another shaft—I arrived at the end, and finding nothing returned with a weary sigh into the daylight that streamed down the shaft.

"Two more dark arches showed as many passages to be explored, so I at once commenced to crawl into the entrance of one of them. I had hardly advanced a couple of yards when my knees struck against something soft, and at the same time my hand encountered a coil like a snake. With a shriek I scrambled back to the place whence I started, and for a long time could not recover from the effects of the fright. I suppose I fainted, for when I came to myself the daylight was dying away, and the place I was in was deep in gloom.

"That it was a snake I had tumbled against I felt convinced, which had like myself tumbled into this trap; and it was a matter of wonder to me that I had not encountered crowds of these brutes before. Death by the bite of a snake! Was I to come to this after all? Perhaps it would be better than dying from starvation, but the horror of it! I had heard bushmen who had been bitten by snakes describe the sensations experienced after receiving the bite, in which they said that barring the sharp pin-like prick they had no other pain.

"After a time a numbness spread over their limbs and they commenced to feel sleepy, but were kept awake by being violently made to run about, and this action assisted by copious draughts of raw brandy had enabled them to resist the poison. Was not this quietly dropping off to sleep better than the pangs of starvation? Yes! Oh, a thousand times better, and with a prayer to Heaven I crawled into the passage again, and clutched—not the snake, thank Heaven, but my stock-whip, which had, I suppose, bounded into the place when I fell down the shaft. With a cry of delight which echoed through the dreary place, I seized the whip and hugged it to my breast, for I saw in it my deliverer from the horrible tomb. It being too dark to make use of it that night, I again lay down, but with very different feelings from what I had experienced the night before. I was then suffering all the agonies of hunger and thirst combined, which were gradually robbing me of sense and life, now no thought of hunger or thirst troubled me as I again lay down upon the bed of earth.

"I looked for the coming day with an eagerness that prevented my sleeping, and set my brain whirling with excitement. Oh! what would I not have given for a smoke; but I had searched my pockets dozens of times before unsuccessfully, for I was certain I had both pipe and tobacco when I left the public house. Then what had become of them? I racked my brains without receiving any help from them, for everything appeared as having happened at such a distant date, that I could not make up my mind whether I had left the 'pub' four years ago or four days.

"At length the welcome light streamed down the shaft, and, after several trials, I once more rose to my feet. But how shaky my knees had become and how weak I felt. Shall I have strength enough to throw the lash of the whip up the shaft? With tremulous footsteps I crawled along the wall until I got just under the opening, and then gathering the twelve-foot lash into a coil, I essayed to throw it up the shaft. I must have been mad at that time, though of course I fancied I was still in my right senses. And although some years have passed since it occurred, I often in my dreams try to effect the impossible feat of making a twelve foot lash catch in the timbers around the mouth of a shaft fifty feet above my head. How long this extraordinary delusion lasted I have no idea. I must have gradually lost my senses for when I came to myself I was lying in my own bed which I had given up all hopes of ever seeing again.

"It appears that my horse had come back home early on the morning of the sixth day, without saddle or bridle which I suppose he had managed to get rid of when wandering through the bush. His appearance had then alarmed the owner of the station, who, up to that time had thought that I was riding round the boundaries or mobbing up cattle. When the saddleless horse arrived with stains on his coat showing a long want of combing, he had become alarmed, and riding over to the village I had left, was astonished to hear that I had been gone for six days. Calling for volunteers, and taking dogs with them, they had tracked me to the shaft down which I had fallen as was shown by the horse's footmarks where he had slid forward in trying to stop. How to get down to see if I was there was the question, for though they shouted again and again, no answer was returned, as by that time I was insensible. Taking off their bridles, the reins were soon made into a rope, and one of their number was lowered down. He found me, and called out to his friends that I was dead. However, fastening the reins around me, the men on the surface soon had me on the grass, when perceiving that just a glimmer of life remained, they cut down a few saplings and extemporized a stretcher to carry me home.

"It was a long time before I came round, but thanks to the kind and gentle nursing of the Owner's wife, I did at length recover; but never as long as I live shall I forget the horror of those days passed in the old mine.

"That's all, mates, about the scar on my forehead."

A TALE OF THE WAR.

A Story of Episodes.

IT was very wet weather, and the exterior of the prison at Bolter's Sands seemed more dreary than the interior, so that James Fosdyke shivered as he stepped across the threshold into fresh air and freedom. His alert face was not that of a criminal, though the lines were branded and deepened on it, as though they had been seared by a hot iron. He was a man of middle height, spare and lean, with the shapely hands of a skilled mechanic, and eyes that could gauge the length and quality of a plank of oak for the carving.

Five years before, he had been a cabinet-maker in the small town of Westfield, with a prosperous business, and an only sister who kept his house for him, until the day that pretty Esther Davey should come to it as his wife. He had worked hard to make his home charming in every way with deft contrivings that should constitute her the most envied woman in the street. Every night, after working hours, he had laboured at the pretty suite of furniture that was to adorn her room, until chair and table had at last satisfied his critical fancy.

He remembered that time hungrily now as he stood staring with wide eyes at the long road that lay before him, ending in London and the crowd which would swallow him up. How pretty Esther Davey was—with her flower-like face and fair hair, so child-like and appealing, so fresh and gay! Poor love—poor little Esther—he had seen the crown of fair hair low in the dust before him—the blameless coronal of a girl's fame smirched and soiled.

Another memory darted into being with a flash of vigour that was like a stab—the memory of Roland Baring, the son of the rich banker of Westfield, the threads of whose life had become inextricably mingled with Essie's—to his detriment and her shame. He clenched his fists now as he remembered the smooth, handsome face of the young soldier, home on leave, and idly ready for any adventure that offered itself.

When the whole sad story had come out, he, James Fosdyke, had gone to Baring's home, had sought an interview with him, and in white fury had struck him in the face. The blow had lodged on the temple, and for many days the young man lay hovering between life and death, till the balance of the scale shifted, and he came back to existence again—to help to put Fosdyke in gaol for attempted murder.

Five years' penal servitude he had been awarded, since he had stood obstinately silent in the dock, and Baring had naturally not breathed a word as to Esther's connection with the case. It had therefore appeared to the jury that some trivial quarrel between the two men had ended in a horrible revenge, and Fosdyke was convicted without the aid of any extenuating circumstances. The satisfaction that he had saved Esther's good name in the eyes of the world was marred for him by the look of returning health in the face of Mr. Baring, whose satisfaction at the verdict was not good to see.

And thus it was, that at the age of nine and twenty, James Fosdyke stood without hope or friends, outside the prison walls. His sister Rose had died of the shame, his house and business were no more, so that there seemed no particular reason why he should return to Westfield; but, rather, as his inclination led him, begin life in a fresh place with new sphere of work.

The red of the setting sun was upon the wide plain of Bolter's Sands, far away he could see the November haze upon the dull sea, closing in a dead foggy night for any ships coming up Channel.

"I will be even with him before I die," he said, lifting his hand to Heaven with a passion that lifted him out of everyday life and set him on a pinnacle of tragedy. "Three lives has he spoilt for his own pleasure. I will be even with him."

Like Shylock, he might have said, "I have an oath in Heaven," but, unlike Shylock, it seemed to him that. Heaven should have no part in a compact that was unholy.

Then, pulling up the collar of his coat, he set out up the London Road, to be lost in the mist and the darkness.

* * * * *

A doss house in the East-end of London is no charming abode, but it was to one, in the particularly insalubrious street that went by the name of Parker's Rents, in the Whitechapel district, that James Fosdyke had drifted by the next autumn. His want of success had been from no special fault on his part, but rather that misfortune seemed to dog his footsteps whenever he set his hand to any special work. He had become disheartened, feeling that the prison taint upon him had branded a seal upon his forehead, setting him, like Cain, apart from other men. Over the kitchen fire, a group of tramps were busy cooking their supper of some savoury mess, that smelt hotly of fat and garlic, while half a dozen others, who had not the price of a meal about them, watched the frizzling pan, like unclean birds of prey.

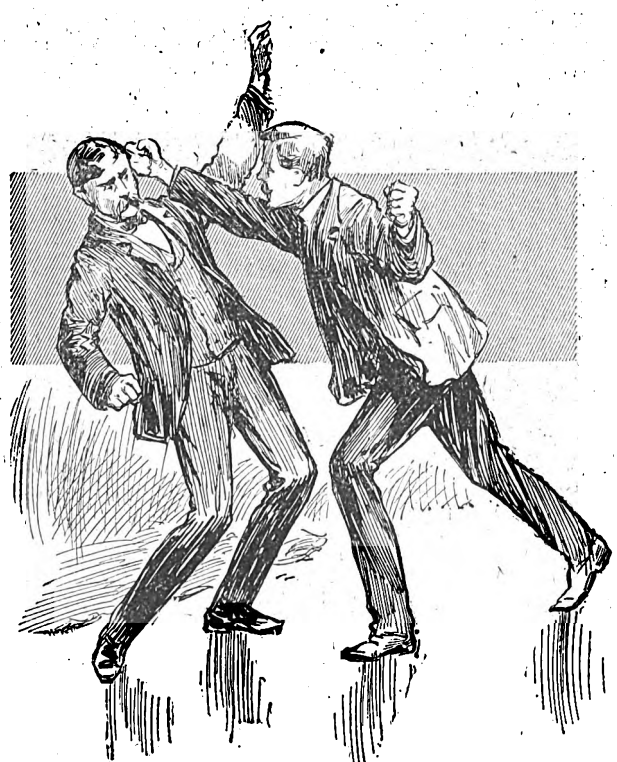
In a corner, shaded from the flaring naphtha lamp, sat two men of a better class, James Fosdyke and an acquaintance, who, by force of circumstances, had drifted into friendship. Of the same height and colouring, they seemed to bear a resemblance to one another, that ceased with one glance at the disease-wasted features of Fosdyke's friend, and the firmer, healthier face of the mechanic himself. They were very silent in the horrid din and clamour of the place where profanity and foul language were the sign manual of the habitué, and when Fosdyke's friend spoke at last, it was with the weary accent of a man who has long ago accounted hope as one of the lost possessions that time could never restore to him.

"No supper, Jem? I'm thinking it'll not be on account of appetite this time."

"I'm not broke," said Fosdyke. "I've five shillings, but when that's done, it's a case of the Thames or priggin'."

"It's a case of a coffin with me, anyway, whether work'us or doss'ouse. You'd never have thought I was a soldier once, eh, Jem? They're callin' out the Reserves of the old regiment, too, to-morrow, but it'll not be Ned Thomas as'll answer his name in Fleetwood Barracks when the reservists of the Dublin Fusiliers come shufflin' in."

"No, I reckon you're booked for another journey by another transport," returned Fosdyke, not unkindly.



In white fury James Forsdyke had struck him in the face.

"Jem," the voice was hoarse and excited, "I've one thing to leave, as I care about more'n the world—a sister. She wasn't right in her back from the first—queer and half-growed——" and he paused with a cough that shook him cruelly.

"What is the good of tellin' me, Ned? Do I look like a chap as can put my hand in my pocket and set your sister in a mansion?"

"No—but Jem—you've five shillings, and I've—just my papers—and Molly might set 'erself up as a flower girl, or a match hawker, with the money."

"What do you mean?"

"There's no call for you to be fierce about it. You and I passed the honest stage long ago, Jem. What use is my papers and things to me, dyin' of the decline, but to you they'd be new life—new hopes—and Molly'd be glad of the five shillin's."

"If I was caught?" said Fosdyke, breathing hard.

The other leant his lean arms on the table, and looked into his chum's face with deathly earnestness.

"You'd never be—none of the old regiment has seen me for years—since I left—and you're the same height, Jem, and the same build as me."

"Heavens! To begin life again—to have another chance!"

The groan came from the man's soul, and his agony surprised the other, looking at him curiously. One of the tramps swore furiously as a new-comer, blind drunk, lurching in, nearly upsetting the tripe in the pan.

"I'll do it and thank you."

Fosdyke rose and clutched at the dirty papers held out to him.

"Tell Molly—you saved a soul alive—and—for heaven's sake, old chap, go into the 'ouse to die—it's better than the streets."

He took off his waistcoat with a quick gesture—it would sell for something—and laid a little canvas bag on the table, from which he took two half-crowns, a pair of gold sleeve-links, and a battered silver locket, from which he first abstracted a curl of yellow hair.

"They're all yours," he said, "for Molly. I've no use for 'em now, and they'll maybe make dying a bit easier for you." Leaning over his friend, he took his hand in a tight grip. "Good-bye," he said, "good-bye."

"S'long," said the other, with a feeble attempt at a laugh. "When I was scene-shiftin' for the Christmas pantomime, they used to say: 'Exit James Fosdyke—hey, presto, Ned Thomas appears.'

"Aye—exit James Fosdyke—it'll be a bed over my head and a ration in my mouth, anyway, and I once got as 'igh as a corporal in our Volunteer corps, so I knows the trick of the thing. Good-bye."

And the new Reserve man was gone, while the old one sat looking at his newly acquired wealth, till the tears welled up slowly into his aching eyes, and, rising, he limped away up the street to Molly's attic.

* * * * *

Life on a troopship for three weeks at a stretch has its disadvantages, but to private "Ned Thomas" every hardship was a luxury, every privation a blessing. He had fallen into his place in the ranks without the slightest difficulty, and now that the Dublins were forging their way up country from Durban to intercept the Boers at Estcourt, he had become so much at ease with his position and duties, that his life might have been spent in soldiering. When questioned as to his means of livelihood since he joined the Reserves, he always replied that he had been down on his luck, and as so many of his companions appeared to have suffered from the same complaint, his statements passed unchallenged.

They were within sight of the Boer laager before he had had leisure to think and wonder over the chance that had brought him here, and it was the random firing from an enemy's reconnoitring party that made him first realise the sternness of the situation. War was such a light word in peaceful England, bandied from lip to lip, that he had never paused to remember that it meant hard work, horrible sights, and all the danger and excitement attendant on hard fighting.

He had no fear for himself, only wonder as to what the day might bring forth. He sat by the tent door that evening, thinking, with his hands folded across his knees, waiting for "Reveille" to sound. The long day died away across the plain, tinging the peaks of the mountains and the spurs of rock ridges with fire.

There was another regiment lying a little further off, and he could see the twinkle of their lights, and hear the subdued clatter of voices. He remembered that moment next day, when they were in the thick of the fight, and Boer and Englishman had met in a deadly melée, from whence there was no escape. He fought like a madman, feeling that in action lay escape from thought, and the only way of atoning for what was at best a fraud.

The sun waned to its setting upon the fierce fight. He had flung himself upon bearded Boer and bronzed Free-Stater, and where quarters were too close for the work that the Martini did so well, fought with stock and barrel as best he might.

The private lifted the officer in strong arms that cradled him like a child, and began hurrying back to the camp.

Just at sundown, when the day was almost over, from the other camp away across the veld that had kept the left flank of the enemy engaged, emerged a horse and its rider. The horse—a bright bay—was fretting at its bit, but at the touch of the spur, he sprang forward with a bound. No doubt he was the bearer of some message from the regiment that lay under the spur of the hill, and each man of the "Dublins" held his breath at the sight of the dancing horse and rider, who had to cross the enemy's very line of fire. There was not much doubt as to the outcome of so forlorn a hope, for a shower of Mauser bullets brought the bright bay to the ground in horrible quivering, death agony, and his rider beneath him, where he lay motionless.

One glance Private Ned Thomas cast at the fighting, struggling mass of men, and one at the inert black mass of horse and rider on the sun-scorched grass. There was the quiver of a muscle, the faint movement of hand or foot, and without a thought he darted away towards the open, with the wild, mad thought of saving a life that had been brave to recklessness.

He bore a charmed life, for the bullets fell round him like hail, touching no part of him or his uniform, but it was with a feeling of awful wonder that he fell upon his knees by the side of the wounded man, and drew him away from the heavy body of his charger, that gripped him like a vice.

He was not dead, for his eyes opened as the Private wiped the blood from his face.

"You're a bit knocked out of time, sir. Good Heavens!"

The cheery tone in which Thomas had begun to speak died away with a hoarse groan, as he realised that he had risked his life for the man who was the worst enemy the world had held for him!

"So it's you, is it?" he said again, fiercely, passionately. "This is the day as I've prayed for night and morning for six years, and it's come at last, you false, sneaking hound, you with your lying, cheating ways, and your eyes, as looked away a pure innocent soul, whiter now than yours'll ever be. You've come to your last moment, and I'm only waiting to decide whether to leave you here and go back, and say as you were dead, or wipe out your life with a blow from the stock of my carbine."

The deathly lips moved, while the eyes, in haunting, hopeless terror held him.

"I'm shot—in the back—can't move—Fosdyke—surely the bitterness of death is past."

"Even the Devil can quote Scripture. There's Esther a-standin' between us."

The battered carbine was raised with a steady aim, and if ever murder looked out of any man, it did at that moment out of Fosdyke's blood-shot, strained eyeballs, and the man below him flinched as he had never done, even at Elandslaagte.

"For Esther's sake—Fosdyke! I will marry her—when I get back."

The hand faltered, and the carbine dropped with a thud.

"Do you swear it?"

"I swear it by the Cross," clamoured the broken, wounded voice.

Steady as a rock the private of the "Dublins" rose and lifted the officer to his knees, then to his breast, in strong arms that cradled him like a child, and began hurrying back with his burden to the shelter of the friendly camp, from which a dozen eager men were running with offers of help. The first of them caught Captain Baring from the staggering, bleeding figure of the man who had braved a whole line of Boer bullets.

"You've earned the Victoria Cross, lad," he said, "and you'll get it too."

But Private "Ned Thomas" of the "Dublins" fell upon his face at the man's feet, without an answer, and they said afterwards that he must have been hit mortally just as he rose to carry Captain Baring back to camp, and that for the last few yards of the race he had been practically a dead man!

Prison and starvation flung behind him, he had won fame and honour in the moment of his dying, and had lost them in the winning, to find them again on the other side.

Roland Baring did not marry Esther Davey, for she was dead before he was able to return to his native country.

But if any man says that the life of James Fosdyke was thrown away, he may have the satisfaction of knowing that I can give him the lie direct.

WRONGED BY THE LAW.

TOLD BY AN EX-WARDER.

Now and then you read of the case of a man, executed or sent to prison on circumstantial evidence, who turns out to have been wronged by the law, and we all know that certain men, if drafted into the jury box, will refuse to convict on such evidence.

One need not be greatly troubled with doubts and fears, however. Convictions which wrong the innocent are very few, and circumstantial evidence who turns out that can be adduced. While it rarely brings harm to an honest man, it can weave such a web around a guilty one that there is hardly a chance of escape.

Twice in my life I have had to do with criminals convicted on circumstantial evidence, and that they were not guilty of the crime attributed to them and were unjustly convicted and sentenced was in a measure their own fault.

There came to us, when I was assistant warden in one of our convict prisons, a man named Ransom, who had been a merchant and a prominent citizen in the town of Colwell.

He was about forty years old, well educated and gentle in his manners, and after a time he was made book-keeper in the office.

He had been tried and convicted of setting fire to his shop for the sake of the insurance money. That was not the worst of it; a clerk in his employ who slept on the premises had been presumably burnt alive, and Ransom received a sentence of fifteen years.

At the trial it was proved that he was hard up financially; that his stock was over-insured; that creditors were pressing him; that he left the shop at nine o'clock one evening and flames broke out soon after.

For a couple of hours he could not be found, and when he did appear he was greatly agitated and upset.

The prisoner made what was called a good defence, but the lame point in it was that he could not account for his time between nine and e even o'clock of that evening.

He first claimed to be at home, and when this was shown to be false, he told other untruths.

He, of course, claimed that the fire was an accident, and had he told the truth, and the whole truth, about his movements, it is doubtful if he could have been convicted. A bit of good detective work would have put a different face on the matter at the outset.

It was six months after Ransom came to prison before I heard this story from his own lips. There are but few men among the convicts who will not talk if given a chance. The talking mood came to him and I encouraged him to go ahead and make a clean breast of it.

He might not have told me all had he not heard that day that his wife had renounced him and gone back to her parents, thus breaking him all up and making him feel that he must tell his story to somebody to relieve his over-burdened mind.

He told me everything and concealed nothing, and when he had finished I was satisfied that he had told the truth and was a wronged man.

He had a brother who was quite well to do, and who strongly believed in his innocence, and in the course of a fortnight we had a detective at work.

I said that a clerk had been presumably burnt with the premises. This was looked upon by nearly every one as a fact, and it entered into the case greatly to the man's prejudice and that without even a search of the ruins for the bones of the victim.

The young man had gone to his room over the shop at eight o'clock, and he was not seen after the fire.

Owing to there being a lot of barrels of oil in the cellar it had been a fierce fire, and there had been an explosion that had shaken the walls down. The clerk's bones were no doubt under the heap of debris, but they had not been found and identified.

That was a queer thing, you will say, and so it was, but the prosecution would take no steps as the real charge was arson, and so it was left to be assumed that the clerk perished in the flames.

"Did he or did he not?" was the first question to be solved by the detective.

Every shovel of debris was taken from the cellar after a week's hard work, but no bones were found. If the young man was burnt some evidence ought to exist. He was known to have a revolver in his room, and to carry a silver handled pocket knife. Neither of these were found. He likewise had half a dozen rare old coins, but not one was found in the ruins.

His best suit of clothes had metal buttons, but not a button of the sort was discovered. In a week the detective was satisfied that the clerk was not burnt with the shop. If alive where had he gone to, and why did he go away at all?

There was another clerk who had not gone, and after a vigorous pumping he was led to say that he believed his fellow clerk had been guilty of stealing and had run away. In the next ten days he was found at his uncle's house two hundred miles away, and two hours after he was found, he owned up that he had embezzled about £150 in less than three months, and had fled because he knew the merchant was overhauling his accounts. He left the shop about nine o'clock that night, and knew that Ransom was below.

As to the fire, he had not heard of it, but remembered that he had left a candle burning in his room.

When the detective returned to Colwell and talked with those who first discovered the fire, he found they were agreed that the flames worked downward instead of upward, proving that the fire started from above.

Where had Ransom put in the time from nine to eleven o'clock? He had already told me. He had visited the house of a woman in the outskirts with whom he was infatuated, but nothing would make him admit it to disgrace his wife and children.

He believed that he set the shop on fire by accident, and when arrested he wanted to conceal so much that the case looked clear against him. Inside of three months from the time we began work he was at liberty, but he was financially ruined, broken in spirits and wandered off west to die in the course of two or three years.

A straight story from him at the outset, corroborated by the woman, would have resulted in his discharge, as the over insurance was shown to have been the result of a misunderstanding with the agent. In seeking to avoid a village scandal Ransom had dishonoured himself and family, and suffered imprisonment.

Another case of being wronged by the law, which I also discovered, was that of a female convict sentenced for life for the murder of her husband by poisoning. This was altogether a case of circumstantial evidence. She was the wife of a farmer, and although they had lived together for fifteen years they had always quarrelled and jangled. On a certain occasion she had been heard to wish him dead; she had inquired about poison; she had wished herself dead.

One day the woman was bitten by a neighbour's dog. She made threats of what she would do, and a bitter quarrel was the result. A week later she called at the village chemist shop and complained that her house was infested with rats and bought a quantity of strychnine.

A few days later there was another quarrel and she left the house. On the highway she met a neighbour and told her all the details and added that she had "fixed" her husband so that there would never be another quarrel. Two days after that he was found dead in the house, and a post-mortem proved that he had been poisoned by strychnine. Suspicion fell upon the wife, of course, and when her trial came on her lawyer made but a poor defence. It was a plain, straight case, and the jury were not over half-an-hour in bringing in a verdict of guilty.

Mrs. Sherman, as the woman was named, had been in prison a year or more before she told her story to the matron. Each and every prisoner has a story to tell, and that story always makes the teller innocent of crime, but one learns to sift out and retain the truths if there are any.

The woman seemed to have awakened from a trance and to realise for the first time where she was. While she admitted buying the poison, she declared it was for the dog, and that he had really been put out of the way. What she meant by "fixing" her husband was that she knew he stole a lot of wheat from a neighbour and could be sent to prison for it. He had the poison in his possession, knew what she bought it for and placed it in the meat thrown to the dog. How he came to take it was more than she could tell, unless with the intent to commit suicide. She had been gone two days when he was found dead, and the doctors agreed that he had not been dead more than twelve hours when the body was discovered.

There was a point there for her but it was not worked out. She gave me many other points not related above, and as a result I set a detective to work on my own account.

The first thing he had found was that the dog had been poisoned at the time she stated. The next was that about thirty bushels of wheat had been stolen at the date she gave and that her husband rested under suspicion as the thief.

The wife left home on a Wednesday morning. The detective soon hunted up several people who had seen her husband about the place even up to nine o'clock on Thursday morning.

Not one of these people had been called at the trial. If they had been the prosecution might have claimed that the poison was so placed that the man did not get hold of it until next day. The detective therefore went further.

It took him two weeks to do it, but he hunted down a tramp who had called at the farmhouse about ten o'clock on Thursday morning.

The tramp found the farmer alone and suffering, and from his incoherent talk understood that he had determined to take his own life and had already swallowed poison.

There was an empty glass and a paper which had contained the strychnine, and the tramp was beseeched to "hurry on and tell Mary" that she might see him before he died.

Instead of thus concerning himself the fellow helped himself to some provisions and clothing, and he had on a coat belonging to the dead man when overhauled by the detective.

While I was soon satisfied of her innocence, and brought several others round to my way of thinking, it took six months to get the case re-opened, and even then it was ridiculed by the Press and public.

The solicitor who had taken the woman's case through the court and not even raised a doubt in her favour, called to tell me that all the lawyers in the county could not even get a disagreement of the jury if the case was reopened, but we, nevertheless, went ahead with it.

In two days her character was cleared and she stood a free and innocent woman, but yet only half the public were satisfied, and to this day there are scores of people who believe that she was guilty and ought to have ended her days in prison.

She went to a far-off town, but her name as "The Borgia" followed her there and prevented her from making a living, and a year later came the news of her suicide by jumping overboard from a steamer.

A DROP OF WATER.

THE foremost of the Arabs stumbled suddenly, and pitched heavily forward upon the sand. His companion, who had been following closely in his footsteps, stopped, hesitated, looked abstractedly across the flat expanse of desert, and then began feverishly to unfasten the leather water bottle from the girdle of the prostrate man. He held it up, shook it slightly and listened. There was not a sound. Cautiously he tipped the bottle more and more, until it was completely inverted; but not a drop of the precious liquid greeted his red, restless eyes.

He put his hand to his breast and drew forth a similar bottle from the folds of his long, flowing robe. Yes! Thanks be to Allah! there were still a few mouthfuls left; and a rasping laugh came from his blistered throat as he shook the bottle and listened to the life-giving gurgle within. Then he raised it to his lips. An instant later and it was snatched violently from his hands, several drops of its precious contents splashing out upon the thirsty sand, where it was immediately swallowed up.

With a cry more nearly like that of a despairing animal than a human sound, he sprang upon his companion, bearing him heavily backward to the ground and in the shock of the fall the bottle slipped from the other's hand and rolled some distance away, where it lay wavering and distorted by the intense heat.

Both saw what had happened; and filled simultaneously with a nameless dread that it might be lost to both of them, lay still for a brief second and watched it.

Then the struggle began again. Over and over the brown figures rolled, the hot sand burning like fire wherever it came in contact with the naked skin, and their breath coming in quick gasps from between their cracked and swollen lips.

The intense physical strain was plainly telling upon their strength, and seemingly urged by a common impulse they paused a moment, each retaining his hold upon the other's body.

The wind shifted the finely powdered sand and drove it persistently into eyes and open mouths. The heat became unendurable; better to die fighting than to die slowly roasted to death by the blistering sun, and that with water almost within their reach.

Again in the blind fury of their struggles the distance was slowly widening between them and the half-emptied bottle, so that when in another minute or so, they paused again, it lay several yards away, and was already beginning to parch and crack in the frightful heat that poured down upon it. A harsh rattling sound broke the fascinating stillness.

The legs of one of the Arabs jerked convulsively once or twice, the muscles of his neck twitched slightly, any slowly rolling over upon his back, he shuddered and la still.

The other man struggled painfully to his knees. He looked wonderingly at the dead form beside him for an instant, and then burst into a hoarse peal of laughter that jarred appallingly upon the solitude of the place and hushed him instantly.

In the mad terror of delirium that now settled down upon him he began slowly making his way across the waste of sand that separated him from water and a few more hours of life.

It was a last supreme effort to shake off the already tightening grasp upon his throat. His eyes were red and bloodshot, and from between the tightly drawn lips his dust-laden tongue lolled horribly.

Once he looked back, but what he saw there only urged him to fiercer effort, and with almost superhuman endurance he dragged himself inch by inch towards the goal.

A few seconds, that seemed an eternity to him, and the fearful struggle was at an end. In a frenzy of delight he seized and raised the bottle to his smarting lips, only to fling it away again, for even in that short time the fierce heat had done its work; and through the half-opened seams, drop by drop, the water had leaked out and vanished deep into the hot sands.

The grasp on his throat tightened; he tried to cry out, but his swollen tongue seemed to be choking him, and no sound came from between his lips.

The delirium gained headway fast, and he began to dig furiously in the loose sand where the bottle had lain as if he would follow and overtake the priceless fluid before it was lost to him for ever.

Gradually the flesh was wore away from the finger tips, leaving the bone exposed; but he seemed to take no notice, and only dug the more desperately, on and on, until at last the overtaxed brain gave way, and, like a mortally wounded animal, he collapsed suddenly, and pitched limply forward upon the sand. A puff of hot, suffocating air blew some sand over him. More and more sifted into his nostrils and trickled down into his blackened throat.

A beautifully mottled lizard paused an instant, eyed distrustfully the strange object in its path, and then darted swiftly away, scattering the sand at every step. And over all, a vast presence from the world beyond, hung the appalling stillness of the great desert.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

For years past Britain and the Transvaal have been spoiling for a fight, and it was left to that well-known author, Mr. George Griffith, to write a strong and exciting serial nearly four years ago graphically describing a huge war between the two countries.

This story, coming so soon after the Jameson Raid, was read with unusual interest.

Now that Briton and Boer are in deadly conflict it will be interesting to read the story, and see how far the imagination of the author has actually come true.

SUMMARY OF OPENING CHAPTERS.

Chapter I.—The scene op us on the Rand. It is the eve of Amajuba day and a State ball is being given. To this comes Prince Paul Regna, a Polish nobleman, and his daughter, Princess Vavara. They are introduced to Dr. Leyds.

Chapter II.—Dr. Leyds returns to Pretoria to attend a midnight consultation at the Government buildings. The Prince's rooms are in the Grand Hotel opposite. By tapping the wires, which cross the street at this point, the Prince and his daughter overhear all that goes on, and telegraph the result by secret code to Europe.

Chapters III. and IV.—Amajuba day dawns. The Secretary accompanies the Prince and Princess to Krugersdorp, where, from the base of the Monument of Independence, the President makes a great proclamation. The Convention of London is abrogated, the absolute independence of the South African Republic is declared; the President unfurls a Union Jack and rends it to pieces. So the storm bursts!

CHAPTER V.

Bad News at Buluwayo.

"We can't get through to Palapye or Tuli, General, and a wire has just arrived from Sir Richard Martin at Salisbury to say that no replies have been received from Chimoyio for forty-eight hours."

Major-General Sir Frederick Carrington, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial, Colonial, and irregular troops in Rhodesia, received the piece of intelligence, at once startling and puzzling, from the lips of Captain Scott-Turner, his adjutant, while holding a sort of informal council of war in his headquarters in Buluwayo on the evening of the eventful sixteenth of December, 1896.

Lord Grey, administrator of the Chartered Company; Major Watts, chief staff officer; and Colonel Plumer, commanding the irregular troops which had been enlisted at Mafeking in the early part of the year, looked up simultaneously from the maps and papers which lay on the table before them with undisguised astonishment and some little concern depicted on their faces.

"What the deuce can that mean?" said Sir Frederick, after a brief pause, tapping the table gently with his finger-nails. Palapye, Tuli, Chimoyio! Why, that means that Rhodesia is no longer in telegraphic communication with the rest of the world.

"Captain Turner, see at once how far the lines are clear in both directions. Tell Captain Murray to have his troop ready to start in an hour's time for Mangwe. He must make his transport as light as possible and go as quickly as he can; but every man must take 200 rounds with him, and 10,000 more must go in the waggons. If he finds all right at Mangwe, as I suppose he will, he must leave his waggon and the extra ammunition with Mr. Selous, and then push on to Tati, and, if he can, to Palapye; but the moment he meets a check or finds the break in the wire he must get back to Mangwe as fast as possible and report. Tell Captain Drury to be ready to start at the same time for Puri, and let him take the same ammunition and follow the same instructions as you will give to Captain Murray, but let me know at once how far the wires can be trusted."

The adjutant saluted and left the room. As the door closed behind him General Carrington turned to the Administrator and said somewhat abruptly:

"Well, my lord, what do you think of this? Was I right or wrong in telling the Commissioner that there ought to have been thirty thousand troops in South Africa before the end of the year?"

"In other words, General, you take this as proof presumptive that your prophecy was right, and that our friends, the Boers, are out on the war-path?"

"Our friends the Boers be ——— smashed. They've never been friends of ours and never will be till they've had the biggest hiding on record. Yes, I believe that's it. There is no other way of accounting for it, and to my mind for a good many other things that have happened. We ought to have smashed these niggers months ago. They oughtn't to have had a cartridge left by the end of last August, and yet here they are in every brush we have with them, blazing away as if they had all Woolwich behind them and shooting faster and straighter every week.

"Where did they get their Lee-Metfords from, and who taught them to use them? Why do they scarcely ever come out into the open now and give the Maxim a chance as they used to do? Why are the friendlies disappearing in hundreds every week? Why are a hundred other things that you know of happening if they haven't got someone behind them, and who can that someone be if it isn't the Boers? God grant that there may be another explanation, but I'll be hanged if I can see one."

"I hope you are wrong, General," replied Lord Grey very seriously, "but I confess I can see no other explanation at present. At any rate there is obviously only one thing to be done till we get definite news, and that is to act as though your suspicions were correct."

"Exactly," said Sir Frederick. "That is just what I mean to do. We must hold Mangwe and Puri at all costs, and get in touch with Salisbury as soon as possible. I hope they have got plenty of ammunition up there, for we shall want every cartridge and every gun-charge we can lay our hands on."

"To my mind," said Major Watts when the General had finished speaking, "the news from Salisbury is even more serious than the other. After all, the Kaffirs may have cut the wires on the Tuli and Palapye lines, though I admit it is not likely, but they could hardly have cut the Chimoyio line unless the rebellion has crossed the border at last. That looks rather more like an international matter to me. I hope those Portuguese beggars haven't gone back on us, and sold Beira to the Dutchmen."

"I can hardly see how they could do that," said Colonel Plumer, "unless something very big has been happening very quickly."

"To my mind there has been something very big getting ready to happen ever since Robinson allowed old Kruger and young Leyds to spoof the Home Government as they did over the Jameson business. Indeed, I don't see how we could have expected anything else. Here we have been standing by watching the Transvaal and the Free State arming every man and boy to the teeth, bringing in guns by the dozen and ammunition by the ton from Germany, importing German officers to drill their artillerymen and what they call their police, building forts and sprinkling laagers all round the frontiers for the last twelve months, and meanwhile we have been apologising to them for bringing a few hundred British troops into British territory to smash these niggers, and now here we are with about five or six thousand men in the country to tackle forty or fifty thousand of them. If the Government had made up its mind to lose South Africa it couldn't have set about the job in better fashion. Come in! Well, Turner, what's the news?"

"Selous reports all well at Mangwe and line open as far as Tati. Captain Bowden has sent out scouts from Tati to the Junction Post to find the break, and if possible get on to Palapye, but has heard nothing so far. Captain Satchwell wires from Puri that he can get nothing from Tuli. He has scouts out too but none have reported. There is no news from Maclutski of course, as Palapye is cut off. Sir Richard Martin wires from Salisbury that the line is open to Umtali. The Portuguese will make no reply from Macequece, or Chimoyio. Everything is quiet at Iron Mine, Charter, and Victoria. No rebels have been seen for some days, and scouts report generally that they have retired to the hill country behind the Matoppos. The two troops will be ready to start in half-an-hour."

Captain Scott-Turner made his report with soldierly brevity and directness, and it was received by the General and the members of his staff in serious, almost ominous, silence.

It left no doubt but that, however it had come to pass, all the main lines of communication between Rhodesia and the south and east of Africa were cut, and that for the time being those responsible for the defence and government of the country must act entirely at their own discretion and on their own responsibility.

It will here save time and future interruptions of the narrative if we leave the General and his staff to make their arrangements for dealing with the inexplicable emergency with which they were so suddenly faced, and take a brief survey of the course of the second Matabili war during the latter half of 1896.

Up to the middle of June all appearances pointed to the speedy break-up of the native power under the ably-planned tactics and vigorous attacks of Sir Frederick Carrington and the officers and men under his command. Then a sudden change had come over the campaign. The Matabili impis forsook their old mode of fighting, and, clearing entirely out of the open bush country in which they had been defeated time after time, vanished—some into the wilderness of the north-west towards Zambesi, and some into the difficult mountain country between the Matoppos and the Selous Pioneer Road, and then they began to play what was obviously a waiting game.

Almost simultaneously the Mashona tribes rose under Makone and Chibi, the two most powerful chiefs in the country, and the war became one of ambuscades and night attacks of difficult and costly marches through mountain valleys and gorges lined by concealed marksmen, who, as Sir Frederick had hinted, shot wonderfully straight for natives, and who vanished with disgusting celerity before the harrased and exasperated troopers could get within striking distance of them.

Again and again it had been suspected that this strange change of tactics was not originated by the natives themselves, and yet no white man had never been seen among them. Only the fact remained that as the encounters became rarer and more difficult to bring about their shooting continued to improve, and their supply of ammunition seemed inexhaustible. Many of the troopers, too, had fallen under bullets fired from Lee-Metford rifles, most of them of the "split" type, which broke up on touching a bone and inflicted the most fearful wounds.

Thus the war had dragged on month after month in spite of everything that skill and valour could do to bring matters to a decisive issue until now the cutting of the wires and the isolation of Rhodesia seemed to indicate that at length the mysterious power which had been fighting behind or through the rebels for so long was about to declare itself by some decisive action.

At this time there were about two thousand seven hundred white troops in Rhodesia, and of these about a thousand were distributed on the road between Buluwayo and Salisbury; some twelve hundred were stationed in and about Buluwayo itself. Mr. Selous held the Mangwe Pass, which is a mountain defile some twenty-five miles long about sixty miles south-west of Buluwayo, with three hundred men, four Maxims, and two seven-pounders. Captain Bowden occupied the Puri camp with two hundred men and two Maxims, while Fort Tuli and Palapye, having been considered perfectly safe, had only been occupied by a few troopers and transport officers charged with the duty of forwarding supplies, and, if necessary, acting as escorts to the mail coaches.

From this it will be seen that, granted the correctness of General Carrington's suspicion, the position of the British and Colonial forces in Rhodesia was an extremely serious one. With not quite three thousand men who could be relied on, for, as the General had said, the Friendlies had been deserting in hundreds, and were, therefore, no longer to be trusted, they were confronted by large but unknown numbers of the rebels hidden away in the defiles of the Matoppo hills and the forests of the back country, and flanked to the southward by the still unknown force which had suddenly cut their communication with their main base of supplies at Mafeking; while to the north, again, Salisbury was cut off from the railway and the sea apparently as completely as Buluwayo was from the south.

The position, too, was as embarrassing as it was serious. To march southward with any force adequate to reopen communication with Palapye and Mafeking would be to leave Buluwayo and the road to the north open to the attack of the Matabele impis, who would concentrate as quickly as they could scatter, and who would be certain to make a desperate, and possibly successful, attack upon the town the moment they knew that the bulk of its defenders had been withdrawn.

On the other hand, if the cutting of the communications was really due to the Boers, and they had actually declared war, or, what was the same thing with them, gone on the warpath without further formalities, they would already be massing in force along the two southern routes, and possibly by this time they were advancing on Buluwayo, in which case the little army of occupation must speedily find itself between two fires, with the savage impis in front of it, and the well-mounted, well-armed commandos of the Boers in their rear.

"There is nothing else for it, gentlemen," said General Carrington at the close of a council of war at which these and many other points had been earnestly reviewed and debated. "We must carry out the work that we came here to do first, and that as speedily as possible.

"In other words, we must clear those niggers out of the Matoppos and drive them down on the Nuanetzi and smash them there at any cost, and as quickly as possible. Selous will have nearly four hundred men at Mangwe when Murray gets there, and I think he can be trusted to keep the Boers busy there so long as the ammunition holds out. He'll be playing with them at their own game of potting from behind stones, and a little of that will go a long way with them.

"I shall send two hundred more men down to Puri and ask you to take command of the position, Colonel Plumer, with Captain Bowden as your second. I shall ask Sir Richard Martin to move down on Victoria with every man and all the ammunition that can be spared from Salisbury, as I don't think any attack is possible there, unless, of course, we are at war with Portugal, and in that case we must leave the Pungwe to the Imperial Government. Your lordship will, I presume, remain in Buluwayo.

"Major Watts, I shall leave you with two hundred men to look after the town. Captain Wheeler will stay with you in charge of the artillery, and, of course, all the men in the place will hold themselves ready for service if necessary. I needn't tell you what to do in case of an attack, which is most unlikely. I shall start myself an hour before sunrise, with the rest of the troops for the hills.

"We shall probably be pretty busy until Sir Richard Martin reaches Victoria; but by the time he gets there I hope we shall be driving the niggers down on the Nuanetzi, or perhaps the Bubye, though I shall try and head them off from the south if possible. In that case he'll have to push on down the road to Lundi and bring his column up the river bank, so that we can catch them between us. If we can manage this, that part of the problem will be solved, and by that time we shall know what the Boers are doing. If they really are on the warpath, I shall trust to you, Colonel Plumer, and Selous and Murray not to let them pass Puri or Mangwe till Sir Richard and myself come up, and then we'll see what we can do with them. The men will parade at half-past four in full marching order. Now, gentlemen, good-night, and if any of you can manage to dream anything in the shape of a way out of this fix that we seem to be in, I shall be glad to hear of it in the morning."

CHAPTER VI.

The Keyhole of Africa.

While the events which have just been narrated were taking place in the Transvaal and Rhodesia, certain others had been happening far away, as regards distance, yet for all that very closely connected with them, which had a very considerable effect in tangling still further the already involved web of international diplomacy.

A foreknowledge of them, had that been possible, would have very considerably modified the policy, not only of Prince Paul Regna and his beautiful daughter, but also of Mr. Secretary Leyds and the Transvaal Executive.

In order to arrive at a proper understanding of them, it will be necessary to put the clock back about a month, and to shift the scene from the Transvaal and Rhodesia, first to British waters and then to Delagoa Bay, "the keyhole of Africa," as it has been by no means inaptly termed.

At the close of the British Naval Manœuvres certain warships had disappeared, their disappearance having been accounted for by the official statement that they had been dispatched to relieve other ships of a similar class at distant stations, which they could not possibly reach at the ordinary ten-steaming rate of ten knots under five or six weeks.

As a matter of fact they didn't do anything of the kind. On the contrary, they coaled up to their fullest capacity, took in their full complement of powder, shell, and small-arm ammunition at Queenstown, Milford Haven, Plymouth, Portland, and Portsmouth, and steamed away to sea with a singular unanimity of direction for vessels which the newspapers of the day after their sailing described as having departed for widely different parts of the globe.

Twenty-four days later the officials of Lorenco Marquez were startled out of their habitual somnolence by the apparition of the most powerful flying squadron that had ever floated on the waters of their lovely bay. It happened, singularly enough, that two Russian battleships, the Navarin and the Gangout, with the cruisers Rurick and Russia, and the torpedo-destroyer Sokol were also lying there—a fact which was not unconnected with the dispatch of a certain telegram from Pretoria and the sudden sailing of a steam yacht after Mr. Michael Ostroff had replied to it to the effect that Prince Regna's luggage was coming up immediately.

The first intimation of the arrival of the British squadron was given by the destroyer Thrasher, which came tearing into the bay, at something between twenty-five and twenty-six knots, about daybreak on the 17th of December.

She slowed up as she entered the harbour, saluted the Russians by dipping her ensign as she passed, then ran in alongside the jetty, nearly opposite the old castle, and landed a lieutenant and twenty bluejackets, who marched rapidly up the quay to the foot of the Rua Guato y Castero, which leads to the Plaza, very much to the astonishment of a few drowsy loafers, mostly negroes, who were about at that early hour.

The Lieutenant presented a portentous-looking document, bearing the royal arms of Portugal, to the sentry on duty at the custom house, and demanded to see the officer of the guard at once. The sight of a handful of silver instantly dissipated the drowsiness and official surliness of the sentry. For the nonce he became as alert as he was polite, pocketed the silver with a salute, and proceeded to awake the officer of the guard from his morning slumber with a recklessness that only the possession of about a year's pay in hard cash could properly have warranted.

The officer looked in stupefied amazement at the document, read it three times over regardless of the manifest impatience of the Lieutenant, and then handed it back with a bow, saying:

"I cannot understand it, Senor; but no less can I disobey the orders of His Sacred Majesty. You and your men are free to pass. I will acquaint the Governor as soon as His Excellency rises."

The Lieutenant of the Thrasher returned the officer of the guard's punctilious salute correctly but somewhat hurriedly, and marched his men straight up by Point Reuben Road to the telegraph house and wired via Durban to Capetown the single word "Here." He then informed the clerk in charge that every message received or dispatched over the cables or the land lines must be immediately submitted to him under authority of the British and Portuguese Governments; and in substantiation of this somewhat extraordinary demand, he first presented the document which had gained him admission to the town, and then hinted pretty plainly that if this were not accepted as sufficient, the question would have to be decided by force majeure.

The clerk looked at the document and then at the Lieutenant, and then at the twenty bluejackets, armed to the teeth and looking extremely businesslike, and, being a man of business, he simply said:

"Very well, sir. It is a most extraordinary—I may say, in fact, unheard of—proceeding; but as you appear to have both right and might on your side, of course, I can do nothing but place myself and the wires at your disposal. At the same time, under the circumstances, I suppose you will have no objection to my calling the Director of the station to make the arrangements with you? To tell you the truth, I scarcely care to undertake the responsibility myself."

"I've not the slightest objection to that," said the Lieutenant, "but I'd rather you didn't leave the instrument for the present, at any rate, until I get my reply from Capetown. How long do you think that will be?"

"If the lines are clear you may get an answer in half an hour," replied the clerk, looking up rather uneasily.

"As long as that? Of course you'll find the line clear, or at least I fancy so. However, if it will be as long as that perhaps you had better go and call the Director."

Nothing loth, the clerk left his seat and the room, and in a very few minutes the Director came back with him. The necessary explanations were soon over, as the conditions of the case left but little room for argument, especially after the Lieutenant had given his pledge that the British Government would be responsible for the hire of the line to Cape Town during the time that it was at his disposal.

These little preliminaries being concluded, Lieutenant Mark Ferris, of Her Majesty's torpedo-destroyer Thrasher, offered the Director a cigarette from a very neat little curved silver case, which he took from an appropriate resting-place in the watch-pocket of his waistcoat—it had two neatly entwined monograms engraved on the side that reposed next to his heart—took one for himself, lit it, and asking the Director to excuse him for a moment, pencilled the two letters "O.K." on a piece of paper, called two of his men and sent them down to the quay with it, then he said to the Director:

"I suppose there is a pretty good view of the bay from your platform up yonder on the roof?"

"Oh, yes," was the reply. "Anything interesting likely to be going on?"

"Well, very possibly," said the Lieutenant, answering the Director's smile with another.

"Ah! then in that case, perhaps, you wouldn't object to join me in an early cup of coffee up there, or would you prefer whisky and soda?"

"Coffee with pleasure," said the Lieutenant. "It's a bit early for whisky and soda, even in Delagoa Bay. If you'll allow me, I'll have a couple of my men in here, so that one of them can bring me the answer up. It's important, you know, that I should have it immediately it arrives."

"Oh, ah! yes, of course if you wish it," replied the Director, looking rather curiously at him.

"Thanks. Can't afford any mistakes, just now, you see. It will be particularly awkward, not to say a trifle serious, as I expect you'll be able to see for yourself before long. Now I'll just call my two fellows in, and then I'm at your service. We may miss something if we wait much longer."

As soon as the two bluejackets had received their orders the Director and the Lieutenant went up to the look-out platform, which commanded a magnificent view of the inner harbour between Rueben Point and Mawhone Point.

Some fifteen minutes passed in sipping coffee, puffing cigarettes, and rather desultory conversation, the Director meanwhile thinking, and quite rightly, that his guest was curiously reticent and preoccupied.

At length the latter looked at his watch for about the fifth time, got up from his chair, pulled a small but very powerful binocular telescope out of his pocket and proceeded to scan the ships in the bay intently through it, meanwhile humming gently to himself between the puffs of his cigarette disjointed fragments of a tune which the Director recognised as an imperfectly rendered version of "After the Ball." Suddenly he blew the stump from his lips with a short, sharp whistle which was echoed as it were, by the distant bang of a gun from the bay.

"Blank!" he said as the hills about the harbour rolled out their answer to the report. "A good job it wasn't shotted at that range. Ah! that one meant business," he went on as another bang, deeper toned than the first, broke the stillness of the early tropic morning.

Then the Director heard something very like a sigh of relief, and after that came the muttered words:

"That's an act of war; no mistake about that. No court martial now, thank God! Lucky it didn't hit her. Now then, Thrasher, my little beauty, every knot you've got. Put her into it, Stevens! Hurrah! missed again! Ah! there comes the fleet! Now, gentlemen, you'll have to shoot a bit straighter than that, or we shall have to teach you."

The Director had sprung from his seat at the sound of the first shot about as quickly as if he had expected the shell to burst under his chair. He came to the Lieutenant's side and said rather nervously:

"May I ask what the meaning of all this is, sir? Is it possible that war has been declared between ourselves and Russia?"

"Yes, sir, that shot means war," said the Lieutenant somewhat shortly, and turned his glasses seaward again.

The scene before him could hardly have been more interesting, not to say exciting, even to a sailor and an officer situated as Lieutenant Ferris was. As the Thrasher had started from the jetty at about half speed, a signal flew from the Navarin ordering her to stop and come alongside. This had been answered by the destroyer with a sudden leap forward, and the flinging up of two clouds of spray from her bow in obedience to the signal, "Full speed ahead," and under the whole impetus of her six thousand horse-power engines, the long black craft had rushed away through the smooth water of the bay at a speed that was not very far short of thirty-five statute miles an hour.

Then had come the blank charge from the Navarin's six-inch breechloaders, quickly followed by a shell—so quickly indeed, that the Lieutenant saw that the second gun must have been ready loaded.

This meant a good deal. It meant, in a word, that the Russians strongly suspected the designs of the Thrasher, and were ready to stop her getting away, even at the risk of committing an act of war.

The shell burst only a few yards wide of the flying little craft, then out of a dun-smoke cloud that had been lying along the eastern horizon across the wide mouth of the harbour since the light had been strong enough to show it, there came the flash of a pale stream of flame, and a few seconds later a shell burst high up in the air over the bay.

"A well-timed shell, that," said the Lieutenant. "They ought to see from that we have not sent the little Thrasher alone to fight the squadron. That was one of the Terrible's nine-inch, I suppose. Ah, here she comes! Now, I suppose there will be a bit of a row. Missed her again! That's shockingly bad shooting, gentlemen. There, she's round the Point! Well done, Stevens! Has that answer come yet?"

"Yes, sir," said one of the bluejackets who had just come up the platform. He saluted and handed the Lieutenant a seemingly meaningless jumble of words. He looked at it, and read its meaning thus:

"Hold cable, and capture or destroy enemy at all cost. Admiral proceed Cape Town, leaving Revenge, Edgar, Thrasher, Delagoa."

"That will do, Roberts. Go down and wait for anything else that comes," said the Lieutenant as he folded the paper up and put it in his pocket. Then he turned to the Director and said: "Now, sir, you must understand that war is virtually declared between Great Britain and Russia. A British squadron is coming to capture or sink all the warships in the bay, and to take possession of the harbour for the time being. You, however, needn't trouble about that, as it has been arranged between the two governments. Now will you be good enough to hoist the red ensign on the flagstaff at once. When you've done so I'll explain matters as far as I can."

The Director nodded and left the platform.

While this was taking place at the telegraph station the Russian warships had slipped their cables and were heading out to sea. The Portuguese battleship Vasco da Gama, which was lying near them, contented herself with hoisting her flag and remaining quietly at anchor as though the matter did not concern her very much. Lieutenant Ferris stood with his eyes glued to his glasses, inwardly fuming, and feeling anything but contented with the really important duty that he had so successfully performed, and watched the preliminaries of the fight that was coming with such patience as he could muster, which was not very much.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Member's Wife," by the Hon. Mrs. Henry Chetwynd, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. E. Makepeace, 24 Hood Street, Morpeth. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 5th. Post-cards only, please.

"Which Eye?"

DURING the bombardment of Alexandria, in 1882, Lord Charles Beresford asked a gunner if he could hit a man who was on the fort. The gunner replied:

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Then hit him in the eye," said Lord Charles.

And he was considerably astonished when the gunner replied:

"Which eye, sir?" E. M.

Fully Qualified.

A YOUNG fellow the other day presented himself at a certain recruiting station and volunteered for service in South Africa.

"Can you ride?" asked the sergeant in charge.

"Yes," replied the would-be volunteer.

"Can you shoot—that is, shoot from the saddle?"

"Yes."

The sergeant, however, was not satisfied with the fellow's bare word concerning these qualifications, and accordingly led the way to a courtyard at the back.

"Now then," said the sergeant, as a horse kept for the purpose of testing the riding capabilities of applicants was brought forth, "let me see what you can do."

The young fellow clambered into the saddle, and the horse after walking a few paces broke into a canter, then into a gallop, and at a crack from the sergeant's whip suddenly stopped dead, shooting the rider clean out of the saddle on to the ground.

"No good coming here with a pack of lies," said the sergeant good-humouredly.

"Pack of lies," exclaimed the fallen and crest-fallen applicant from his seat on the ground, "I never told you a word of a lie. If I hadn't been a good rider I should have been seriously hurt, and as for shooting, did you ever see a fellow shoot from the saddle as I did just now? You can't help admitting, sergeant, that I'm fully qualified." C. R. F.

Commandeered It.

ONE morning a few weeks ago a soldier entered the camp at Modder River leading a scraggy-looking goat by a piece of string.

His entrance was the signal for a burst of laughter from his comrades.

"What ho, Dick!" cried one of them. "Wot 'ave you got there? 'Ave you stolen it?"

"Stolen it be blowed!" said Dick. "I've commandeered it, an' left my blooming receipt chalked on a tree." A. H.

"A Terrible Accident."

A MANCHESTER soldier now at the front in describing how they make "duff" whilst on board and dispose of it, says:

"We had a terrible accident the other day with our duff.

"After making it, we took it to the cook-house where they boiled it. When it was served at dinner-time, it was all dough in the middle, so we took it back and roasted it for tea.

"When we got it, we broke three picks, four spades, ten knives, and seven forks, trying to cut or break it. At last we threw it overboard, and as we threw it the boat ran into it.

"It shook the ship from stern to stern; the captain stopped the engines, thinking we had struck a rock. After sounding the well they found the ship wasn't leaking, and when we told the captain what it was, he was going to put us in the guard-room for wasting Government rations." G. N.

It Certainly Would be Awkward.

A RAILWAY man responsible for the transit of a giraffe from Liverpool to London managed to get the animal on a truck, but it would not lie down, neither would it be seated. He coaxed it, pleaded with it, and tried to make it lie down; but in vain.

It gave the man a stony stare, and continued its melancholy clatter on the truck floor.

"Why are tha struggling with, Jim?" asked the goods guard, with a winsome smile, as he walked by.

"Well," replied the panting servant, "I'll reckon tha'll have some strugglin' wi' him when t' train gets t' first bridge. If tha' doesn't tie his neck in a knot, he'll have his head knocked off!" W. T.

She Knew.

"DID the postman leave any letters, Mary?" the mistress asked, on returning from a visit one afternoon.

"Nothing but a post-card, ma'am."

"Who is it from, Mary?"

"And do you think I'd read it, ma'am?" asked the girl, with an injured air.

"Perhaps not. But anyone who sends me a message on a post card is either stupid or impertinent."

"You'll excuse me, ma'am," returned the girl, loftily, "but that's a nice way to be talking about your own mother!" S. E.

Where He Served.

A certain colonel (now dead) was noted for his generosity. He had lost an arm during the Indian Mutiny, and this made him very sympathetic towards all who had met with similar losses.

While walking on his estate one day he met an old one-legged man, evidently in abject poverty.

"Ah! you have met with a great misfortune, like myself, I see," remarked the colonel.

"Ah!" replied the old man, "and like yersel', colonel, I have spent a great pairt o' my life in Her Majesty's service, and seen a hantle o' hard work."

"My poor man!" exclaimed the kind-hearted colonel, as he pushed a half-crown into the old man's hand, "I fear you have received but a poor reward for your services."

"Ye may weel say that, colonel," replied the veteran as he hobbled away.

"But," added the colonel, "you didn't tell me where you served."

"Weel, if it comes to that," the old reprobate answered with a sly chuckle, "I served my time i' the Perth Penitentiary, whaur they gie'd me fourteen years for stealin' a cadger's horse!" J. H.

No Doubt About It.

A certain well-known general, in recently reviewing a crack Hussar Regiment, under orders for South Africa, suddenly stopped before a splendid-looking fellow, and asked abruptly:

"Which is the best horse in the regiment, my man?"

"No. 40, sir."

"What makes you think he is the best horse?"

"He walks, trots, and gallops well, is a good leaper, has no vice, no blemish, carries his head well, is in his prime."

"And who is the best soldier in the regiment?"

"Jim Nolan, sir."

"Why?"

"Because he is an honourable man, is obedient, tidy, takes good care of his equipment and his horse, and does his duty well."

"And who is the rider of the best horse?"

"Jim Nolan, sir."

"And who is Jim Nolan?"

"I am, sir!"

The general could not help laughing as he wished him good luck when at the front. F. W. F.

Working Under Difficulties.

There is an amusing story of a labourer who, failing to get a job of any other sort, at length took service as a diver at some new harbour works. Well, they got him into the kit, explained all about the communicating-cord to him, screwed his big helmet on, and let him go overboard. For six or seven minutes he was lost in the lower blue; then he signalled to be hauled up.

"Take this thing off my head," he shouted, and they removed his helmet.

"Boys," he continued, "this business is no sort o' good to me at all."

"Why not?" they asked.

"Because," said he, "I'll niver work where I can't shpit on me hands!" E. S.

Just a Difference in the Time.

The composer, Sir Henry Smart, played an organ in a London church, and his recital after church excited much attention; but one morning, after a selection from one of Mozart's masses, a churchwarden came into the organ loft, and "begged to inform Mr. Smart that they had decided that they could not have such jiggy stuff played in their church."

"Very well, sir," was the answer, "it shall be altered."

On the next Sunday dirge-like sounds proceeded from the organ, and the churchwarden congratulated the player on the solemn and elevating effect of the music.

"I am glad you like it," answered Mr. Smart; "doubtless if I played it a little quicker you will see the reason it affected you," and, suiting the action to the word, the popular strains of "Jump Jim Crow," resounded from the organ.

After this Henry Smart played what he liked.

A Girl With Ready Wit.

A young woman who lives near a railway crossing, looking out of the window the other day, saw a labourer jump from one set of metals to the other to escape an approaching train. He was apparently dazed by terror, and stood still, not seeing that an express train was rushing down upon him.

The girl saw that before she could make him understand his danger it would be too late. She therefore threw up her arms, shrieking wildly: "Help! help!" trusting to the impulse which sends a man on the instant to the relief of a woman in distress.

"I'm coming!" shouted the labourer, springing towards her in time to escape the engine as it rushed past.

He stared back at it, and then at the woman crying and laughing in the window, and, taking off his hat with shaking hands, said:

"I owe you something, miss," and walked away.

Some People Never Satisfied.

Some years ago a wealthy manufacturer in Canada, employing nearly a thousand hands, established a "model" city, thus giving the workmen and their families many comforts and luxuries that they could not have attained unaided. Of course, there were regulations to govern the model city, which, as a rule, were cheerfully observed.

There were fault-finders, however, and especially a new-comer, named Bascomb. Among the rules was one forbidding the burning of soft coal, on account of the odour and smoke, and Bascomb objected strongly.

"My goodness!" remonstrated a friend, "I don't see what you are growling about. We get hard coal at cost price, and, as one ton goes as far as two of the other, you ain't out of pocket."

"'Tain't right to forbid it," asserted Bascomb.

"Look here," demanded his friend, "do you really want to burn the nasty stuff?"

"No, I don't wanter," replied Bascomb, "but I wanter have the right in case I wanter!" B. S.

The Island of Zalenda.

SOMETHING had gone wrong with our engines, and, being in the Pacific Ocean, we put in for repairs to an island that happened just handy; latitude 20deg. south, longitude 120deg., or thereabouts.

No, it's no good your looking it up; you won't find it marked on any map or chart. The island was of volcanic origin, I believe (certainly, its inhabitants were!) and it has disappeared as mysteriously as it came into being. It was peopled by a race of beings who dressed and behaved, in most respects, like Europeans. All the luxuries and refinements of civilization were cultivated there to the highest pitch; all the arts and sciences as thoroughly understood as in the most enlightened countries of the West. When we first sighted the land, with its vast harbour full of shipping, and its noble public buildings, Captain Murdoch was amazed, never having heard of the place; but he was an old seaman, not much given to marvelling at things, and looked upon the matter as a rare piece of good luck in being able, so unexpectedly, to have his machinery skilfully mended.

Having nothing to do during our enforced stay on the island, we all bent our attention to exploring the town and neighbourhood, and having a good time generally. The inhabitants were very friendly, and treated us with the utmost hospitality.

Frank Lennox, the second officer, and I made the acquaintance of an influential merchant and member of Parliament, named Xilio, who invited us to take up our quarters at his house during our sojourn at Zalenda. He had two beautiful daughters, Melia and Seraphis. Their personal attractions were much enhanced by the artistic yet simple costume worn by the ladies of the place. It consists of a flowing, classic robe, girt round the waist with a gold chain, looped up on, one shoulder with a diamond pin, draped off the other and leaving arms, throat, and feet bare.

When I inform you that these girls' intellectual attainments were equal to their physical charms, will it surprise you to hear that two susceptible and impressionable young men fell in love—Lennox with Seraphis and myself with her sister Melia. The latter was fancy free; but poor Lennox was treading upon far more dangerous ground with Seraphis.

It is far easier to watch the course of others' love affairs than one's own. There was a young man named Kolophen, who was a constant visitor at Xilio's house. When he came one day, and found Frank and Seraphis on the veranda, sitting very close together, her fair, hair brushing his cheek, his arm, I believe—but of this I am not quite sure—around her slender waist, I detected an unmistakeable gleam of hatred in the dark passionate face of the young Zalendanese; but, like most of his countrymen, he was polite and reserved, and said nothing.

Xilio just then entered, and the pair of turtle doves on the veranda naturally drew apart. Conversation turned upon the subject of political and social institutions, and many were the questions asked me respecting European ways and customs.

"Your form of government here is republican?" I asked in return.

"Of course!" our host answered, as though no other form of rule were admissible to a logical mind. "Our parliament is constantly trying experiments; giving a year or two's trial to some eccentric law, in order to see how it will work for the people's good, I myself do not always approve. This leads me to speak of the one dark tragedy in our code."

"Ah, I know what you mean," Seraphis said plaintively; "please do not tell them, father, it might drive the Englishmen away."

Kolophen's looks said "I wish to heaven it would!" as plain as looks could speak.

"That cannot be," said Melia, in her sweet, flute-like voice. "Darcy and Lennox are of those who go down to the sea in ships, and such are always brave men."

But Seraphis had her own way, which I noticed always happened to this young lady. Ah! had she not done so a terrible calamity might have been averted. But there who can foresee the future or alter the decrees of destiny?

It happened on the following day that Lennox and I were strolling along the main street of the town when we met Kolophen. My friend saluted him politely, but the native was in no mood for amiable intercourse.

"Englishman," he began abruptly, "you have offered your base love to Seraphis, the younger daughter of Xilio, knowing full well that I—I, Kolophen, the son of Aramsis, have been betrothed to her ever since the days of our childhood."

"I—I did not know," Frank began, taken by surprise; "I am a stranger here, remember, Mr. Kolophen, and am very sorry if I have unwittingly caused any trouble."

"Sorry! Take your sorrows with you to the uttermost ends of the world!"

What followed was so rapid that there was no time for me to interfere—no time for anything but to realise the horror of it. Kolophen had whipped out a little jewelled dagger, stabbed the young sailor to the heart, and Frank Lennox lay on the pavement by my side a bleeding corpse.

The assassin folded his arms across his breast and never moved. Aye, and what was more extraordinary than all, a policeman, or peelah as they are called in Zalenda, stood on the opposite side of the street calmly looking on.

"You saw that?" I exclaimed, rushing across to the officer, as soon as I had ascertained that the poor young fellow was indeed dead.

"I saw," he answered imperturbably.

"Then why do you not arrest that man?"

"I cannot. There must have been a quarrel or some strong provocation. No gentleman would otherwise resort to such an extreme measure."

Good heavens! What a dreadful country this was, where a limb of the law called a cold-blooded murder merely an extreme measure!

"But, man alive!" I cried excitedly, "provocation or no provocation, there is a monstrous crime committed."

"It is no crime in this country, my dear sir. Go to Xilio's. I will see that your poor friend's body is directly conveyed there."

I went, and with tones full of rage and excitement poured out my tragic tale into my host's ears. Seraphis uttered a wild cry and threw herself upon a couch in an agony of grief, while Melia tried to console her.

"Poor Lennox!" said Xilio; "he was a fine fellow, too."

"But I am told his assassin can go unpunished according to your code of laws?"

"Yes, that is so. But does not the same hold good in your own England, only in a different form?"

"Good heavens, no!"

"Oh, yes. When murder is committed with you, you doom the supposed culprit to death on evidence which may all be false, the verdict of a jury and the sentence of a judge who may all be mistaken. Then again, you have what you call war—utterly unknown in our higher civilization. There the man who kills goes unpunished; and the soldier slays and is slain for quarrels not his own, which makes his conduct foolish as well as wicked. I have spoken strongly against our Act to legalise homicide, but when I hear of the institutions of other parts of the globe, I really cannot see the difference. Is it not a fact that some speakers with you, who considered themselves philosophers, in discussing the problem of war versus arbitration, were monstrous enough to say that war was a salutary means of doing away with some of the superabundant population?"

I stammered that I believed some such sentiments had been uttered, but asked him if the voice of conscience did not speak in the breasts of his blood-thirsty compatriots.

"Does it speak in that of your soldier, or your judge, your jury, or your hangman?" he retorted. "Bah! what you are pleased to call the voice of conscience is only the fear of punishment."

Xilio left me utterly dumfounded by the conclusion of his discourse; my host's tu quoque line of argument was so hard to answer according to his lights. I was aroused from my reverie upon these complex problems of life by the sensation of two soft white arms round my neck. It was Melia.

"And you will go back now to England thinking badly of us," she said; "and then you will forget——"

"Forget you, darling? Never!"

"But you must leave here at once. Your life may not be safe."

"What, leave you, my Melia?"

Great Scot! I knew now, if I never did before, I that must be badly smitten indeed. Here was I, a sober young Englishman, clinging to a land of justifiable homicides, all for the sake of this one sweet girl.

"If—if you could take me with you?" she exclaimed.

"What, loved one!" I said, taking both her hands in mine, and drawing her to me; "would you come to England and be my wife?"

"Oh, yes!"

"But your people?"

"There is no one here that matters. My mother is dead. A greengrocer killed her because she accused him of giving false weight in potatoes. My father is always wrapped up in politics. As for Seraphis, it seems she truly loved your poor friend. But it was not right of her to trifle with Kolophen, I have just taken her to her room. She is half distracted. She swears she will slay Kolophen the first time she meets him. They would think nothing of that here, but somehow—I cannot tell why—I could not like her so much after. Then Aramsis, the father of Kolophen, would probably kill my sister and then my father would kill Aramsis. It would be so unpleasant!"

I shuddered. The fiercest of Corsican vendettas seemed nothing compared with this.

"You know, dear girl, that if you go to England you may not kill your fellow creature as is the custom here?"

I thought it as well to mention this, so as to save any little unpleasantness that might arise from the peculiarities of her nation on landing at home.

"I know," said the dear girl, sweetly; "I don't mind. Bid my father farewell," she continued, "but say nothing to him; it will be best so. Go to your ship, warn your brave companions of their danger. I will join you there. Leave the rest to me."

I was more than ever impressed by the soundness of Melia's judgment. If I asked Xilio for his daughter's hand in marriage, the old gentleman might be a little cross, and I had already seen a tragic proof of what the anger of a Zalendanese meant. So I hurried away to find Captain Murdoch and apprise him of what had happened. Fortunately, the arrangements for departure were nearly complete, and I found the worthy skipper wrangling with a local official over excessive harbour dues.

"Pay you a hundred pieces of gold!" he was shouting; "absurd! you are a pack of heathen thieves!"

"For Heaven's sake, don't quarrel with them, captain," I cried, "or they will murder you!"

"Murder me? Pooh! Nonsense! They are not savages here, and while the Union Jack floats at our——"

"Oh, hang the Union Jack! Much they care for that, here. I tell you, Captain, that murder goes unpunished on this confounded island. Poor Lennox is dead!"

"Lennox dead!"

"Yes, and you shall share the same fate for your insolence!" exclaimed the harbour official, rushing upon Murdoch, but at that moment a white figure interposed, and held the man back with a commanding gesture.

It was my betrothed who had come down to the landing-stage, a travelling-bag in her hand—evidently meaning business. As the daughter of an M.P., she exercised considerable rights, and thus Melia saved the captain's life. We all jumped into the boat which was waiting for us, made for the offing where our ship lay, and soon weighed anchor, bound for Old England.

Melia has now got quite into our ways, and never speaks of her native country and its amiable customs. Perhaps that is the reason why my narrative has been received in some quarters with that incredulity with which sceptical people look upon the most veracious of travellers' stories.

A BLOODLESS VICTORY.

THE utmost secrecy had attended the construction of Her Majesty's cruiser Scourge. Her keel was laid in the large stone dry-dock at the Chatham Dockyard, about which a high board fence had been erected to exclude prying eyes. The material for her hull had been obtained from several manufacturers, thus baffling any attempt to discover the mutual relations of the various parts.

The further precaution was taken, after a certain amount of progress had been made upon her, of not permitting the men at work upon one portion of her hull to roam to other parts, a few reliable naval officers and trustworthy foremen being the only ones who had seen her develop in her entirety. She did not emerge from her hidden retreat until ready for sea in every particular, when, with a picked crew, she proceeded to sea at once, two weeks after the outbreak of the Anglo-French war of 1903.

As she steamed out of the harbour there was nothing in her external appearance to distinguish her notably from a second-class steel cruiser of about 3,000 tons, and a very commonplace one at that. Whatever secrets she embodied were evidently internal.

Discriminating eyes, however, quickly observed that she carried no guns and was not fitted with sponsons, ports or other places for locating them, and then it was at once recalled that, while she had been liberally supplied before leaving the dock yard with general equipment, coal and other stores, no armament or ammunition whatever had been conveyed on board, excepting three or four small quick-firing guns and a couple of maxims, and as the vessel stood out to Spithead it was seen that even these were mounted in such positions as to indicate their use solely for repelling torpedo-boat attacks.

She was practically an unarmed as well as an unarmoured vessel, and the theory at once arose that she might be merely intended to serve as a dispatch boat, after all. Yet if such was the case, no reason could be assigned for the jealous secrecy with which she had been guarded and a further obstacle to this theory was the fact that she had put to sea recklessly in the very face of several large cruisers of the enemy which were well known to be hovering off the coast. Opinion soon became about equally divided as to whether the Admiralty were extremely foolhardy or extremely sagacious.

At any rate, as the vessel steamed out into the cruiser infested Channel, no particular trepidation was discernible in the deportment of those on board. On the contrary, there was an evident eagerness to fall in with one of the enemy's ships, and in expressing this desire, no qualification was made as to the opponent's offensive or defensive powers, although several ventured the hope that the vessel encountered might be the Carnot, a huge, powerful cruiser of 14,000 tons displacement and twenty-two knots speed, carrying fourteen large guns in her main battery, and about thirty smaller quick-firing guns in her secondary battery.

This vessel had already wrought considerable havoc with the British mercantile service in the brief period that had elapsed since the declaration of war, and had lately sunk H.M.S. Raglan, a much larger vessel than the Scourge. The Carnot was now known to be off the Channel Islands, and much regret was expressed on the Scourge when night fell and nothing resembling her, or any other hostile vessel, for that matter, had been sighted.

The men were loth to go to their hammocks at "pipe down," most of the officers remained on deck until a late hour and it was with decided disappointment that Captain Pitner, the commanding officer, informed the new officer of the deck, when the watch was called at midnight, that for his part he preferred acting as a look-out himself throughout the night to entrusting that duty to men who did not seem to have eyes strong enough to sight a French cruiser in their way.

Yet not a light was sighted during the night, and when day broke the captain was thoroughly disgusted.

"Perfectly outrageous!" he exclaimed, impatiently, to the navigating lieutenant who stood by his side on the bridge, sipping his morning coffee. "For over a week these chaps have been constantly sighted in this part of the Channel, and here we are, all hands and the cook, on the look-out for twenty hours, and not a single one in sight. If we were a Thames penny steamer or an old gunboat, we would have struck a dozen an hour after leaving the Needles. Here," he added, after a pause, dropping a conversational tone for one of command, "I see only one thing to do. Cherbourg bears about south-south-west. Put the ship on that course and keep her on it until something turns up, even if it runs us into the harbour!"

Digitized by Google

Hardly had the helm been put over when a clear, exultant cry of "Sail, ho!" came down from the mast-head.

"Where away?" eagerly asked the officers on the bridge, in a breath.

"Broad off the starboard beam, sir."

"Can you make her out?"

"Yes, sir. A large steamer, bows on."

The Scourge's engines were at once stopped and she lay in wait for the approaching craft, which, as she drew nearer, was seen plainly to be a man-of-war, and the dense, black smoke that soon arose from her funnels showed that she had made a similar estimate of the Scourge's character and was putting on the forced draught to overhaul her.

"Shall I call all hands, sir?" inquired the officer of the deck.

"It is unnecessary," coolly replied Captain Pitner. "Let the watch below sleep until the usual hour. We shall only need the engineer's force and the artificers of the watch on deck for the present. You may hoist the colours. Ah, that is encouraging," he continued, closely scrutinizing the approaching vessel through the glass. "She appears to be a battleship, and flies the tricolour. Send for Mr. Kittrell, call the after duct's crews to quarters and tell Mr. Bootes to place his division in readiness for action and await orders. Head straight to windward, Mr. Gibson, and signal 'full speed' to the engine room—that is only fifteen knots, and our friend the enemy is surely making eighteen or twenty."

The big screws revolved, the cruiser headed away from her pursuer and stood on, as if straining every nerve to escape. On came the big French warship, gaining every minute. As she drew nearer, it was plain to every eye that she was a powerful vessel. Through the glass it could be seen that numerous sponsons jutted from her great black hull, indicating an extensive battery, and a closer inspection showed a threatening turret on her bows, from which protruded two particularly heavy guns.

Closer and closer she came, until only five miles separated the two vessels. Then a hazy puff rose from the pursuer's turret, a dark object hurtled past the Scourge and with a dull roar exploded a hundred yards ahead of her.

"Fairly good shot, that," quietly remarked the Scourge's cool commander. "In fact, too devilish good, for a starter. This seems to be the proper time to press the button."

At this he pressed his thumb to a button in the chart house; an answering ring showed that the signal had been received and understood below. A sepulchral voice from a speaking tube reported that the "discharge valves are in action, sir," and with a satisfied "Very good, await signal," the Scourge's commander once more fastened his keen eyes to the glass.

From now there was a marked increase in the interest with which those on the British cruiser regarded their pursuer. Without awaiting reveille, those below had come on deck and the rails were soon lined with eyes gazing intently astern.

"Be careful, everybody," sternly ordered Captain Pitner, immediately adding, in a pleasanter tone, "for about twenty minutes."

As he spoke another and another shot came from the enemy's ship, both shells, like the first, exploding ahead of the English cruiser.

As the foe drew nearer, within effective range of his smaller guns, several more shots came from the latter, one striking the signal yard arm, bursting and scattering fragments on the deck, fortunately without hurting anyone.

Then there was a pause. One, two, three minutes passed and not another missile came. As he pressed another signal button, a smile crept over Captain Pitner's face, which was quickly reflected on all.

Excited comments passed from mouth to mouth and then a spontaneous cheer arose from the English throats. Still the Frenchman came on, until only two miles distant.

"Starboard the helm," came the order to the Scourge's officer of the deck. "Go off a bit and then run parallel to the enemy's course. If he forges ahead, follow in his wake, but he'll slow down soon. When he fires again it will be with the Union Jack at the peak. Meanwhile, pipe the watch below to breakfast and have the watch on deck break out the grappling gear. Make all preparations for taking possession of the prize and notify me when we are under steerage way alongside. I am going below for a short nap now."

* * * * *

Two days after the date of the above events the Secretary of the Admiralty received the following official communication from Portsmouth:

H.M.S. Scourge (Second class cruiser), Spithead.

April —, 1899.

The Right Honorable ——, Secretary of the Admiralty.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that I arrived here this day, bringing in as a prize the French battleship Carnot, which was captured by the vessel under my command in the English Channel on the above date.

Both vessels are intact in every particular, and I have this day transferred 523 prisoners to the custody of the Dockyard authorities.

I would respectfully state that the action of the hypnocyanogen, and the apparatus for its liberation installed on this ship, fully justified every expectation. The two after liquor-ducts were put in operation, when the Carnot was five miles astern, and to leeward. The hypnocyanic liquor apparently vaporized as soon as it came in contact with the sea-water, and was quite invisible but, according to the subsequent reports of prisoners, its effects were practically instantaneous upon the Carnot's people.

Those in the magazines and the engine and fire rooms were the last to lose consciousness, averaging ten minutes after the first man succumbed on deck. Data are lacking as to the period of the gas's influence, as the medical staff of the Scourge revived the victims rapidly and promptly, by means of the prescribed restoratives, as soon as we took possession.

I regret to report two casualties in connection with the capture, one of the Carnot's enlisted men having received a contusion by falling from the ladder of a military mast, which he had started to ascend when overcome by the fumes, and another having an eye badly inflamed from a hot cinder which fell and rested upon it while he was lying prone and unconscious upon the deck. Both men, however, are now in hospital and will soon recover.

Awaiting the orders of the department, I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. E. Pitner,
Captain, Commanding.

On the 8th of January a swift warship, attended by two dynamite cruisers, left Portsmouth, bound for Odessa. She had on board the last of the Czars of Russia and those of his generals and Ministers who had been taken prisoners with him on Muswell Hill. A thousand feet overhead floated the Ariel, under the command of Alexis Mazanoff.

From Odessa the prisoners were taken by train to Moscow. There, in the Central Convict Depôt, they met their families and the officials whose share in their crimes made it necessary to bring them under the sentence pronounced by Natas. They were chained together in squads, Czar and Prince, noble and official, exactly as their own countless victims had been in the past, and so they were taken with their wives and children by train to Ekaterinenburg.

Although the railway extended as far as Tomsk, Mazanoff made them disembark here and marched them by the Great Siberian Road to the Pillar of Farewells on the Asiatic frontier. There they, as so many thousands of heart-broken despairing men and women had done before them, looked their last on Russian soil.

They were halted for the night in the clearing in which the Pillar stands, and when the grey light of the winter's morning broke over the snow-laden trees the men were formed up in line with the sleighs carrying the woman and children in the rear. When all was ready Mazanoff gave the word: "Forward!" the whips of the Cossacks cracked, and the mournful procession moved slowly onward into the vast, white, silent wilderness, out of which none save the guards were destined ever to emerge again.

EPILOGUE.

"And on Earth Peace!"

The winter and summer of 1905 passed in unbroken tranquility all over Europe and the English-speaking world. The nations, at last utterly sickened of bloodshed by the brief but awful experience of the last six months of 1904, earnestly and gladly accepted the new order of things. From first to last of the war the slaughter had averaged more than a million of fighting men a month, and fully five millions of non-combatants, men, women, and children, had fallen victims to famine and disease, or had been killed during the wholesale destruction of fortified towns by the war balloons of the League. At the lowest calculation the invasion of England had cost four million lives.

It was an awful butcher's bill, and when the peoples of Europe awoke from the delirium of war, to look back upon the frightful carnival of death and destruction, and to realise that all this desolation and ruin had come to pass in little more than seven months, so deep a horror of war and all its abominations possessed them that they hailed with delight the safeguards provided against it by the new European constitution which was made public at the end of March.

It was a singularly short and simple document considering the immense changes which it introduced. It contained only five clauses. Of these the first proclaimed the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon Federation in all matters of international policy, and set forth the penalties, to be incurred by any State that made war upon another.

The second constituted an International Board of Arbitration and Control, composed of all the Sovereigns of Europe and their Prime Ministers for the time being, with the new President of the United States, the Governor-General of Canada, and the President of the now federated Australasian Colonies. This Board was to meet in sections every year in the various capitals of Europe, and collectively every five years in London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, and New York in rotation. There was no appeal from its decision save to the Supreme Council of the Federation, and this appeal could only be made with the consent of the President of that Council, given after the facts of the matter in dispute had been laid before him in writing.

The third clause dealt with the rearrangement of the European frontiers. The Rhine from Karlsruhe to Basle was made the political as well as the natural boundary between France and Germany. The ancient kingdom of Poland was restored, with the frontiers it had possessed before the First Partition in 1773, and a descendant of Kosciusko, elected by the votes of the adult citizens of the reconstituted kingdom, was placed upon the throne. Turkey in Europe ceased to exist as a political Power. Constantinople was garrisoned by British and Federation troops, and the country was administered for the time being by a Provisional Government under the presidency of Lord Cromer, who was responsible only to the Supreme Council. The other States were left undisturbed.

The fourth and fifth clauses dealt with land, property, and law. All tenures of land existing before the war were cancelled at a stroke, and the soil of each country was declared to be the sole and inalienable property of the State. No occupiers were disturbed who were turning the land to profitable account, or who were making use of a reasonable area as a residential estate, but the great landowners in the country and the ground landlords in the towns ceased to exist as such, and all private incomes derived from the rent of the land were declared illegal and so forfeited.

All incomes unearned by productive work of hand or brain were subjected to a progressive tax, which reached fifty per cent. when the income amounted to £10,000 a year. It is almost needless to say that these clauses raised a tremendous outcry among the limited classes they affected; but the only reply made to it by the President of the Supreme Council was "that honestly earned incomes paid no tax, and that the idle and useless classes ought to be thankful to be permitted to exist at any price. The alternative of the tax would be compulsory labour paid for at its actual value by the State." Without one exception the grumblers preferred to pay the tax.

All rents, revised according to the actual value of the produce or property, were to be paid direct to the State. As long as he paid his rent-tax no man could be disturbed in the possession of his holding. If he did not pay it the non-payment was to be held as presumptive evidence that he was not making a proper use of it and he was to receive a year's notice to quit; but if at the end of that time he had amended his ways the notice was to be revoked.

In all countries the Civil and Criminal Codes of Law were to be amalgamated and simplified by a committee of judges appointed directly by the Parliament with the assent of the Sovereign.

The fifth clause of the Constitution plainly stated that no man was to be expected to obey a law that he could not understand, and that the Supreme Council would uphold no law which was so complicated that it needed a legal expert to explain it.

It is almost needless to say that this clause swept away at a blow that pernicious class of hired advocates who had for ages grown rich on the weakness and the dishonesty of their fellow-men. In after years it was found that the abolition of the professional lawyer had furthered the cause of peace and progress quite as efficiently as the prohibition of standing armies had done.

On the conclusion of the war the aerial fleet was increased to twenty-five vessels exclusive of the flagship. The number of war-balloons was raised to fifty, and three millions of Federation soldiers were held ready for active service until the conclusion of the war in the East between the Moslems and Buddhists. By November the Moslems were victors all along the line, and during the last week of that month the last battle between Christian and Moslem was fought on the southern shore of the Bosphorus.

All communications with the Asiatic and African shores of the Mediterranean were cut as soon as it became certain that Sultan Mohammed Reshad, at the head of a million and a half of victorious Moslems, and supported by Prince Abbas of Egypt at the head of seven hundred thousand more, was marching to the reconquest of Turkey. The most elaborate precautions were taken to prevent any detailed information as to the true state of things in Europe reaching the Sultan, as Tremayne and Arnold had come to the conclusion that it would be better, if he persisted in courting inevitable defeat, that it should fall upon him with crushing force and stupefying suddenness, so that he might be the more inclined to listen to reason afterwards.

The Mediterranean was patrolled from end to end by air-ships and dynamite cruisers, and aerial scouts marked every movement of the victorious Sultan until it became absolutely certain that his objective point was Scutari. Meanwhile, two millions of men had been concentrated between Galata and Constantinople, while another million occupied the northern shore of the Dardanelles. An immense force of warships and dynamite cruisers swarmed between Gallipoli and the Golden Horn. Twenty air-ships and forty-five war-balloons lay outside Constantinople, ready to take the air at a moment's notice.

The conqueror of Northern Africa and Southern Asia had only a very general idea as to what had really happened in Europe. His march of conquest had not been interrupted by any European expedition. The Moslems of India had exterminated the British garrisons, and there had been no attempt at retaliation or vengeance, as there had been in the days of the Mutiny. England, he knew, had been invaded, but according to the reports which had reached him, none of the invaders had ever got out of the island alive, and then the English had come out and conquered Europe. Of the wonderful doings of the aerial fleets only the vaguest rumours had come to his ears, and these had been so exaggerated and distorted, that he had but a very confused idea of the real state of affairs.

The Moslem Forces were permitted to advance without the slightest molestation to Scutari and Lamsaki, and on the evening of the 28th of November the Sultan took up his quarters in Scutari. That night he received a letter from the President of the Federation, setting forth succinctly and yet very clearly, what had actually taken place in Europe, and calling upon him to give his allegiance to the Supreme Council, as the other sovereigns had done, and to accept the over-lordship of Northern Africa and Southern Asia in exchange for Turkey in Europe. The letter concluded by saying that the immediate result of refusal to accept these terms would be the destruction of the Moslem armies on the following day. Before midnight, Tremayne received the Sultan's reply. It ran thus:

"In the name of the Most Merciful God.

"From MOHAMMED RESHAD, Commander of the Faithful, to ALAN TREMAYNE, Leader of the English.

"I have come to retake the throne of my fathers, and I am not to be turned back by vain and boastful threats. What I have won with the sword I will keep with the sword, and I will own allegiance to none save God and His holy Prophet who have given me the victory. Give me back Stamboul and my ancient dominions, and we will divide the world between us. If not, we must fight. Let the reply to this come before daybreak. "MOHAMMED."

No reply came back; but during the night the dynamite cruisers were drawn up within half a mile of the Asiatic shore with their guns pointing southward over Scutari, while other warships patrolled the coast to detect and frustrate any attempt to transport guns or troops across the narrow strip of water. With the first glimmer of light the two aerial fleets took the air, the war-balloons in a long line over the van of the Moslem army, and the air-ships spread out in a semicircle to the southward. The hour of prayer was allowed to pass in peace, and then the work of death began.

The war-balloons moved slowly forward in a straight line at an elevation of four thousand feet, sweeping the Moslem host from van to rear with a ceaseless hail of melinite and cyanogen bombs. Great projectiles soared silently up from the water to the north, and where they fell buildings were torn to fragments, great holes were blasted into the earth, and every human being within the radius of the explosion was blown to pieces, or hurled stunned to the ground. But more mysterious and terrible than all were the effects of the assault delivered by the air-ships, which, divided into squadrons, swept hither and thither in wide curves, with the sunlight shining on their silvery hulls and their long slender guns, smokeless and flameless, hurling the most awful missiles of all far and wide, over a scene of butchery and horror that beggared all description.

In vain the gallant Moslems looked for enemies in the flesh to confront them. None appeared save a few sentinel's across the Bosphorous. And still the work of slaughter went on, pitiless and passionless as the earthquake or the thunderstorm. Millions of shots were fired into the air without result, and by the time the rain of death had been falling without intermission for two hours, an irresistible panic fell upon the Moslem soldiery. They had never met enemies like these before, and, brave as lions and yet simple as children, they looked upon them as something more than human, and with one accord they flung away their weapons and raised their hands in supplication to the sky. Instantly the aerial bombardment ceased, and within an hour East and West had shaken hands, Sultan Mohammed had accepted the terms of the Federation, and the long warfare of Cross and Crescent had ceased, as men hoped, for ever

Then the proclamation was issued, disbanding the armies of Britain and the Federation and the forces of the Sultan. The warships steamed away westward on their last voyage to the South Atlantic, beneath whose waves they were soon to sink with all their guns and armaments for ever. The war-balloons were to be kept for purposes of transportation of heavy articles to Aeria, while the fleet of air-ships was to remain the sole effective fighting force in the world.

While these events were taking place in Europe, those who had been banished as outcasts from the society of civilised men by the terrible justice of Natas had been plodding their weary way, in the tracks of the thousands they had themselves sent to a living grave, along the Great Siberian Road to the hideous wilderness, in the midst of which lie the mines of Kara. From the Pillar of Farewells to Tiumen, from thence to Tomsk—where they met the first of the released political exiles returning in a joyous band to their beloved Russia—and thence to Irkutsk, and then over the ice of Lake Baikal, and through the awful frozen desert of the Trans-Baikal Provinces, they had been driven like cattle, until the remnant that had survived the horrors of the awful journey reached the desolate valley of the Kara and were finally halted at the Lower Diggings.

Of nearly three hundred strong and well fed-men who had said good-bye to liberty at the Pillar of Farewells, only a hundred and twenty pallid and emaciated wretches stood shivering in their rags and chains when the muster was called on the morning after their arrival at Kara. Mazanoff and his escort had carried out their part of the sentence of Natas to the letter. The arctic blasts from the Tum-dras, the forced march, the chain and the scourge had done their work, and more than half the exiled convicts had found in nameless graves along the road, respite from the long horrors of the fate which awaited the survivors.

The first name called in the last muster was Alexander Romanoff. "Here," came in a deep hollow tone from the gaunt and ragged wreck of the giant who twelve months before had been the stateliest figure in the brilliant galaxy of European Royalty.

"Your sentence is hard labour in the mines for——" The last word was never spoken, for ere it was uttered the tall and still erect form of the dethroned Autocrat suddenly shrank together, lurched forward, and fell with a choking gasp and a clash of chains upon the hard-trampled snow. A stream of blood rushed from his white, half-open lips, and when they went to raise him he was dead.

If ever son of woman died of a broken heart it was Alexander Romanoff, last of the tyrants of Russia. Never had the avenging hand of Nemesis, though long delayed, fallen with more precise and terrible justice. On the very spot on which thousands of his subjects and fellow-creatures, innocent of all crime save a desire for progress, had worn out their lives in torturing toil to provide the gold that had gilded his luxury, he fell as the Idol fell of old in the temple of Dagon.

He had seen the blasting of his highest hopes in the hour of their apparent fruition. He had beheld the destruction of his army and the ruin of his dynasty. He had seen kindred and friends and faithful servants sink under the nameless horrors of a fate he could do nothing to alleviate, and with the knowledge that nothing but death could release them from it, and now at the last moment death had snatched from him even the poor consolation of sharing the sufferings of those nearest and dearest to him on earth.

This happened on the 1st of December, 1905, at nine o'clock in the morning. At the same hour Arnold leapt the Ithuriel over the Ridge, passed down the Valley of Aeria like a flash of silver light, and dropped to earth on the shores of the lake. In the same grove of palms which had witnessed their despairing betrothal he found Natasha swinging in a hammock, with a black-eyed, six-weeks-old baby nestling in her bosom, and her own loveliness softened and etherealised by the sacred grace of motherhood.

"Welcome, my lord!" she said, with a bright flush of pleasure and the sweetest smile even he had ever seen transfiguring her beauty, and stretching out her hand in greeting as he approached, "Does the King come in peace?"

"Yes, Angel mine! the Empire that you asked for is yours. There is not a regiment of men under arms in all the civilised world. The last battle has been fought and won, and so there is peace on earth at last!"

The End.

Dr. Conan Doyle's Opinion of It:

"An excellent idea. My own private idea is that the future of musketry in action lies in the direction of high-angle dropping fire, against which trenches and parapets are useless. I have been endeavouring to perfect a means for making this reasonably accurate, and I think that I have succeeded. Wishing you well in your attempt to drive your point home."

Sir Charles Dilke says:

"I have read Mr. Frank Harris's pamphlet with interest, as I do everything which comes from its author's pen."

The St. James's Gazette says:

"We have received a brilliant pamphlet embodying a "Conversation in Hades," written by Mr. Frank Harris, which is published this morning. We are far from endorsing all the opinions expressed in these pages: indeed, with many of them we are very obviously at variance. But in spite of that, we believe they contain the right answer to a question which has hitherto been asked in vain by every Englishman."

The Brain Gymnasium.

On this page, under the title, "The Brain Gymnasium," appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors with interest and profit to themselves, during the long winter evenings. Many of the tasks set are comparatively easy of solution, while others are designed with a view to taxing the abilities of the most proficient in this direction.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the sender of the greatest number of correct solutions, and to the senders of the ten next highest number of correct ones will be presented either one of our silver-plated pencil cases or a copy of a popular six-shilling novel. Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, March 12th, 1900.

No. 52.

Divide 101 into three parts so that the first and second parts added together make the third, and the second and third parts added make the first.

No. 53.

Take words signifying "to put together," "a moiety," "to baffle," and "assistance," and with the letters contained in them form five other words, which, read backwards, will give the names of two familiar flowers.

No. 54.

Form one word from two words signifying "a dance," and "suitable," and then behead it four times so that complete words of the following parts of speech are left: a verb, an adjective, an adverb, and a verb.

No. 55.

I am something of which every reader of Short Stories is fond. Divide me into two, and it is sometimes necessary to make my first, in order to obtain my whole. There can be no doubt about my second. What am I? Trying to solve this puzzle will perhaps give you the correct answer.

No. 56.

A C E G I M N N.

From the above letters select three which will form a word, and then, adding one of the remaining letters each time, form five other words.

No. 57.

Replace the following with words, the initials of which will form the name of a well-known statesman:

A regiment in the British Army.
A quadruped much in use in South Africa.
Weapons of war.
A reserve of the Army.
A body of troops.
The standard of a regiment.
A list of soldiers.
An officer in the Army.
Great guns.
Foot soldiers.
One of the divisions of Africa.

£10 in Cash.—H. L'ESTRANGE BURGESS, Bayham House, Sevenoaks.

40 Persons have Won £23 Cycles Free of all Cost. There were over 90 more Cash Prizes than there were Competitors.

In this, the last Free Prize Competition that will be promoted, it is a matter of utter impossibility for any competitor not to receive an award without having to pay anything at all save the two penny stamps enclosed for postage. The only instance where any payment is made to us, is when a competitor has been successful in gaining a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or Consolation Prize, in one of our ordinary competitions. A nominal sum has then to be paid according to this advertisement for a Cycle which 18 of the World's Greatest Critics, 12 Cycling Papers, 249 Newspapers, and 5,845 Riders have pronounced, and pronounced emphatically, to be well worth £15 cash in the ordinary market. We send you absolute proof of all these statements when forwarding results of competition. We have never received an adverse Press notice, or heard of a Prize-winner being dissatisfied after taking up his or her machine. All Prize Machines (which are exactly the same as those which cost £15, £16, £17, £18, or £19 in the ordinary way) are sent out strictly on approval; and the full amount paid us, together with carriage, is willingly refunded if the cycles are not fully worth, not merely what is paid for them, but our usual selling price.

WHAT TO DO.—SEND IN REPLIES EARLY.—Make up the best sentence you can out of seven words, each word commencing with a letter of T A W W T A P in proper order. Thus, for example, "They Are Well Worth The Advertised Price." This is an extract from a notice in the Athletic Record (now Pastimes) September 3rd, 1898. Enclose two penny stamps for postage of result of competition, with Catalogue, Testimonials, etc.

FIRST PRIZE: £23 A.B. SAFETY.

SECOND CLASS (9 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - - £9
THIRD CLASS (12 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - £10
FOURTH CLASS (15 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - £11
FIFTH CLASS (18 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - £12
SIXTH CLASS (20 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - £13
CONSOLATION (25 Prizes), Similar Cycle for - £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—Competition is NOW OPEN, and CLOSES on THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1900.

Enclose two penny stamps for postage of Result of Competition. As so few are able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for any prize if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We desire it to be distinctly understood that we reserve to ourselves the right of increasing the number of prizes in the competition set in this paper. Results will be declared as soon as possible. Prizes unclaimed in a week or ten days are forfeited.

£100 If you can purchase our cheapest machine, brand new, from us, or any agent, dealer, shipper, or factor can buy one for less than FIFTEEN SOVEREIGNS, we will promptly hand you a £100 BANK OF ENGLAND NOTE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 584.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending March 10th, 1900.

TWO MEN AND MARGARET.

THE sole bachelor in Waveny was ill. The full importance of this fact could only be understood by one who had dwelt in Waveny, for the little mountain town with its environment of deserted copper mines was one of the "has beens" of Queensland. Sons and brothers left it early to seek work beyond the western ranges, so that Waveny was a feminine stronghold, with a few staid fathers, and a cadet corps of little boys to vary the monotony.

The clergyman was a widower, certainly, but a misanthrope, and had been known to return gifts of slippers and comforters—therefore, when Billy Heron set up as mining agent and stockbroker, bringing with him satisfactory letters of introduction and an unlimited capacity for the enjoyment of afternoon teas, and the society of girls, Waveny awoke to new life.

Billy was not handsome, being over six feet, and not broad in proportion. His features were large and roughly hewn, but he had a quick smile, white even teeth, and a thick crop of chestnut hair, which waved Byronically from his forehead.

His inherent appreciation of womenkind individually, and in the abstract, ensured his position amongst them from the first, and he was adept enough in all manly sports to gain the approval of the fathers and brothers; in fact, it was to the training of a horse for the Werrimu amateur races that he owed his present illness—a sprained wrist, scratched face, and feverish cold, which combined to keep him to the little back parlour of his office, and the tender ministrations of the Irish servant, who brought over his dinner from the neighbouring hotel, and the little Gulf blackboy who cleaned his boots, attended to his horse, and was generally useful. At least he was apparently left to their ministrations; in reality half the girls in Waveny society were burning their faces over "invalid cookery," and the small brothers were continually running messages and carrying baskets to the office.

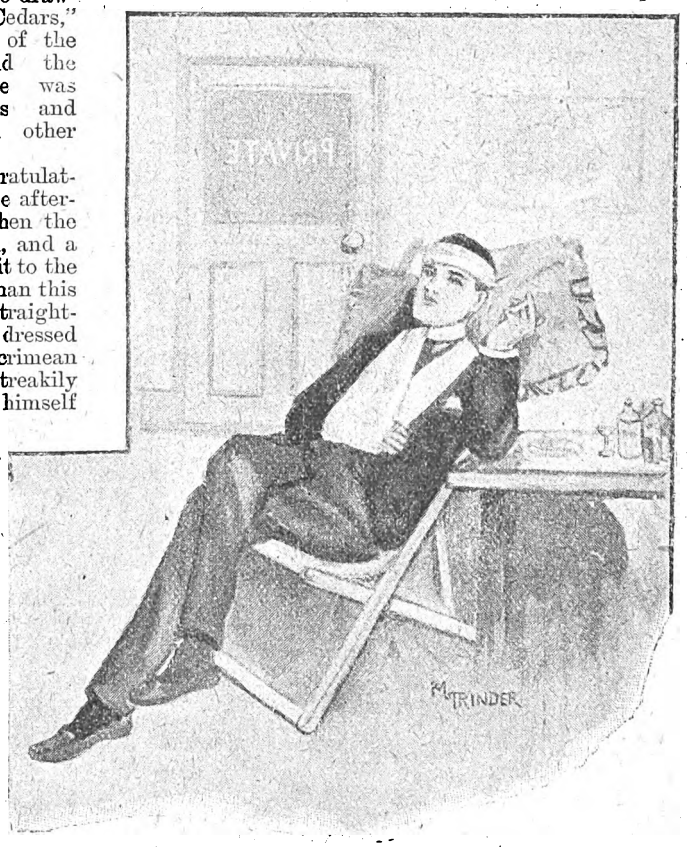
One warm summer's afternoon he was lying back in a canvas chair, propped up by Liberty-silk cushions. The cushions came from the drawing-room of the "Cedars," which was the home of the principal lawyer, and the oilcloth-covered table was crowded with bottles and baskets of fruit and other dainties.

He was inwardly congratulating himself on the free afternoon he was having when the office door swung open, and a visitor walked through it to the inner room. It was a man this time—a brown-faced, straight-limbed young bushman, dressed in moleskins and a crimean shirt, cleanly, but streakily washed—probably by himself in some grass-bordered, limestone creek along the track. His hat, boots, and gaiters were the worse for wear—the boots especially proclaimed the fact that he had travelled a long way on foot—as in truth he had, for his horse had died beyond Bourke during the heat wave, and work had not been plentiful along the route. There was a bright look of expectation on his face as he advanced towards Heron; the latter half rose, looking inquiringly at him.



One warm summer's afternoon he was lying back in a canvas chair.

"I'm Charlie Cliffe—but I don't expect you to know me in this rig-out."

Charlie Cliffe! In Heron's mind's eye rose the blue waters and melancholy sweep of scrub-clad cliffs of Port Jackson. He heard again the ripple of waves against the sides of the man-of-war, and the plash of trained oars as the boats brought their loads of gay society people from the jetty. For it was at an "afternoon" on H.M.S. Orlando that he had last seen Charlie Cliffe, the spruce young Englishman, who, as orphan, nephew and adopted son of Miles Fordham, one of Sydney's wealthiest merchants, had been welcomed by its society with open arms.

"Charlie Cliffe—great Scott! old man, I should rather think I wouldn't know you—come in and sit down—well, this beats creation—left hand please, right's incapable."

"An accident? By Jove, you have been knocked about!"

"Yes, a spill; training a mare for the Werrimu Amateur. But what brought you to this part of the world; when last we met it was at a spree on the Orlando. High old times you were having too."

Cliffe smiled a little sadly.

"I've known what it is to rough it since then," he said. "Uncle Miles cut up rough because I wouldn't marry to please him; a business arrangement between himself and the girl's father, and neither of the interested parties 'on.' Consequently we had a row, and I cleared out to shift for myself in the bush. Took a run to the goldfields first—can't say I made a fortune—and then became a 'sundowner,' looking for jobs. I was glad enough to work for tucker sometimes. Sometimes neither tucker nor work was on the carpet, and, well, here I am."

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good," said Heron. "I'm jolly glad to see you anyhow. (Here Jacky, you black imp! bring in some glasses, and be quick about it.) And where are you bound for now?"

"Sydney. Read that!" And he handed Heron a slip of paper. It was a newspaper cutting from the "Missing Friends" column, and informed Charles Standish Cliffe that if he would return to M. F. bygones should be bygones and ample restitution would be made.

"I picked that up with some scraps on a deserted cattle camp, and I made south on the strength of it. Waveny is the first railway station I have come to. Of course I could have gone by Hendra but I heard you were here, and I have come to borrow a fiver to take me down at once, so that I can see how the land lies—that is, if you think the security good enough. The old man may still wish to work his own plans, counting on the hard life to have broken me in, in which case I shall clear out again. If not, he will probably take me into the firm as he intended doing."

"Draw on me for what you like. Fordham isn't the one to take half measures; he was always fond of you; but you can't get a train until mid-day to-morrow. You must have a shake-down here."

"Thanks, no. I will go back to my camp to-night, but will see you in the morning and have a yarn over old times."

"Just as you like. I want to hear all you have been doing of late. As for me, things have panned out fairly well. I have got on to some fair things in mines, and the place isn't too bad—fine climate, whips of pretty girls, but wants other fellows to make things hum. By-the-way, an old friend of yours is staying here with Stephens, the lawyer. I suppose you have not forgotten Margaret Revel?"

"No, I have not forgotten her."

Cliffe's tones were even and studied, and Heron looked earnestly at the wall as he continued:

"You were talking to her when I said good-bye to you in Sydney. She had a white dress on, and a black hat, with feathers; and I thought what a well-matched pair you were. You were great friends, I think?"

"Yes, great friends, but so she was with half-a-dozen others. I expected to hear she was married long ago, or engaged at any rate."

"Not to my knowledge, and she does not seem to flirt now. Well, I always thought there was something between you two."

"I suppose I had my dreams," said Cliffe, quietly; "but the catastrophe came so soon after you left, and I had to forget them."

Heron looked thoughtful, and was about to reply when the outer door swung open, and a heavy step and a rustle of silk betokened a fresh visitor.

He looked at the clock despairingly.

"They'll begin to come in shoals, now," he said, "and goodness only knows when they will stop. Oh! come in, Mrs. Stephens. This is good of you. May I introduce my old friend, Charlie Cliffe. Awfully kind of you to take so much trouble."

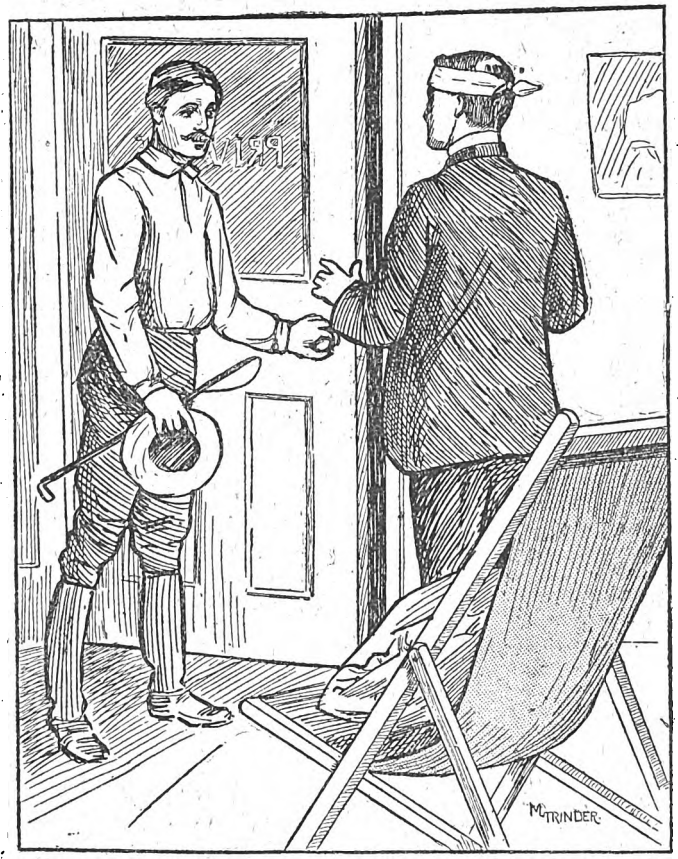
Mrs. Stephens was a large lady; she bowed stiffly to Cliffe, and deposited a basket on the table.

"How are you?" she said. "Minnie will be here directly. The dear child is all nerves; she has been quite upset since she heard Dr. Lee pronounce your symptoms to be feverish. She is bringing some black currant cordial—it is remarkably good; and how did you like the jelly? Poor Minnie was afraid it had too much flavouring in it."

The advent of Miss Minnie, in a picturesquely frilled sun-bonnet, print frock, and innocently "tucked pinafore," created a slight disturbance. She brought the cordial in a jug, and Heron shuddered as he glanced into its dismal depths. Minnie was a plump rabbit-faced little thing, with big blue eyes, and a quantity of dull black hair, and she could only look adoringly at the invalid while her stately and ample-waisted mother moved round the room inspecting the "offerings at the shrine."

Heron skilfully threw a cushion over the French novel lent him by the summer boarder—a certain Miss Smith—at Cray's Hotel, and listened deferentially to Mrs. Stephens's remarks.

"H'm—this is a Priory basket. Peaches in it, and windfalls, too, if I know anything about fruit. Easy enough to pick up a few peaches, but I'd like to see those Wycherley girls cooking for an invalid. Mrs. Rose—she is my washerwoman—lives quite close to them, and tells me the waste at that house is terrible. I really couldn't tell you—" But what Mrs. Stephens couldn't tell for once was not known, for she glanced out of the window, and became as red as a turkeycock.



Cliffe again refused the offer of a shakedown.

"There's that Miss Smith—actually coming in at your back gate. That girl seems to dispense with a chaperon altogether."

Heron jumped up, and called Jacky to open the door and Miss Smith sailed in. She was a stylishly dressed person, of uncertain age and beauty, but had fine eyes and a good figure. She bowed coldly to the Stephenses, who had not called upon her, and smiled ravishingly at the two men, and then walked to the table.

"I've brought the lotion I promised you," she said, "and I'm going to rub it in on the poor face."

She had very white hands, much beringed, and she untied the bottle slowly.

"Very good of you, Miss Smith," said Heron, inwardly thanking his stars that the application was external this time.

"Minnie," said Mrs. Stephens, sternly, "pour out a glass of the cordial. It should be taken while it is hot."

Heron looked miserable. He was under many obligations to the lawyer's family, and could not afford to offend them. Still, the mixture looked horrible.

"My throat is A 1, to-day," he began, but Mrs. Stephens was adamant.

Digitized by Google

Minnie poured out a glassful, and Heron took the dose manfully, in spite of the fact that it was as evil-tasting as it looked.

Cliffe turned to assist Miss Smith and to hide his merriment. She was soaking a bandage in the lotion, and, taking it out, she proceeded to untie the handkerchief which bound up Heron's damaged forehead. She lingered over the task caressingly, with her deft, white hands.

"Minnie, come here at once."

The matron's words were few, but her tones said a thousand things.

"We will call again when you are disengaged," she added.

"Oh, pray don't move, Mr. Heron. We should be sorry to disturb such a charming picture," and she swept past with a rustle of silk and buckram, while timid Minnie gave one adoring backward glance—(for with her "the king could do no wrong,")—and whispered, "Take it every two hours—for my sake."

Heron returned that adoring glance with interest. With his nature he could no more have helped doing so than he could have flown.

Miss Smith smiled.

"Guess the old lady don't like me," she said. "You have offended her this time. Ah, Billy, it's all your own fault. You should not flirt with every girl in a small town like this. They are bound to compare notes some day; clever as you are, it can't last."

Heron gave her a quick, tender glance, and touched one of her beautiful hands with his own "sound" one.

"You know I do not flirt," he said softly. The lotion was really soothing, and Miss Smith looked remarkably well in the subdued light. Still he was glad that the operation was finished when the three laughing handsome Wycherley girls from the Priory came in, bringing with them a breezy sense of life and health. Tenderly sympathetic they were, but, having the sense to see that the patient was really tired, they did not stay long after the exit of Miss Smith. They were polite to Cliffe, but the real interest was in Heron. They fluttered about like a flock of white doves, and arranged their offerings of baby roses and violets in a bowl, and then they floated out again.

The men watched them cross the sunlit street to where a fourth girl was standing, apparently waiting for them. She was tall and slight, and had a lot of bronze-gold hair that looked like a halo against the sunlight, and they heard Grace Wycherley call out merrily:

"Hope we did not keep you waiting very long, Queen Margaret."

Both men watched the group until it melted away into the green shadow of the trees round the flower-set square and then Cliffe broke the silence.

"Miss Revel looks well," he said. "Do you expect her here at all?"

"No. She has not been to see me since I was laid up, although she is staying with the Stephenses. I don't think Miss Revel cares a red cent whether I live or die!" And he flung back to his chair, limping badly as he went. He was only human, and the continued spoiling was having its effect, though he would have scorned the insinuation. Miss Revel was still an unconquered citadel of indifference, and it piqued him. Besides that, he had other memories of her, and she had flirted lightly with the bright young fellow when he was amongst a score of admirers who helped to make her "coming out" year so delightful. No doubt the effect of being in the same house with poor Minnie—reduced to a state of partial idiocy by her hopeless absorbing passion—disinclined her more than ever to join the army of devotees, and she could always hear the daily bulletin from them.

Cliffe again refused the offer of a shake down. "I feel queer myself," he said—"quite a new sensation, as I've been as strong as a horse through everything. It's a well known fact that bushmen always get a cold when they first sleep indoors after camping out, and I don't want to make the one that's trying to grip me a certainty. I'll see you to-morrow, old man," and so the two friends parted.

Cliffe turned down the main street, and was crossing the corner by Craig's Hotel, when he came face to face with Margaret Revel. She started and half turned towards him. Whether her pretty frock, neatly gloved hands, and well shod feet made him doubly conscious of his own weather-beaten, shabby turn-out, I cannot say. The slip of paper in his pocket meant in all probability that he was as well off now as in the old Sydney days, but the hardship and roughness of his life during the last two years seemed the only reality; all else a dream.

In a few moments Jacky was escorting the prettiest girl in Waveny to the gap scrub.

And during those years he had striven to forget Margaret's face, and it was like the re-opening of a wound to come across her so suddenly again. Whatever it was he did not answer her look of inquiry, but passed on. There were other bushmen in a group round the bar door, and he easily mingled with them.

There was little to distinguish him from the shearers and teamsters lounging there, and Margaret wondered what had made her so suddenly think of the band playing a waltz by Strauss, the white deck, and the blue waters of the harbour, that were not brighter or bluer than the eyes that were looking into her own.

Cliffe walked on like a man in a dream. "I must see Uncle Fordham first," he thought; "it may not be as right as it seems."

The bright sun had disappeared in a misty mountain rain, and a cold wind swept round the shoulder of Mount Craven as he reached his camp at the Gap. He thought of Heron's comfortable room, and regretted not having accepted his hospitality. Salt junk and stale damper is not a tempting supper for a man with a bad headache and darting pains in his limbs, and Cliffe took very little time over his meal before turning in.

A hungry dingo howled weirdly in the scrubs to the left, and the curlews called from the swamp.

In spite of the cold rain Charlie felt feverish and hot, and tossed restlessly from side to side. He thought of Heron's eyes, when Margaret Revel passed, and he remembered how fascinating a man "Billy," was considered in the old Sydney days. The very fact of the girl keeping away so persistently might mean that she was interested in, and self-conscious about him, and so on, and so was torturing himself with jealous doubts as men in the throes of an absorbing passion are apt to do; and thus, the night wore away.

He made a great effort and struggled to his feet, then staggered, and pitched forward.

Meanwhile, away over in Waveny the "other" man was in a seventh heaven of delight, for Miss Revel had paid him a visit at last, accompanied by Mrs. Stephens, Minnie, and the lawyer himself, who though willing to join in the family worship of the interesting invalid, sighed pathetically for his easy chair and paper at home.

Miss Revel had not been pressed to come.

Mrs. Stephens knew that Minnie did not look well beside this bright-haired Sydney girl; but as she declared that she wanted a walk, did not mind wet feet, and thought she really ought to inquire in person as to Mr. Heron's health, and skilfully combated all other objections, they were obliged to take her.

Heron felt terribly conscious of his unshaven chin, and blamed Jacky under his breath for not having tidied up a bit, and as Miss Revel inspected his various ornaments wished fervently that some of the photos of well-known actresses were not quite so pronounced.

Minnie was happy in being able to gaze at the object of her affections, and in seeing that the black currant mixture was half gone, and Mrs. and Mr. Stephens were engaged in an animated discussion, because the latter had said that Miss Smith had fine eyes. Margaret demanded a circumstantial account of the accident, and skilfully brought the conversation round to his day's visitors.

"Minnie mentioned a Mr. Cliffe," she said. "Any relation to the one—I think his name was Charlie—whom we used to meet sometimes at your father's house?"

"The same," answered Heron, trying to conquer his wish to change the subject. "Had a row with old Miles, and cleared out to try and keep himself. He is making for Sydney again now, and I hope things will pan out all right for him."

"I was away when he left Sydney," said Miss Revel. "Report said that he was engaged to Rachael Levi, Rabbi Levi's daughter. When I returned I heard that he had quarrelled with his uncle and disappeared."

"He did not mention names, but it was over the marriage question he fell out with Fordham. No doubt Miss Levi was the lady concerned. Cliffe would only marry to suit himself. He has had a rough time, poor chap, but intends leaving by the mail to-morrow, and is coming to see me first."

"I suppose he is in town to-night?"

"No, camping over by the gap. I wanted him to take a shake-down here, especially as he did not seem quite up to the mark. This unseasonable wet weather has brought a good deal of fever about."

"He used to be a divine dancer," said Margaret. "I wonder if he knows I am here."

"Yes, he asked after you, but I don't think he cares to show up in his bush clothes. He has had hard luck, but is improved by it if anything, and is the same good old sort he used to be. Can I offer you some of these peaches, Miss Revel; they are as good as they look."

The Stephenses made a move soon afterwards. Mrs.

Stephens had seen which way Billy Heron's eyes were attracted, and the magnet was not poor Minnie, and so the glimpse of heaven was perforce a brief one.

But about 5.30 p.m. next day Heron's cup was full, for Miss Revel slipped in through his side door to inquire after his health, and this time actually by herself.

"You look much better," she said.

"And I feel so. Sit down, and excuse me for a moment. I am sending Jacky with a note to Cliffe's camp. He has not been to see me, and I feel rather anxious."

"No, I can't stay. I really only called just to see how you were, and to tell you to be sure and get well before the Werrimu week. I have no end of gloves on Daisy Bell and the black and gold. As it is, I don't know what Mrs. Grundy and Mrs. Stephens will say if my unconventional visit becomes known," and she was gone again before Heron could turn round, leaving him to finish his note, not knowing whether to be delighted or angry first.

Margaret hurried quickly down a side street, and waited by the bridge until she saw Jacky's black face and strangely garmented form coming slowly towards her. She held her purse in her hand and intercepted him, and in a few moments Jacky was rich beyond all dreams of avarice, and was escorting the prettiest girl in Waveny to the gap scrub.

* * * * *

Of all miserable days in his life Cliffe had spent the worst, lying there in his wet clothes on the sodden ground in the grasp of rheumatic fever. Although he did not know it, he was delirious towards evening, and had given up trying to stumble townwards. The phantoms that had been stalking swiftly in and out of the dark forest aisles, leering at him with their strange inhuman faces, stopped and looked down at him, and then as suddenly disappeared again, as the clouds cleared from his brain in a last brief interval of reason. He felt that he must make another effort to reach Waveny while yet his senses were free.

He turned round slowly, bewailing at the torture the movement gave him, and then he saw coming straight towards him a tall, fair girl, whose hair against the slanting rays of the sunset looked like a halo of gold.

Was she but another of the phantoms that had been mocking him all day? Was it all a dream within a dream, and this seeming moment of sanity but a delusion like the rest? Miss Revel walked quickly towards him, followed by the black-boy, and then she stopped, her brown eyes wide with dismay.

He made a great effort, and struggled to his feet, then staggered, and pitched forward, a sound as of many waters in his ears, and through it all a woman's voice, crying, "Oh, Charlie, Charlie, my beloved, speak—only speak to me."

Comedy and tragedy are linked indissolubly in this world, and in after days Heron sometimes smiled to think how very unromantic was the medium through which he received first notice that the brightest dream of his heart was never to be a reality. Jacky was a faithful mimic, and threw into his soft, guttural tones a depth of despairing love and passion, as he clasped his ebony hands, and rolled his bright eyes, and repeated "Missie Revel's" words, "Charlie, my beloved, speak to me."

He had been giving a graphic representation of the scene of the finding of the sick man, but Heron was unprepared for this last detail. A mist seemed to rise before his eyes, and Jacky's voice, describing how he ran for the doctor, and how Cliffe was taken to the hospital, sounded further and further away.

Then he gathered himself together with an effort, and sent the astonished blackboy out of the room with injunctions to "Hold his tongue, and chop wood for an hour." And when Mrs. Stephens and Minnie came round later on to tell him the news, and to bring him a basin of gruel and wine, they were astonished to find that for once there was no admittance.

Indeed Minnie's sharp ears distinctly noted that the key was turned in the lock after they had knocked; but, being wiser than she appeared to be, persuaded her mother to raise the siege, and depart. She had seen a good deal with those innocent china-blue eyes of hers, and knew that many a heart is caught in the rebound.

It was Heron who sent the telegram the next day, summoning Myles Fordham to what so nearly was the death-bed of his beloved and only relative, but Cliffe's strong constitution triumphed, and four weeks afterwards he was well enough to lie on the hospital's pleasant south veranda, while Margaret read to him in her soft contralto tones.

Even Mrs. Stephens, who kept so strict a guard over Waveny morals, could find no exception to this, for old Fordham proclaimed to everyone the fact that Margaret was to be his adopted daughter, inasmuch as she had consented to be Charlie's wife, a choice he thoroughly approved of, for mutual interest and anxiety had drawn the old man and the young girl very close together during those weeks of watching and waiting.

Billy Heron refused to go to Sydney and be best man at his friend's wedding, and Margaret, who sincerely liked him, was not a little hurt at his firm refusal; and wondered which of the Waveny maidens was responsible for his attachment to the place, for Billy seemed to have become a more desperate flirt than ever.

But Charlie, with a certain look in Heron's eyes still fresh in his memory, was neither offended nor surprised, for he knew that though to Margaret the world held one man only, there were two men whose world was Margaret.

PRINCESS FIAKI'S BIRTHDAY.

As it was winter and very cold, they had drawn round the prince the screens of precious woods, in the little hall where he sat dreaming, his arm upon an elbow-rest richly inlaid with pearl.

Magnificent robes of soft, downy silk overlapped and crossed their many-coloured collars upon the breast of Daimio, and on the shoulder and embroidered in gold on the sleeves were stars formed by five balls surrounding a sixth, the well-known coat of arms of the illustrious family of Kanga, which had no equal in power in all Japan save the family of Shendai and the family of Satsouma. Yes, this prince, who meditated thus in the depths of his palace, was very powerful, very rich, and very renowned; his people admired and feared him, his vassals were ready to die for him, his least desire was a law to all surrounding him; nevertheless to-day, he found himself exceedingly unhappy, helpless, poverty-stricken in thought and fancy: for had he not, for many days past, sought for some surprise to celebrate the birthday of his only daughter and had been able to imagine none.

It was also true that this princess, who to-morrow would be sixteen years of age, possessed all that it was possible to possess—marvellous birds, fantastic fishes, extravagant dogs, chariots, horses, palaces, everything that one could conceive of, and even marvels of which one did not dream brought specially for her from distant countries.

The Daimio told himself, shaking his head, that he had too much indulged his beloved daughter; that he should not have indulged her thus till she had exhausted—she, hardly entered upon life—all the riches of the world. Now he had nothing to offer his child, to astonish and charm her.

Still pondering, still wondering, for a long, long while through the cloudy transparency of the window, he allowed his wearied gaze to wander over the stripped garden, under the grey and weeping heavens.

"What did she really desire?"

Suddenly he sprang to his feet.

"We will see her," said he, "see her, and perhaps be able, without her suspecting anything to divine her caprice."

He turned and struck the gong hanging by a silken cord from the teeth of a monster in bronze.

Immediately the panels forming the walls glided noiselessly apart, separated to each side, permitting you to see a long perspective of room after room filled by samourais of service, pages, guards, and household domestics. The samourais—noble vassals wearing two swords—bowed profoundly before him; the pages and servants prostrated themselves, brows to the ground.

"I am going to visit my daughter," said the Daimio, gravely. "Come!"

And immediately the escort formed about him, while the guards ran in advance to clear the way.

Fiaki—that is to say, Ray of Sunlight—in a well-closed hall of her own special palace, was seated, according to custom, upon broad white mats laid upon the floor, the long folds of her magnificent trained robes billowing and spreading about her like the leaves of a gorgeous fan, tissues, muslins, silks, and satins, the most abundant of them all a sky-blue gauze figured with spiders' webs in which were caught the petals of rare flowers.

The face of this young girl was white as cream, her tiny mouth like a cherry cleft in twain, disclosing two rows of fine little rice grains; her eyebrows shaved and replaced by two little black spots made with a brush and placed high up on her brow; while her long hair, following the mode of royal fashion, was unbound and streaming down her back to lose itself in the folds of her garments.

The maids of honour formed a half-circle about their mistress; and in front of her, behind a light carved balustrade, a dancer moved slowly, waving her fan in time to the notes of the orchestra, intoning a strange, weird chant, with a gotto, a biva, three kinds of flutes, a drum, and a tambourine.

At the prince's entrance the symphony ceased, and Fiaki quickly concealed behind the spiders' webs of her sleeve the twin cherries of her lips, which was a salute to her father, tender and chaste.

He smiled with pleasure at sight of the beauty and grace of his idolized child. She rose to greet him, and, like a sea agitated by a sudden tempest, the silk, satin, muslin, and brocade of her skirts rustled and undulated behind her. He caressed her lovingly, heaped her with tender names, calling her his Incomparable, his Supernatural Beauty, his Perfume of Heaven; then he demanded of her if she were perfectly happy, if there was aught that she desired?

"Ah! illustrious prince! adored father!" Fiaki responded, bending backward her supple body in a pretty movement of sorrow, "how can anyone be happy when the earth suffers as now, and the sky continually drops tears? The gods have been cruel in creating winter. Not even the purity of the snow can create for me an illusion of my vanished spring."

The Daimio listened thoughtfully; then, in a deeper reverie still, returned to his apartment.

"It is certain," said he to himself, "certain that spring, and spring only, is all that Fiaki desires."

And he stopped to lend an ear to the sharp wind blowing against the palace walls.

Already the twilight was far advanced, the dark night waiting to take the gray evening's place.

"Yes, spring, spring only," murmured the unhappy Daimio, dejectedly resuming the seat that he had quitted a while ago.

Suddenly his sorrow changed to anger, and he summoned his prime minister. Nai-Dai-Tsin ran, bending low his back and auguring nothing good for himself or others from the gloomy face of his master. The Daimio was silent a moment, as if hesitating to give an order so extraordinary; but soon, with an irritated shrug of the shoulders, he spoke:

"To-morrow, Nai-Dai-Tsin," said he, "will be my daughter's birthday. I desire—do you hear me? I desire, I say, that dawn shall break on the trees and bushes of the park and all the country round about the palace covered with flowers, as in the first months of spring. Go!"

"You shall be obeyed, master," replied the prime minister, bowing himself out backward.

But once outside, consternation seized him, and he let his arms fall helplessly in the long sleeves of his gown.

"It is exile, it is death!" murmured he, "yes death! For I have not the time to fly sufficiently far away, and thunder has fallen upon me from the clear sky full of prosperity!"

His legs bent under him; he caught at the walls to keep from sinking.

"What could he do to avoid disgrace? Nothing, nothing," he told himself, after he had thought over the matter carefully.

For the pleasure of his child his royal master had seriously commanded spring! For a long while he stood without thought, his head hanging like a ball of lead on his miserable breast; then he cast lethargy from him and turned with a resolute air.

"Come, courage, Nai-Dai-Tsin," said he; "a Japanese does not tremble before death. Quick, the sabre first, the stroke in the body; the poniard for the throat!"

He drew out the weapon and prepared for the stroke, but paused reflectively.

Was it really impossible to simulate spring, and thereby, instead of ruin and suicide, conquer eternal fortune? No use to despair too quickly; there was always time to die.

But he couldn't repress a start of terror on seeing how deep the shadow had grown beyond the palace and how rapidly the lights were springing up, like fireflies in the darkness.

"All the park and all the country round about," murmured he; "and only one night!"

Then, on the run, he gained his dwelling, called the council together, and, without giving them time even to seat themselves, imparted to them the extraordinary order transmitted him by the prince.

"An order to be executed under penalty of death before the dawn of the day," said he, recklessly indifferent to the terrified faces of those surrounding him: "the prince's humour is not to be trifled with; he will heed no reason. But listen and fully take in the idea that has come to me, which may be the salvation of all. Go from here and set to work at once in all the country round about, men, women, children, nobles, labourers, merchants, and peasants, with silk, cloth, satin, velvet, paper, or gauze, to work at once, I say, manufacturing artificial flowers.

"If stuff be lacking, let them cut up their clothes, their hangings, their screens, their rugs for the floor—briefly, all that may seem to them necessary or good; then, all these flowers, before daybreak, too, must be tied, nailed, glued, or sewn upon the trees, plants, and bushes, the smallest along the edges of the roads, the tallest farthest away in the fields; all the artists and painters in the neighbourhood following upon their steps to direct the decoration and give finishing touches of the brush wherever needful. I, in person, will watch over and foresee everything; our safety depends upon it."

Less than an hour later, there was not a palace, a house in the city, or a hut in the country where they were not feverishly occupied manufacturing flowers; and whoever had looked from the tower of Kanga palace, shortly after the turn of the night, into the park and neighbourhood, would have believed himself in a sea of lanterns, which surged, and leaped from tree to thicket—an army of fireflies chased by foxes.

But at this hour the illustrious Daimio snored peacefully behind his screen of gold-incrusted iron-wood; and the Incomparable princess, in the softened rays of light sifting through the frail pearl leaves of a swinging lampadaire, reclined upon her cushions and sought to compose in her dreams a fitting poem on Spring.

Her women had just finished dressing her next morning when the Princess Fiaki heard under her window the notes of an orchestra and the chant of many voices.

"Ah!" said she, with a wearied gesture, "I remember! My birthday to-day! Why was I born in winter?"

The maids of honour threw wide the window sashes.

"True, mistress," returned they, "but see, the beautiful weather!"

Beautiful indeed, the sky, for once, as if it had been a courtier clothed for the fête in a heavenly blue, across which a gay sun rolled of a gold a trifle pale. Languidly the princess advanced to the outer gallery and leant from the balustrade. But then what a cry of surprise and joy!

What was all this she saw before her? Was it possible? Flowers, flowers everywhere! The spring, then, had come!

"What!" said she, turning from side to side and running from end to end of the gallery, "almond-trees red and white, peach blooms, lillies, apple blossoms! What a miracle!"

Moreover, through all these spring roads and pathways gaily dressed throngs were hurrying to pay their respects to their prince's daughter; the great seigneurs on horseback, the noble dames in bullock carts or the regular nourimanos.

Fiaki hastened to descend; the Daimio met her upon the terrace steps and she threw herself into his arms with a cry of "Father! father! thou art in truth a god!"

Then they strolled through the park and gardens to admire this magic spring. Fiaki laughed and danced and clapped her hands like a child, and immediately a great chariot shaped like a pavilion, all aglow with gold stars and drawn by white bullocks, drew up at the terrace steps for the princess and her maids of honour to take a ride through the country. Then the visitors entered their cars and fell in line, and it was one long, continuous, joyous, brilliant, and interminable procession.

The prince led the way, the prime minister beside him, grave and impassable in his triumph. The scene of enchantment was the same along all the roads, the warmth of the sun and the light golden fog that faintly veiled the face of nature rendering still more complete the illusion of spring, richer, more flowery, more generous in all respects than the real spring-time.

"And what a delicious perfume!" cried the happy little princess, every instant thrusting her pretty little head out of the chariot to see the better, "what a delicious perfume floats in the air from all these flowers!"

Delicious indeed! The Daimio himself smelt it—scent fountains and atomizers, in fact, hidden in the harnessing of the beeves, the spray from which mingled itself with the breath of the animals.

Ever and ever so far they went into the country. Wild with delight, Fiaki could not abridge her happiness. Then she wanted to return by another road—was it possible?

A little uneasy, the prince regarded his impassible minister.

"Does the princess desire," demanded he, "to return by the hills or the orchards?"

"The orchards, by all means," the young girl responded: "it is farther and more beautiful."

And by the orchards they returned; as Fiaki had said, more beautiful than all they had seen. Soon the pink blossoms of a plum-tree caught the princess's attention.

"I must have it," she cried, "a branch of that plum-tree to carry with me as a souvenir of this wonderful spectacle."

"The game is up!" moaned the prince to himself, throwing an appealing glance upon his minister.

But the minister had neither paled nor trembled.

"I will do myself the honour of plucking it for you," said he, putting spurs to his horse and returning a moment later with a superbly flowered branch.

No sooner done than the maids of honour wanted a piece, and then all the noble dames, seeing that they were really permitted to pluck the blossoms, leapt from their cars and demanded fragrant souvenirs on their own account.

Really this was too much! The prince paled with anger and was going to order them to move on, but the minister reassured him with an imperceptible shrug; he knew women well—he had foreseen this also, and at a sign to an assistant a cart drove up loaded to the top with dewy blossoms, and all were provided with that which they demanded.

Nai-Dai-Tsin had unhesitatingly pillaged all the conservatories of the palaces, and had men mingling with the crowd with bags full of flowers till the word was given. The prince, who had not divined this simple device, was speechless with amazement.

"Thou art truly a wonderful man," he murmured in the minister's ear, as they re-entered the palace, "and thou hast done far more than I could possibly have hoped; but even in the delight of this wonderful fête, there has been in me a dull disquiet—how shall we ever be able to surpass this spectacle for the coming year?"

Meanwhile as the Daimio tarried to speak to his minister, Fiaki descended from her chariot; at the same time the son of the Prince of Satsouma, who had far to come and who had just arrived at the palace with a brillant escort, advanced to salute her.

A very handsome young man, too, and so brave that in spite of his youth he was already much talked about. Deeply moved at so much beauty, he stood before Fiaki, and she, no less blushing and confused, buried her face in the fragrant blossoms in her hand and could say not a word.

Nai-Dai-Tsin, who seemed to see everything, called the prince's attention to them, and to the mutual mental disturbance that seemed to leave them both tongue-tied.

"When the seventeenth year of your daughter arrives for her, my lord," said he, "give her for husband that handsome prince there, and she will love him more than to-day she loves the spring."

The Daimio's face broadened into a delightful smile and he hurriedly thrust a gold and bronze trinket into the prime minister's hand,

"The key of my treasure-box, Nai-Dai-Tsin," said he; "take it, use what you will, and heed my advice—be not too modest!"

BETRAYED.

NIGHT had fallen on the sleeping camp, a windy, rainy night, and not a sound of life broke the stillness save the occasional challenge of a distant sentry as Private Riley, muffled in his great-coat, stood leaning on his rifle at his post. The post was a remote one, far removed from the regimental guard in the X lines, where Riley's regiment was quartered.

The sentry's duty was to guard the mortuary, in which a soldier from a regiment just returned from India lay dead, awaiting his funeral on the morrow. Such a duty as this, on such a night would have tried the nerves of many a good soldier. Private Riley had proved on more than one battlefield that he was no coward, but he was not a good soldier; if the truth must be told, he bore the worst character in the regiment.

He had enlisted some nine years before, had proved a promising young soldier, was promoted and soon became sergeant, but lost his stripes through a drunken escapade.

Foreign service and a small frontier war gave him another chance, and in six months he was sergeant again, for a few weeks only; his besetting sin once more reducing him to the ranks.

From that day things went from bad to worse, and Riley was in constant trouble. His harsh and overbearing manner as a sergeant, had made him many enemies. Some of them, now non-commissioned officers themselves, were not slow to remember old grievances when opportunity arose, which was only too frequently with him.

He was the dog with the bad name, and was shunned by all, with one exception. This exception was young Private Courtney. Courtney was a soldier, born of a long line of fighting ancestors, with that deep rooted love of the service that makes a man a good soldier and nothing else. A happy-go-lucky favourite everywhere, he had failed to pass his examination for a commission. Still determined to persevere, and with the hope of winning it at the point of the bayonet, he had joined the ranks feeling sure of his eventual success.

On joining the regiment he was pleased to recognise in Riley a man whom he had known formerly in his native village.

Cheered by the recognition coming at a time when there was hardly a man on speaking terms with him, Riley's heart softened to the young soldier, and he did a hundred and one things that an old hand only can do to help the recruit in his new surroundings.

A curious friendship sprang up between these two men, which tended greatly to the improvement of Riley, and might have resulted in his complete reformation, had not a tragic event brought it to an abrupt termination.

As he stood leaning on his rifle this particular night his thoughts were on anything but his duty. A trifling incident of the day had ruffled his too easily disturbed temper, and the enforced abstinence while on guard disturbed him. "Hang it!" he muttered, as he brought his rifle to the slope and took a sharp turn up and down his post, thinking of the comfortable barrack room. Halting again in his former position, the sound of a footstep called him to attention. It was not the step of a soldier, and in idle curiosity he waited to see who was in this out-of-the-way place at such an hour.

"Here's fourpence; go and get me a pot of beer."

A little boy emerged from the darkness and stumbled against him.

Here was an opportunity not to be thrown away! Seizing the child by the arm, he shouted:

"Hullo, boy, what are you doing here, a-trespassing on Government property?"

The frightened child whimpered out that he was going home.

"Duty's duty," said the soldier, "and it is my duty to shoot you dead!"

"Oh, if you please, sir——" began the boy, but the soldier cut him short.

"Well, I'm a kind-hearted man although I am a soldier, and if I do let you off, you must do something for me."

"I'll do whatever you tell me, sir."

"Do you know the Redan public-house, first turning on the right and straight on?"

"Yes, sir."

"Here's fourpence, go and get me a pot of beer, and mind if you ain't back with it in five minutes, every soldier in camp will be turned out to hunt you down. Off you go. Quick march! double!"

As the boy ran off, glad to escape so easily, the sentry resumed his march. "Another hour," he muttered, as he listened to the sound of a distant clock. "Ah! here comes the youngster with the beer."

"There's many a slip between cup and lip," so Riley found, for as he stretched out his hand for the pot the tramp of soldiers approaching struck his ear. The sergeant with a visiting patrol. Why could they not leave him alone, he had been visited once since being posted.

There was no time for thought. Boy and beer were bundled unceremoniously inside the mortuary, with a hasty caution to keep silent until released, the door was closed, and the sentry challenged the advancing party. The answer to his challenge coming in the well-known and hated voice of the corporal, and the tramp of many feet told the dismayed soldier that it was the relief that was approaching. The night watch had passed quickly. He had mistaken the hour, and in another minute he would be on his way to the guard-room.

The long line of men halted, and as one of them stepped out and stood with rifle at the port facing him, Riley saw by the light of the lantern which the corporal held that it was Courtney who was to relieve him. The complication of the situation flashed through his brain. Courtney might fall into severe disgrace at the outset of his career, or receive a severe shock. He knew well enough that after the manner of soldiers, Courtney's comrades of the guard-room would have done all in their power to try the nerves of the recruit about to stand his first night-guard.

Riley saw by the light of the lantern which the corporal held that it was Courtney who was to relieve him.

As he looked into the face of his only friend, all his better instincts struggled to the surface. He would confess to the breach of discipline, take the well-deserved punishment, and save him.

Mechanically he stammered through the orders to the relieving sentry, but with such hesitation as to call forth a sharp, sarcastic rebuke from the corporal, formerly his victim, now his most vindictive persecutor.

"Anything to report?" growled the corporal.

"No," came the answer, firm and distinct. The change was affected, and the corporal ordered:

"Sentries pass!"

For an instant Riley hesitated before obeying the order in the hope of giving a word or sign of warning to Courtney, but the vigilance of the corporal prevented either. The next moment Riley was marching back to the guard-room, and Courtney was guarding the dead.

Left alone to his dreary duty, Courtney, though a brave youth, gradually became a prey to nervous fear.

The weird stories told in the guard-room of mysterious things that had happened to lonely sentries would recur, and strive as he might he could not fix his thoughts on other matters. He craved for action, but the only action possible was the short march up and down past the door of the mortuary. In spite of a strong desire to shrink to the further end of his post, bravely he continued his march, but his nervous dread of the unknown increased at every turn.

Was it fancy, or did he hear a noise inside the mortuary?

Fancy, of course; he was a cowardly fool, and he rested at the end of his post. The storm lulled, and his courage returned. For an instant the moon shone clear and unclouded. Throwing the rifle over his shoulder he was starting for another turn, but what was that? A ghastly white face at the window of the mortuary! As he gazed in terror the moon was hidden and an awful darkness followed.

Seized with a desperate longing for a human presence he would have shouted to the nearest sentry, but that was useless, the storm would drown his voice. Shaking in every limb, and half paralysed, he marched resolutely past the door and turned.

The storm was breaking, and by the light of the moon he saw the door of the mortuary slowly open! An overwhelming desire to rush to the guard-room possessed him. Impossible! A soldier must not desert his post; Slowly the door opened, and a white hand grasped the edge of it.

What was the meaning of this? Courtney's blood seemed to freeze in his veins, a dreadful creepy feeling went down his back and his hair seemed as though it would lift his busby from his head. His fingers gripped the butt of his rifle convulsively and seemed to cling to it as though they were parts of a vice rather than a portion of his anatomy that should have been well under the control of his will; his legs shook and appeared to be giving way under him. Could it be that his comrade, lying in the mortuary, was about to appear before him in shadowy out-line, in full uniform, like those phantom soldiers in India about the time of the Mutiny—the men who had been seen digging in the trenches during the night—as related by some of the fellows of his company?

The inarticulate words of the challenge rattled in the sentry's throat.

The door opened still wider.

He made an effort to win back his courage and firmness, and made a step forward with the intention of going resolutely to the door of the mortuary and solving the awful mystery of the white face and the white hand; but he stopped dead at that one step and could go no farther. His tongue clove to the roof of his mouth and his throat was parched, but he felt that he must at least utter the challenge.

The inarticulate words of the challenge rattled in the sentry's throat, as his rifle clattered on the pavement and he fell, with his face to the starlit sky.

* * * * *

An hour later the sergeant with Private Riley and another soldier visited the sentries. No challenge came from No. 6 post as they advanced towards it. The door of the mortuary was open. Private Courtney lay cold and dead on his back, his rifle beside him and his feet to the door.

A MINING TRANSACTION.

So you feel curious to know how and where I made my little bit of money? No, it wasn't at Klondyke; let those who like go to such a place as that, but, for my part, I think the risk too great and the chance of making money too small.

I didn't join in any "rush," I didn't even go out of my way to find my gold mine; it just came into my way. I believe in seizing your opportunity, and when this chance presented itself I decided to take it, although it was not without risk. I didn't dig for my gold in the ordinary way; it came to me through a little speculation in mining property. This is how it was.

It was in the early nineties and I was out in Western Australia, to which colony I had emigrated because I thought I might pick up a better living than there seemed any prospect of doing at home; and while I was searching for an easy means of getting a livelihood I heard the history of the King's Gold Mine.

This mine was one of three plains that had once belonged to two miners who had reaped no benefit from them; these men had handed over one claim—afterwards known as the King's Gold Mines—to a man out there who had advanced them a small sum of money to enable them to prosecute their operations in the other two claims.

What had become of those miners I never heard, but their claims were useless, and they disappeared.

The third claim was worked for a time under the direction of its second owner, Mr. John Reeks, who found a very small quantity of gold in it and then took advantage of the gold-mining craze to turn it into a company; he sold his own shares in the concern and retired with a nice little fortune, leaving the mine to occupy the attentions of those who had invested in it.

Disappointment followed the floating of this venture; the mine yielded nothing, and as there was no more capital forthcoming to work it, operations were soon suspended and the mines fell into disuse. The shares, which were all held by colonists, became practically worthless and might have been had for the price of a drink.

When I made the acquaintance of the mine there was a little work going on. A certain shrewd gentleman, by name Henry Black, who possessed considerable influence in that part of the colony, had paid a visit to the King's and inspected it; a few days after his first visit he paid a second call in company with an expert; and a little later still he set some men to work and began looking round for shares that might be drifting about unappreciated

He had obtained the permission of the Board of Directors to spend a little of his own money on the mine; those three officials had given their consent with much indifference, as they did not think the game worth the candle, and it was not their money which Mr. Black was spending.

The miners had not been at work many days before they turned up some gold—only a little, but gold all the same. This was kept as quiet as possible, and Black became more persistent in his search for the mining scrip. It was at this point that he met me, and I helped him in his endeavours.

There were 50,000 shares and Black was anxious to get at least 30,000 of these in his own hands. The directors held very few, not more than 5,000 between them, so that left just 25,000 for Black to get hold of in order to have control of the property, for the directors were all on his side. We had to hunt about for some days in the neighbourhood to find the men who owned shares, but at last we raked up the number we wanted and then we stopped. The balance did not trouble Black, as he would have a majority if he could succeed in obtaining the transfer of the shares from the holders he had approached. Of the remaining 20,000, about half were owned by people in the immediate neighbourhood—by which I mean within fifty miles or so —and the other half belonged to people who lived at either some distance or in other colonies.

Things were not done out there exactly the same as they would be at home. Rumours of what was going on had reached the ears of the "balance," as we called the outstanding shareholders, and they began to get suspicious; it occurred to them that it might not be to their interest that these transfers should take place, although they could not have explained the reason for their suspicions, and they resolved to prevent the transfers being effected. The fact that if the directors agreed to the registration the matter was in order and they had no right to interfere did not appeal to them in the least; they meant to stop the proceedings if they could.

The secretary and I went to the several shareholders, paid them the price of the purchase and got their signatures. As Black was giving them five shillings a share and most of the sellers had picked up the scrip for sixpence or less, they were well satisfied. The next thing was to lodge the deeds at the registered office of the company, which was close to the mine, and hold a

Board meeting to pass them. Black was to be present and affix his signature just previous to the meeting; the secretary had prepared the new certificate in readiness.

And that was where the trouble came in.

The dissentients determined to prevent the meeting, but Black and the directors got wind of this intention and resolved to be first.

Instead of waiting for the appointed day, which was forty-eight hours off, they decided to go without further delay to the King's Gold Mine and settle the business.

They all lived at a town fifty miles distant from the mine, so Black chartered a special train that very evening and made arrangements with the Board and the secretary to travel by that special at nine o'clock.

It was just before nine when the six of us reached the railway station where the engine and a special carriage were waiting for us. We entered the carriage —all except Black, who was standing on the platform talking with the station-master—and were chatting gaily, when our talk was interrupted by a hubbub on the platform. Putting my head out of the door I saw two men in altercation with Black and the station-master.

"You send that train off at your own risk," vociferated the foremost of the new-comers.

"Of course I do," answered the official calmly. "That's what I'm here for."

"These men must not be taken to Allwell," shouted the second man angrily. "They are going to commit——"

"That's enough of it!" cried Black. "We have chartered this train and can do as we like."

Then followed some violent talking, threatening and gesticulating, and Black slipped away from them and entered the carriage, leaving the two objectors to threaten the station-master, the engine-driver and the stoker.

In a few words he explained the situation. Others were coming to assist the two ringleaders, he said, and our best plan was to get out of the carriage and pretend to go off, but all the while we should make our way down the line for about half a mile where the "special" would pick us up. The engine-driver and station master would pretend that the engine was going to put the carriage in the siding and then go to the shed, so as to throw our enemies off their guard, but once clear of the station the train would run along the line, pick us up and dash off to Allwell.

We must slip out of the carriage on the off-side and he would give the tip to the driver; when the objectors found that the carriage was empty and that the train was, apparently, not to be made use of, they would conclude that they had scored.

Ten minutes later we were more than half-a-mile down the line, waiting for the train to come along. In the meantime the dissentients, reinforced by several others, had discovered that we had decamped and had allowed the engine and carriage to move slowly from the platform, the driver made the whistle shriek as if in fiendish exultation and sent the engine rattling over the metals.

We saw it coming along and gave a great yell for the double purpose of expressing our feelings and telling the driver where we were; and in a few seconds we were once more seated in the carriage and rushing along towards Allwell.

But we soon found that we were not quite out of the wood. About ten miles down the line we had to pass through a station named Boolong, and as we rattled through it we saw an engine moving slowly from a siding on to the main track.

"Whew!" whistled Black. "Do you see what they've done? They have stationed someone here to intercept us if we got out from Relton, and on discovering that they had been tricked they wired to this place to have us stopped. But we have got past just in time and now we have the line to ourselves."

The next hour was the most exciting I have ever been through. Acting on Black's instructions, I opened the carriage door and clambered to the engine, where I told the driver that he must put on all the speed he could in order to out-distance the pursuing engine and get us to Allwell in time to pass the transfers before the enemy arrived. The directors were saying hard things about themselves for not having the seal of the company and certain books with them instead of allowing them to remain at the office, as in that case they could have passed the transfers in Relton or in the carriage.

In a few seconds we were flying along the metals with the other engine tearing after us. I don't think either of us ever stopped to consider what would be the result if our engine suddenly broke down; and what the pursuers thought of doing when they got near enough to us was also, most probably, left out of calculation. They could hardly leap off their engine and intercept us, and if they ran into us and smashed us up, the chances were very much in favour of their suffering to the same extent as ourselves.

Away we went in the dark night, the sparks flying from both engines and the reddish smoke resembling the fiery breath of some huge monster. We kept well ahead for about four miles, and then I noticed that the pursuing engine was drawing nearer. Presently we jolted over some points, and on looking backward, half a minute later I observed that the adversary was a little to our right instead of directly behind us. I was puzzled for a moment to account for this and then the explanation came like a flash; the engine was on the other line and would endeavour to overtake us in that way.

I urged the driver to get up all the speed he could, telling him what had occurred. "They can't very well stop us even in that manner," I added, "but if they reach the destination at the same time as ourselves, that will upset our plans, as they will prevent us from getting to the office."

"They can stop us if they only get a yard start," returned the driver grimly. "There is about thirty miles of this track and then it goes off to a single line before we get to Allwell. It's a race now to see who can get to the single line first."

I emitted a long whistle; now I understood the manœuvre.

And the worst of it was that our pursuers appeared to be gaining on us. There was no need to say anything to our driver; professional pride as well as the prospect of earning a round sum of money made him do his utmost. I could only endeavour to keep calm and watch the race—by no means an easy task however.

Nearer and nearer the pursuing engine came, and at the end of the five miles we were running almost level. Not a word was spoken between the two parties; I doubt whether even so much as an order to the driver was uttered on either side; with set faces we watched the course of the race and waited anxiously for the result.

Thus we flew along side by side in the darkness for several minutes, neither engine gaining any great advantage over the other. Sometimes our adversary was a little in advance and at others our iron steed had the lead, but there was no real gain, mile after mile was covered and at last I went to our driver and asked him if we were not now very close to the single line.

"Less than five miles," he said quietly. "What is it to be? Are we to go on and chance it? We are on the straight, but they have to make a little curve."

It was a critical thing to decide. I hardly cared to pronounce the words that might mean the death warrant of several people, for if we collided at the junction of the two lines of metals there was very little probability that any of us would escape. The responsibility of the decision was taken from me by Black, who at that moment shouted out of the window; I only caught the concluding words, but they were sufficient.

"——get on the single line first!"

What a strange power some men have over others. The very fact that he had spoken seemed to settle the matter at once; it never occurred to me, at any rate, to question the result and I believe it was the same with our driver. We just went as hard as we could for that single line.

One mile; two, three! Both engines were running level and, as it appeared to certain destruction. Were the dissentients as determined as ourselves? Another mile, and then I found that we had the lead and were keeping it. We were going no faster than before, for the simple reason that we were at top speed, so I concluded that the others had faltered and were slackening in order to avoid a collision. And then we dashed on to the single line.

We had won the race so far, but would there be time for us to get to the office and settle the little affair on hand? Our enemies, after all, could reach Allwell practically at the same time as ourselves. Our single line was not very straight, so that unless the pursuing engine kept close behind us we could not see it. I kept constantly on the watch for it to appear just behind us round the bends, but it did not come into view and we reached Allwell without catching another glimpse of it.

I question whether a party of non-professionals ever sprinted along a country road at the same rate as we did after we left the train. We reached the office and the director at once proceeded to transact business. We had finished and were on our way back to the station, where there was a house in which we could pass the night, when we met our pursuers.

Then we learnt that their engine which had slackened in order to take the points, had somehow fouled them; the engine had run off the metals, but had come to no great harm, the chief result to our adversaries being the loss of time, which enabled us to carry out our plan.

After all, they benefited in the same proportion as Black himself, for their shares went up in value and they made a fine thing out of them. If they had succeeded in thwarting Black, there is every reason to believe that the shares of the King's Gold Mine would still be worth about sixpence each. But I suppose they thought that he would make a heap of money and they would get nothing.

About my own little bit? Well, I was of considerable assistance to Black, and he is a man who thoroughly appreciates that kind of thing. I think that explains it.

Briton or Boer?

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

INTRODUCTION.

For years past Britain and the Transvaal have been spoiling for a fight, and it was left to that well-known author, Mr. George Griffith, to write this strong and exciting serial nearly four years ago graphically describing a huge war between the two countries.

The story, coming so soon after the Jameson Raid, was read with unusual interest.

Now that Briton and Boer are in deadly conflict it will be interesting to read the story, and see how far the imagination of the author has actually come true.

SUMMARY OF OPENING CHAPTERS.

Chapter I.—The scene opens on the Rand. It is the eve of Amajuba day, and a State ball is being given. To this comes Prince Paul Regna, a Polish nobleman, and his daughter, Princess Vavara. They are introduced to Dr. Leyds.

Chapter II.—Dr. Leyds returns to Pretoria to attend a midnight consultation at the Government buildings. The Prince's rooms are in the Grand Hotel opposite. By tapping the wires, which cross the street at this point, the Prince and his daughter overhear all that goes on, and telegraph the result by secret code to Europe.

Chapters III. and IV.—Amajuba day dawns. The Secretary accompanies the Prince and Princess to Krugersdorp, where, from the base of the Monument of Independence, the President makes a great proclamation. The Convention of London is abrogated, the absolute independence of the South African Republic is declared; the President unfurls a Union Jack and rends it to pieces. So the storm bursts!

Chapters V. and VI.—On the following day Major-General Carrington learns at Buluwayo that all the wires have been cut between Rhodesia and the south and east. He concludes that this is due to Boer hostility, and prepares to meet it. Meanwhile a powerful British squadron appears unexpectedly in Delagoa Bay, and Lieutenant Ferris is sent ashore to take possession of the telegraph station.

CHAPTER VII.

Forcing the Lock.

The smoke-cloud towards Inyack Island had now resolved itself into several distinct streams of smoke which proceeded respectively from the funnels of Her Majesty's battleships Victorious, Magnificent, and Majestic, the cruisers Terrible, Powerful, Edgar, Endymion, and Grafton, and the torpedo-destroyers Ardent, Boxer, Bruiser, Daring, Ferret, and Foam.

They were coming up at the full speed of the battleships, seventeen knots, or nearly twenty statute miles, which was better than that of the Russians by a good couple of knots.

When they were about ten miles from the land the two great cruisers Powerful and Terrible put on their full speed of twenty-two knots, closely followed by the Edgar, Endymion, and Grafton doing a good twenty, with the obvious intention of heading off the Russians which lay in the seven-fathom water outside the mouth of the harbour.

The three battleships, attended by the destroyers, followed the cruisers in column of line abreast about half-a-mile astern.

Not many minutes now elapsed before his glasses showed the Russian Admiral how formidable a foe he had to contend with. A single glance was enough to convince him that he was completely cut off from the sea, and must either fight at practically hopeless odds or surrender.

How he had been caught in such a trap was utterly beyond his comprehension. His orders had told him to pay a friendly visit to Cape Town and coal there. This done, he was to weigh anchor, ostensibly with the object of proceeding to the China Seas, steam straight to the latitude of Delagoa Bay, and lie with banked fires thirty miles to the eastward of Inyack Island, there to await orders from the land. These orders he had received through the medium of the yacht which the solitary watcher on Reuben Point had seen steam out to sea twenty-four hours before. On receipt of these he had steamed into the Bay.

His arrival, moreover, had been strictly timed to anticipate by some six hours the arrival of the German squadron consisting of the ironclads, Kaiser and Deutchland, the cruisers Geier, See Adler, and Condor, and six first and second-class torpedo boats, which Mr. Secretary Leyds had confidently expected to be in possession of the "keyhole of Africa" on the morning of the 17th December.

But, whatever the reasons of these extraordinary happenings, there could not be the slightest doubt as to the purpose of the British squadron. The two lines of cruisers and battleships took up their position across the tenfathom channel to the north of Elephant Island, thus completely barring the way to all vessels of such draft as the Russians. Then one of the destroyers, the Bruiser, left the side of the Majestic, flying a white flag, and came tearing through the smooth water at some twenty knots an hour towards the Navarin.

She ran alongside the Russian flagship, and the lieutenant in command delivered a note from the British Admiral stating that he accepted the shots fired at the Thrasher as an act of war and declaration of hostilities, and calling upon the Russian Admiral, in the interests of humanity, to surrender forthwith to a force which an appended list of the British warships would prove to be of overwhelming strength.

The note concluded with the brief but startling statement that Delagoa Bay and the surrounding territory had been purchased by Great Britain from Portugal, and that, therefore, the Russian squadron was in British waters without either invitation or permission.

Digitized by Google

Politely worded as it was, it was by no means a pleasant message to receive. Vice-Admiral Tcherkov glanced from under his frowning brows at the formidable list, and in that glance recognised the inevitable. In number of ships, speed, and gunpowder, he was hopelessly at a disadvantage.

Altogether he was between the horns of an exceedingly awkward dilemma. To fight meant almost certain destruction; to surrender without a fight meant not only disgrace but probably also court-martial and death. Flight was absolutely out of the question, for his ships were completely hemmed in by the British squadron, which entirely commanded the only practicable channel between the perils of the Lech Reef and the Cockburn Shoals.

As most men in such a position would have done, he tried to temporise. He assured the lieutenant of the Bruiser that he had no intention of sinking the Thrasher, as he could easily have done had he desired to do so. That he had suspected a sinister motive in what he thought to be the unwarrantable landing of the British bluejackets, and therefore thought he had a right to stop the destroyer by force after she had disregarded his signal. Further, that he was not aware that his country was in a state of war with Great Britain, and that therefore he claimed an armistice of twelve hours to enable him to communicate with his Government by telegraph.

The reasoning was plausible enough, seeing that it had to be formulated on the spur of the moment, but it went only a very short way with Lieutenant Cardigan of the Bruiser, for he listened to it with a just perceptible smile on his clean shaven lip, and answered it politely and uncompromisingly by saying:

"My instructions, sir, are to take back your answer 'Yes,' or 'No.' I have no power to make terms or to listen to proposals. If I return without an answer the squadron will advance, and fire will be opened immediately."

Very important issues are sometimes decided by very trifling causes, and it was thus what was afterwards known as the Battle of Delagoa Bay came to be fought. There was something exceedingly unpleasant in the quiet tones of the young lieutenant, a suggestion of absolute and unquestioned superiority which set the hot semi-Tartar blood of Admiral Tcherkov on fire, and scattered whatever prudent considerations might have been forming in his mind to the winds.

His sallow face flushed a muddy red, and his bristly whiskers and moustache seemed to stiffen out with anger. He stamped his foot on the deck, and said in a harsh and somewhat husky voice:

"The servants of my master are not accustomed to be bullied in that fashion, sir. Go back and tell your admiral that I shall obey my orders at any cost. They are to remain here until the arrival of another squadron, which is not many hours behind you, and here I shall remain either till that squadron arrives or the last of my ships is sunk.

"Tell him, too, if he does not already know it, that the fight will not be so unequal as he seems to hope for. There may be no escape for us, but it may be that there will be none for you either if our friends find you here in the condition in which I hope we shall leave you. That is my answer. Good-morning, sir."

With that Admiral Tcherkov abruptly turned his back on the lieutenant of the Bruiser and walked aft. That officer smiled gravely, yet not sadly—such a smile as a man might permit himself when holding four aces at poker. He took a rapid but comprehensive glance over the decks of the Navarin, touched his cap to the officer in charge of the gangway, and walked stiffly and deliberately down the ladder.

The Bruiser sped away towards the British line, which was now about three miles from the Russian. Almost at the same moment the Sokol, which had been lying on the other side of the Navarin, left her side and headed away at full speed to the south-eastward with the obvious intention of rounding the southern extremity of Inyack Island, slipping through the shallow water which covered the narrow channel between the island and the peninsula, and so getting to sea.

She was the fastest craft in the Russian navy, running a good thirty knots an hour. Once outside she would most likely trust to her heels for a successful dash up the Mozambique Channel to the nearest French telegraph station in Madagascar, and there give information of the doings of the British squadron. Possibly, too, she might fall in with a powerful French squadron which Admiral Tcherkov would have been very glad to believe actually in the proximity to Delagoa Bay that he had alleged it to be in.

Although the Bruiser kept on her way towards the Majestic this incident by no means passed unnoticed. The Thrasher had rejoined the squadron, and had taken up her station between the Majestic and the Victorious. Instantly her number fluttered from the signal-yard of the flagship with a string of variegated bunting below it.

Lieutenant Ferris, still standing on the platform of the telegraph house with his glasses fastened to his eyes, shut his teeth with a snap and muttered a hardly printable expression through them as he saw the signal which he had no need to be able to read. His instinct told him that it read:

"Chase Sokol. Capture or sink."

The next moment the Thrasher backed out from between the big battleships, stopped and turned, as it were, on her heel, till her nose pointed due south. Then, as if a powerful spring had been released behind her, she shot away towards the southern point of the island to, if possible, cut the Sokol off before she could double it and make for the passage.

According to the etiquette of civilised warfare the now inevitable battle could not begin until the Bruiser had delivered her message to the Majestic, and hauled down her white flag, so the two squadrons continued to approach each other with guns loaded and pointed until the black, wicked-looking little craft, as though exulting in her superior speed, took a wide sweep round the three battleships and ran in under the quarter of the Majestic with as much ease as though she had been laying at anchor instead of steaming her full seventeen knots through the water.

When Admiral Taylor Dale received the reckless defiance of the Russian Admiral, and heard the news of the threatened approach of the hypothetical friendly squadron, he shook his head with the gesture of a man who had just heard that another had decided to commit suicide.

There was, however, no question in his mind as to the task which lay before him, and if there had been any it would have been instantly removed by the sight of the red ensign flying from the flagstaff of the telegraph station, for that was the pre-arranged signal which told him that Lieutenant Ferris had sent to the Cape the news of the arrival of the squadron and the finding of the enemy, and had received the expected order to fight.

The importance of getting in the first blow was never so great as it is in modern naval warfare, and of this fact the

Digitized by Google

British Admiral was fully aware. The three pairs of twelve-inch, fifty-ton guns in the forward barbettes of the Majestic, Magnificent, and Victorious, were already trained on to the Navarin. In point of range and striking power these guns are generally considered to be the most effective weapons afloat, and on this the first occasion on which they had been used in deadly earnest, they amply justified their reputation.

At two thousand yards they all spoke together, and the six huge shells found their mark on the devoted Navarin almost at the same instant.

The effect was as marvellous as it was frightful. The Russian flagship was for the moment enveloped in a cloud of mingled smoke and flame. A minute before she had been spick and span and perfect in every detail. A minute after she was a shattered wreck, rent and battered out of all recognition.

Almost at the same moment the cruisers, which had been swiftly closing in, opened fire with their 9·2in. guns at 3,000 yards range on the Rurick and the Rossia, which replied with their 8in. guns from the forward sponsons. The Powerful and Terrible devoted their attention to the Rossia, while the Edgar and Endymion tackled the Rurick.

The Russian cruisers were slower in speed and weaker in armament than the British, but they were armoured and their opponents were not. The British, therefore, taking advantage of their superior speed, kept away and pounded the Russians with their big guns, waiting until the battleships had disposed of the Navarin and the Gangout, after which there would naturally be nothing left for the Russian cruisers but the choice between sinking and surrender.

But that one terrible discharge from the big guns of the Majestic, Magnificent, and Victorious had not only begun the fight; it had, in fact, decided it. The commander of the Gangout, though every whit as brave a man as his admiral, was considerably more prudent, and when he saw his consort practically put out of action before she had fired a shot, he clearly recognised that to go on was merely to court certain destruction. His own guns were trained on the Majestic, and his finger was on the electric button, ready to transmit the spark which would have fired them, when to his horror he saw the Navarin lurch heavily to port, and begin to settle by the stern.

The two shells of the Victorious had happened to strike close together under her quarter, a few feet aft of the end of her armoured belt. They had penetrated and burst inside her inner skin, and one of the fragments had exploded a torpedo just as it was being placed in one of the after tubes.

No fabric made by human hands could have withstood the frightful energy of the combined explosions. A huge rent was torn in her quarter, her port screw-shaft was broken, and the torpedo-room was flooded in an instant.

The commander of the Gangout saw at a glance that she was doomed, and that the fight was now more hopeless than ever. A few brief moments of bitter reflection convinced him that there was only one course to be taken. He saw the Majestic heading straight for his crippled consort, pouring in a ceaseless storm of shot from her forward six-inch quick-firers, and evidently meaning to ram unless the Russian flagship struck. His own ship, too, was getting badly mauled under the combined fire of the Victorious and the Majestic, while she herself had not fired a shot.

All this had taken place during the few moments that he remained undecided whether to fight or strike. His indecision was, however, quickly ended by the sight of the Navarin's flag fluttering down in token of surrender. A moment or two more and the ram of the Majestic would have sent her to the bottom. He struck his own flag at once, and surrendered with the unfired charges still in his guns, and within fifteen minutes of the firing of the first shot.

The Rurick struck to the Endymion and the Edgar a few minutes later, hopelessly outmatched in speed and weight of metal. The Rossia, with her triple engines driving her three propellers at their utmost speed, made a desperate effort to pass between the Terrible and the Grafton and gain the open sea, but, though she was making nearly twenty knots, she was still one knot slower than the Grafton and three knots slower than the Terrible, and a very few minutes sufficed to convince her captain that there could be only one end to such a race.

There were the big cruisers in front of him, and the huge 15,000 ton battleships behind him. If he had possessed the twenty-two knots of the Powerful or the Terrible he might have got away, but the Rossia's best was only a fraction over nineteen knots. It was as impossible for him to run away as it was to fight, so down came his flag, too, and within half-an-hour of the firing of the first shot, the Sokol was the only craft of the Russian squadron that was not in possession of Admiral Taylor Dale.

CHAPTER VIII.

An Important Capture.

In the comparatively smooth water of the Bay the Sokol had an advantage of nearly half a knot over the Thrasher, and a few minutes run sufficed to convince Lieutenant Frank Stevens, who was commanding the British boat, vice Lieutenant Ferris, that, although the Russian had a little farther to go, he would get to the opening first. The boilers of both boats were throbbing under every ounce of steam that they would stand, and their thin steel sides seemed to palpitate like the flanks of a racing horse, and the flames that roared up through their funnels were palely visible even in the bright sunlight of the tropical morning.

The practicable channel even for boats like these, drawing under six feet of water, between the island and the peninsula was so narrow that the boat which reached it second would have to go through almost dead astern of the first, and this was a very serious matter.

The speed of the new type of destroyer is so great that the bow torpedo-tube has been abolished, simply because the torpedo cannot be fired ahead unless the boat slows to do it, since at full speed the boat would overtake the torpedo and blow herself up with it. Hence it will be plain that if the Thrasher entered the channel astern of the Sokol she would stand a chance of being torpedoed without being able to reply.

Lieutenant Stevens clearly foresaw this, and decided, as he put it to his engineer, to get there first or "bust," both metaphorically and literally. The engineer nodded—there didn't seem time to say anything—and the stokers, if possible, worked harder than ever; but those on the Sokol were doing the same thing, and the two boats raced absolutely neck and neck for the narrow opening.

Unhappily, however, the Sokol, as will be seen from the sketch-map (published in last week's issue) had an almost straight course to steer, while the Thrasher had to make a turn to avoid the shoal to the south of the island, one touch on which would have ended the race and probably her own career. This, do what he would, made a difference of about a length to Lieutenant Stevens, and the Russian craft slipped in first.

He himself was steering in the conning-tower, and as the two boats were only a couple of hundred feet apart, and running almost exactly the same speed, he could see the slightest movement on the Sokol's deck as distinctly as though he had been standing on it. He saw the muzzle of one of the six-pounder quick firers which she carried aft sink slightly, and recognised the fact that the stream of shells, which, in another moment or so, would be pouring from its steel throat would rip the Thrasher open almost from stem to stern. There was only one thing to be done, and that at once.

"Ready with the twelve-pounder. Fire!" he shouted. "And keep it up."

The English gunner was just a moment or so quicker with his eyes and hands than the Russian, and so the English shell got home first. It hit the shield of the Russian gun, and smashed it out of shape. Almost at the same instant that it burst the Russian gunner fired, but that moment or two had been all sufficient. The Sokol dipped her stern ever so little on a swell that was coming in from the sea. The gunner had no time to correct his aim before he saw the flash from the English gun, and his first and only shell plunged into the water about a foot wide of the Thrasher's bow. The next instant he was a dead man and his gun disabled.

"Go for his funnels, Thwaites. You've got them in a dead straight line now. Ah, I thought so! Phew! that was a narrow squeak! Well done, Thwaites, that's stopped her."

Three things had happened almost simultaneously as he was speaking. A torpedo had leapt from the Sokol's after-tube into the water dead ahead of the Thrasher, Lieutenant

Stevens had ported his helm ever so little, and, as he put it afterwards, just squeezed in between shoal and Sheol—of which latter the torpedo would have formed a capable if transient representation if it had struck the Thrasher's bow instead of scraping along her side—and a couple of fast succeeding shells had torn two lines of jagged rents through the four funnels of the Russian boat.

As he spoke he took one hand off the wheel and sent a signal for half-speed to the engine-room. The Thrasher slowed down just in time to avoid running her bow into the Sokol's stern, but as she came up she received the fire of her two remaining six-pounders, which ripped her deck up in several places and injured her forward funnel rather badly.

But as she was able to bring three of her six-pounders, as well as her twelve-pounder, to reply to these, the argument was not of very long duration. The shells fired at such close quarters drilled clean holes wherever they struck, and after a few minutes' fire the Sokol was riddled and rent by scores of holes and gashes in her decks and sides, and was practically in a sinking condition.

The Thrasher's last word was a twelve-pound shell, which hit a torpedo that the Russian lieutenant was desperately trying to launch in a last effort to destroy his adversary, and very possibly himself, seeing how close the two craft were. A frightful explosion followed, stunning for the moment every man on board the Thrasher, hurling those who were standing on her decks prostrate, and flinging two of them into the sea.

As for the Sokol, her after-part seemed to shrivel up as far as the funnels, a great cloud of steam rushed out of the huge ragged rents in the portion which remained, and when Lieutenant Stevens came to himself, he was just in time to stop the Thrasher from running into the wreck which lay across the narrow channel in about seven feet of water.

"What a pity!" he said to himself. "I should like to have taken her back to the Bay at the end of a hawser. By Jove! that shook us up pretty well here. A few yards nearer, and we should all have gone to glory together. Poor old Ferris! Won't he be mad when I tell him what he's missed. I wonder if there's anybody alive on board her? We seem to have suffered pretty badly, too."

This was the fact. Poor Gunner Thwaites and his two assistants were lying terribly mangled beside the gun they had used so well; nearly a score of others were more or less badly wounded by the close and rapid shell-fire; and the two men who had been flung senseless overboard had been drowned. The boat was badly knocked about, but fortunately chiefly as to her deck and upper works. Her engines were untouched, and none of the holes or rents in her sides were near the water line.

Lieutenant Stevens had the dinghy lowered, and made a careful personal search of the wreck. Only about a dozen or so of her crew remained alive, and every one of these was either scalded, or badly wounded, or both, with the exception of a man in civilian clothes, who with white face and shaking limbs crawled up out of the fore peak where he had evidently been hiding during the brief running fight, in answer to his repeated hail of inquiry for any more who might be alive on board the wreck.

He scrambled crab fashion along the steeply-tilted deck, and began to implore Stevens to save his life, and let him go on shore as soon as possible as he had most important business to transact. He had evidently been terribly frightened, and, seeing this, the Lieutenant said to him kindly:

"Your life is in no danger, sir. We English don't murder our prisoners, you know; but going ashore is another matter. I'm afraid you'll have to come with me aboard the flagship and get the Admiral's permission first. By-the-way, it's curious you should have important business on shore and yet be in such a tremendous hurry to get away from it, as you were just now. I expect the Admiral will want to know what you, as a civilian, had to do on board a torpedo-boat destroyer, trying to run the gauntlet. Oblige me by getting into the boat."

While he was speaking the Lieutenant's suspicions had been growing. The man spoke English perfectly, but was evidently a Russian—in fact, he spoke it as few foreigners save a Russian could have done—and his eager request to be allowed to go on shore a few minutes after he had been doing his best to escape by sea seemed as suspicious, on second thoughts, as it had sounded ludicrous in the first instance.

It was quite possible that the man was an agent of the Russian Government, and that the Sokol had been especially dispatched to get him out of the way. If this was the case, it was on the cards that he might have papers of importance in his possession. Lieutenant Frank Stevens, though a thoroughly practical sailor and most promising young officer, had a spice of romance in his nature, and the idea of making a capture which might result in exposing some of the secret machinations of the wilest enemy England had ever had was by no means unpleasing to him.

He gave the prisoner in charge of a quartermaster with instructions to take him to his own cabin. He then told a couple of his men to go down into the fore-peak and make a careful search. As soon as the prisoner heard this an exclamation in Russian, that sounded very like an oath, broke from his lips, and his face, which had begun to regain its colour, turned white again.

"There is nothing there, sir, I assure you," he said to the Lieutenant with needless emphasis. "Nothing but my own private property, which I presume honourable enemies such as you will hold sacred. I am not a combatant, I am a private individual. I was only given a passage on the Sokol by the Admiral's favour."

"Where to?" said the Lieutenant abruptly, looking him straight in the eyes.

"To—to—well, to the nearest friendly port at which I could be landed from whence I could go about my business—my own business, of course."

"I'm afraid Mr.—Mr.—by-the-way we have not introduced ourselves yet. I am Lieutenant Stevens, second in command of Her Majesty's ship Thra her. May I ask your name?"

The Lieutenant spoke very politely but with just a touch of irony in his tone.

"My name is—Peter Spiridoff, sir, at your service," the prisoner replied with just the slightest perceptible pause after the "is." "I regret that my passport and personal papers were in a portmanteau in a cabin at that end of the vessel which was destroyed by the explosion. Ach douraki!"

As it happened Lieutenant Stevens knew just enough Russian to know that this last word was the equivalent of the English monosyllable "fool," preceded by a familiar but unprintable adjective, and for the moment he so far forgot his manners as to laugh outright at his prisoners' discomfiture which was obviously caused by the reappearance of the two men who had been sent to search.

One of them carried a yellow leather dispatch case, on the side of which were boldly painted in black the initials "M.O." The Lieutenant took it from the sailor and looked at it. He noted that it was heavily weighted like a ship's private signal book—probably for the same purpose, to be sunk in case of need.

"Ah, Mr. Peter Spiridoff," he said pleasantly to his prisoner, "this is evidently not yours then. I suppose it belonged to one of the poor fellows who will have no further use for it; possibly you were taking care of it for him in your place of safety. Well, there can be no harm in my taking charge of it at any rate. Now we'd better be getting back on board. After you, Mr. Spiridoff."

Mr. Michael Ostroff had by this time quite recovered from the physical terror which had made him commit in the last few minutes more mistakes than he had made in all the forty odd years of his life before, and in its place he became suddenly possessed by a paroxysm of rage. He had forgotten to destroy or effectively conceal the priceless papers which his dispatch case contained. He had lied about the case itself, and given a false name which prevented him even claiming it.

There was just one chance of redeeming his terrible error. He made a sudden dash at the Lieutenant, tore the case from his hands, and was in the act of flinging it into the sea, when one of the bluejackets grabbed him by the arm and gave it a twist which sent him to his knees, while the other deftly caught the case as it left his hand.

Within five minutes he was securely handcuffed in Lieutenant Stevens' cabin, "foaming at the mouth in double Dutch," as Seaman-Gunner Tom Smith afterwards put it in the forecastle.

The survivors of the Sokol's crew were carefully taken on board the Thrasher, and then she backed out of the narrow channel, and ran back to the squadron at little more than half the speed she had made during the chase. She was met by the Boxer, Bruiser, and the Ardent, which had been sent to learn the cause of the explosion, which had taken place out of sight of the warships behind the island, and escorted in triumph back to the side of the Majestic.

Lieutenant Stevens at once went on board with his prisoner and the dispatch case, and made his report to the Admiral. The Admiral thanked him warmly, ending up with the significant hint at the possible command of the boat that would replace the Thrasher while she was undergoing repairs. Then he took possession of the despatch case and sent its owner to the guard-room between two marines.

He opened the case alone in his private room, and for nearly an hour the sentry outside the locked door acted on his express orders, and turned away all applicants for admission, no matter what their rank and or business. He came out looking a good five years older than when he had gone in. He had the look, too, of a man upon whose shoulders the weight of an unexpected and tremendous responsibility had suddenly fallen.

He asked the first midshipman he met on deck where the Flag-Captain was. The middy saluted, and told him he was on the bridge. This the Admiral might have seen for himself at a glance, but, as the Eastern saying has it, "his eyes were turned inward" at the time. He looked up and went straight to the bridge, taking no notice of anyone he passed.

"Barrow," he said, "I've learnt some very grave news. Let all the Russian prisoners be placed as rapidly as possible on board the merchant ships in the bay. Every English sailor, seaman, officer, engineer, or stoker, must, if possible, be got to volunteer for the fleet before midday. All the refitting that can be done at sea must be pushed on as rapidly as possible; but, first of all, signal for all the flag-captains and senior commanders of the squadron to meet in my room in a quarter of an hour."

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of Edgar Jepson's "Keepers of the People," to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. R. A. H. Goodyear, of Tune Street, Barnsley, Yorks. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 12th. Post-cards only, please.

The Boers were Dwindling.

"WILLIAMS is a real good fellow at heart, but his belief in himself is abnormal," said a clerk in a big Yorkshire office.

"Being a First-class Reserve man, he was called to the front early, and bragged so much about what he meant doing to the Boers that we all turned pretty sick, and had hard work to keep from kicking him.

"However, we gave him a loyal send off, and waited to hear what he would say about the actual fighting. His first letter came to hand yesterday, and this is all it contained:

"'Dear Pal,—Tell the chaps I shall soon be at my desk again. I'm in fine form, and the Boers are dwindling fast. There'll be nothing left of them in a week if my regiment backs me up.'"

Charity Rewarded.

Two military chaplains, on their way home on a dark night, came upon a soldier lying in the gutter, helplessly intoxicated.

By mutual consent they agreed to see the man home, so they extricated him from the gutter, and, finding out his barracks, walked him off to his room in an apparently affectionate manner.

On arriving at the door, the good-natured clergymen hesitated, but, not desiring to do things by halves, one of them boldly lifted the latch and walked in.

The man, who had somewhat recovered, thanked his benefactors, then, turning towards his comrades in a dreamy sort of way, and jerking his thumb towards the chaplains, he exclaimed:

"My chums of the Rose and Crown!"

Didn't Obey Orders.

SERGEANT MALONEY was drilling a squad of recruits.

"When I give the order 'Right legs up' every one of ye put the right leg up together, not one man after the other.

"Right legs up."

One of the recruits by mistake put his left leg up at the command.

Sergeant Maloney retires to the end of the line to inspect them.

In a moment the sergeant roared out with rage:

"What blithering spalpeen is it that's put both legs up?"

International Disaster.

A GENTLEMAN in Natal invited some friends to dinner, and, as the coloured servant entered the room, he accidentally dropped a platter which held a turkey.

"My friends," said the gentleman in a most impressive tone, "never in my life have I witnessed an event so fraught with disaster to the various nations of the globe. In this calamity, we see the downfall of Turkey, the upsetting of Greece, the destruction of China, and the humiliation of Africa."

The Irish of It.

THE other night a soldier of an Irish Fusilier regiment took his sweetheart to see Cheer, Boys, Cheer in a provincial theatre.

The woman saw a soldier near her dressed in the Highland uniform, and particularly took notice of the regimental badge on his cap and collar.

The badge is the figure and cross of St. Andrew, with the motto, "Nemo me impune lacessit." Translated it means, "No one strikes me with impunity."

"Denis, wat does the writin' mane?" asked the woman.

"Shure," replied Denis, "it's Latin, but Oi've forgotten the maneing in English. But in Oirish it manes 'Tread on the tail ov me coat if ye dare!'"

He Would Wrastle.

DEAN HOLE was once presiding at an agricultural dinner given to the men of his parish, among whom were a great many clod-hoppers, principally noted for heavy stolid looks, and a capacity for drinking huge cans of ale. The Dean had a quarter of lamb set before him to carve, which he proceeded to do by cutting off the shoulder and placing it on a plate to his left hand. A farm labourer sat next to the dean, and quietly surveyed this proceeding with a widely-opened mouth, and large incredulous eyes.

When the plate was put down, Hodge leaned both elbows on the table and surveyed the meat for quite two minutes' duration. Then he pulled the plate closer, leaning his face on one side, and gave a grunt of satisfaction. Then he shook his head and put his tongue in his cheek, as if rather perplexed. He evidently thought the meat was intended for him.

At last he gave a large guffaw, and pulling the plate quite in front of him, said, with a broad grin, as he looked into Dean Hole's face:

"Well, meester, it's a biggish bit; but I'll wrastle wi' it."

Not the Right Brand.

The mails from home had just been received by a certain regiment which forms part of Buller's force. Not only were there letters, but many parcels from relatives and friends at home for certain lucky soldiers.

One of the Tommies received a large box addressed to himself, and with a triumphant yell he rushed off to his company's lines and gathered them around him to share in the contents of his box.

"Smokes, lads!" he cried gloatingly, as he undid the wrappings. "From the old man. I knows it. An' there's sure to be a bottle or two of Scotch."

He opened the box, gave one look at its contents, and collapsed in a heap.

"What is it?" cried his comrades, pressing round.

"It's from ole Auntie Mary," groaned the disappointed warrior. "Bandages, an' ointment, an' embrocation, an' splints, an' a book on ''Ow to be Yer Own Surgin'!" W. J. D.

Ladies First.

Little Tommy and his younger sister were going to bed without a light. They had just reached the bottom of the stairs when Tommy, after vainly endeavouring to pierce the darkness, turned round and asked:

"Ma, is it polite for a gentleman to precede a lady when they have to walk in single file?"

"No, my son," replied his mother; "the lady should always take the lead."

"I thought so," said Tommy delightedly; "go ahead, Sue." P. S. A.

Nothing Extraordinary.

One of the stock of ancient legends relating to the Rock of Gibraltar, from which the passing griffs were formerly regaled, relates how a young Scotch subaltern was on guard with a brother officer, when the latter, in visiting the sentries, fell over a precipice and was killed.

When the survivor was relieved from duty, he made the customary written report in the usual form, "Nothing extraordinary." And this brought the brigade major down upon him in a rage.

"What! When your brother officer on duty with you has fallen down a precipice four hundred feet high and been killed, you reported 'nothing extraordinary.'"

"Weel, sir," replied the Scot, calmly, "I dinna think there's onything extraordinary in it ava. If he had fallen doon four hundred feet and not been killed—well, I should hae ca'd that extraornery." E. W.

Taken Over His Beat.

Here is a story concerning the examination of a young man who wished to be appointed a county police constable. He put in an appearance one morning accompanied by his mother, and was taken in hand for examination by the inspector. This progressed satisfactorily until the inspector observed:

"Of course you are aware you'll have a lot of night work to do? You are not afraid of being out late, I suppose?"

Before the candidate could reply, his mother electrified the official with the statement:

"That'll be all right, sir, never fear; his grandmother's going round with him the first two or three nights until he gets used to it." F. T.

An "Only Orphint," Too.

He had a bundle of papers under his arm, and was standing near the railway station, weeping.

"What is the matter, little boy?" asked a pleasant-faced gentleman.

"If I go home without selling me papers me feyther and mother will bate the life out of me, they will."

"That's bad."

"Yes, sir, and the worst of it is that I am an only orphint."

"Yes," replied the philanthropist, allowing a coin to drop back into his pocket, "only it doesn't often happen that a boy has such bad luck." W. A.

Certainly.

It is not often said that a youth takes his seat or suddenly as the one of whom we are about to speak, as keeps it as persistently. He was the keenest boy in the class, and when an unpopular professor said:

"Gentlemen, your next subject for composition will be manners," he at once rose and asked, "Can we write on bad manners, sir?"

The professor looked over his spectacles at the all-conquering youth, and quietly answered:

"Certainly. You can write about whatever you are best acquainted with." A. T. H.

He'd Seek Cover.

A staff sergeant at Aldershot was instructing a squad of recruits in the use of the rifle. He had been explaining to them the course taken by a bullet when fired at an object some distance away.

"Now, Private Murphy," he said, turning to one of the rear rank men, "you seem to be doing everything except looking to your front and paying attention. Perhaps you'll answer me a few questions. Suppose I was standing a thousand yards away by yonder farmhouse, and a body of men were firing at me from here, and you were half way between us, what would happen to you?"

Private Murphy: "The bullets would pass over my head, sergeant."

"Quite right; and what would happen to me?"

Private Murphy: "I hardly know, sergeant. I'm afraid ye'd get dodging behind the house." H. S.

He Did a Bit of Painting.

In one of the courts on a certain occasion a youth was engaged in making some sketches for an illustrated paper, and behind him stood a burly gentleman, who might have been taken for a county magistrate.

The latter watched the young artist for a while, and then, touching him on the shoulder, ventured to observe that this and that and the other points of the sketch were not exactly what they should be. The artist simply replied by inquiring, "What do you know about it?"

The gentleman persisted in kindly and persuasive criticism.

At length the youth, convinced that, after all, the criticism was just—indeed, the gentleman had himself taken the drawing-block and made the necessary alterations with his own hand—remarked:

"Well, you do seem to know something about it, certainly," adding, "Are you on any paper?"

"No," answered the gentleman, "I am not on any paper, but I do a bit of painting now and then. My name is John Millais." H. R. G.

"SEND Sergeant Lester to me, Jones."

"Yessir."

The orderly glided from the tent and summoned Sergeant Lester who was enjoying a doze with his water-pouch for a pillow. He followed the orderly to the Colonel's tent, and then stood awaiting orders.

"You know the language of the Taal, do you not, my man?" asked the white-haired officer slowly, as he gazed at the man keenly.

"Very well indeed, sir."

"So I was given to understand by your commanding officer. Well, Lester, I have a mission for you which will require a little diplomacy and a good deal of courage. The mission is just this. You are to penetrate the camp on the north side of Ladysmith, and endeavour to find out when the enemy intend resuming their attack, and from what quarter it will come. Have you the necessary clothing?"

"I can easily obtain it, sir."

The sergeant's face flushed a little—and his eyes grew bright. The mission was dangerous—and that fact alone commended it to him—and if he was successful, promotion would doubtless follow when the campaign was ended—and there was a certain dark-eyed girl far away in Dover whose heart would throb with delight when she read in his letter of what he had done, and how he had been selected for a prominent undertaking in the Secret Service.

The Colonel shook hands with the man, wished him success, and then dismissed him, muttering as he went:

"He'll do it, if it is to be done."

Late that night, a man, dressed in the rough clothing of the Boer peasant soldier, took his place round the camp fire three miles north of Ladysmith, and chatted gaily with the Boers scattered there. The man was Sergeant Lester, and, seeing that he spoke the Taal (or Boer language) like a native, no suspicions were aroused by his appearance.

A smoking concert on a somewhat primitive scale was organised by a field cornet, who began proceedings by singing a song in a harsh, discordant tone. In order to make himself agreeable, Lester sang, and all went well.

Long before the camp settled down to sleep, the intrepid soldier had discovered what he wanted to know, and he was about to set out for the British encampment, when a rough hand was placed on his shoulder.

"You are leaving just as the sport is commencing, friend," said the owner of the hand, "the best is yet to come."

Wondering what the "best" might be, Lester allowed himself to be drawn into the crowd. A Boer then appeared bearing in his hand a huge picture of Queen Victoria, at the sight of which the men roared out cries of anger.

Lester set his teeth hard, guessing that some insult was about to be placed upon the Queen, but he told himself that whatever came, he must preserve his self-control, for if he betrayed his nationality, his life would be imperilled, and worse than that, his mission would be cancelled.

First of all the Boers ranged themselves round the picture and sang their national song in lusty chorus. Then a specially written verse, sung to the tune of "God Save the Queen," but expressing very different sentiments, was sung—but Lester kept silence, telling himself he could serve his Queen better by allowing the jeers to go unrebuked than by giving vent to his very natural feelings.

But worse was still to come, for a young Boer calmly walked towards the picture of our revered Queen and trampled upon it, every man in the room save Lester following his example. He held back.

"Why you hesitate?" asked one, hitting him roughly on the shoulder, "why you not do as we do?"

He cast about him for the first excuse, his blood on fire.

"She is a woman," he said—"even though she is Queen of the rooineks—she is a woman—and I cannot bring myself to do what you have done."

Some of the men laughed—and he heard a whisper go round the crowd that a similar ceremony would be performed on the following evening. When these words fell upon Lester's ears, his face changed—and his lips stiffened with resolution.

Night merged into the red dawn of the South African sky, and Sergeant Lester was within the British lines once more safe and sound.

"Well, sergeant?" It was the Colonel who spoke. "Well, sergeant, what news?"

"Capital, sir. I have discovered all that you wanted to know."

"Good, man!"

The Colonel, with an approving glance, listened attentively as the sergeant in concise soldierly manner confided to him what he had learnt in the Boer camp. He related every detail truthfully, concealing one thing only, the incident of the picture.

Digitized by Google

"You have done your duty, and more than your duty," said the Colonel when the recital was finished. "I congratulate you, Sergeant Lester, and you may rely that your assistance on this occasion will not be overlooked. You can now go and report yourself to your commanding officer. Good-morning."

With a smile upon his face, Lester obeyed, and then very quietly he went to his kit-bag and took from it a sheet of paper and an envelope. He wrote a letter, very short and very simple, to a certain girl at Dover—telling her that he did not think it probable they would ever meet again, but that she must try and not mind very much.

"Last night," the note ran: "I undertook a mission for Queen and country. To-night I'm undertaking another mission for Queen alone—and somehow I don't think I shall come back."

Then with a firm hand, he signed the letter "Your loving George," wrote the address, and dropped it into the box.

"And now," he said grimly, "for work."

* * * * *

Everything was exactly the same as the night before as Sergeant Lester sat down beside the Boer camp-fire, and he was hailed with mirth.

"He has sprung from the bottom of a kopje," said one fat burgher as he filled his pipe, and then puffed away placidly.

"Or rather from a visit to England," said another with a huge grin, "where he has been paying his compliments to the Englishmen's queen."

A roar of laughter went round the fire, but Lester said nothing. He lit his pipe and smoked in silence, until the concert began, and to-night he refused to sing.

"Sullen pig," cried one man, as he prodded him with his rifle, "keep silent then, and I myself will show you how a song should be sung."

Then rising he proceeded to grunt out a few bars of a coarse ditty, but it evoked small enthusiasm until a brutal reference to Queen Victoria was made. A cheer went up, and the picture was produced as upon the previous evening. Once again the disgusting process was gone through—and once again Lester was directed to do as the others did.

To-night, however, he did not remain silent. Drawing himself up to his full height, he snatched the picture of his Sovereign from the stout Boer who held it, and with one well directed blow stretched the ruffian at his feet.

A roar of anger rose from the others, and in a moment Lester was surrounded, but he stuck to the picture, and each man that endeavoured to wrest it from his grasp received a token of a powerful British fist in the shape of a damaged eye or a broken nose. Never was summary vengeance for an insult, dealt out so speedily as it was dealt out to them—but alas, the business was one-sided enough—and within five minutes of the first blow, Lester was lying bound, bruised and helpless on the veldt.

"He is an accursed rooinek," said one of the men hoarsely, and then addressing Lester he asked:

"Can you deny that?"

"Deny it," he cried, "no, I own it, and I am glad to own it. Last night I was obliged to stand by and allow your dirty tricks to continue—but to-night things are different, and I fancy that I've shown you my opinion of your conduct."

The burghers held a hasty consultation among themselves. Some were for shooting Lester then and there, others wished to hang him, others again proposed that a dose of the sambok should be dealt out to him.

The council was interrupted by the arrival of a horseman.

It was the commandant, and in three minutes' time he had taken in the situation.

"Unbind the rooinek," he said sternly, "and let him speak."

The order was obeyed. Lester rose and faced the commandant steadily.

"Why have you come here?" asked the Boer officer coldly.

"To avenge an insult offered to my Queen!"

"You are an Englishman, then?"

"Thank Heaven I am!"

The commandant laughed brutally.

"I hear you were in this camp last night," he said, "and your presence was due no doubt to a desire to obtain information of our movements. Well, it is wartime, and we make short work of spies. Take him out and shoot him," he said carelessly, as he turned away, and then catching sight of Lester's calm and resigned features, he asked: "Have you anything to say?"

Lester smiled.

"Only, 'God Save the Queen,'" he answered firmly.

* * * * *

Two days later, by reason of the information brought by Sergeant Lester, the Boers were utterly routed in a victory which has since become famous, but among the names of dead and missing men flashed over the cables to the home country, was the name of one we know, and beside it was written the word "Missing."

The message was correct, for Sergeant Lester had gone to join the band of heroes that had passed before him in the service of the country of their birth and the Queen whom they loved. To no man, peer or peasant, is given a more worthy death.

Dying as a Gentleman.

A DOZEN men sat around a camp-fire alongside the trail which led from Hope Valley to Woona-Walla. The trail was three hundred miles long, and ran uphill and down, over plain and through scrub, and now and then crossed a river or climbed a mountain.

The feet of three thousand Australian gold-hunters, accompanied for half the distance by waggons and pack-horses, had left such a plain road behind that the next three thousand could not go astray.

At no point on the trail could a dozen worse men have been picked out than the twelve who sat around Jim Agnew's camp-fire. They had banded together because they were bad. Had they travelled singly they would have fared badly at the hands of the crowd.

At nine o'clock at night, with every man ripe for mischief from the liquor he had imbibed, the camp had a caller—two of them. A man turned in from the trail and passed the fire and halted in the midst of the quarrelling gang and dropped a burden from his back.

It was a little girl seven or eight years old, and sound asleep. He pulled a blanket from under a man and spread it out to make a bed for the child, and he tucked her up with tender hand before he straightened up and looked about him and said:

"I carried her on my back from Sidney to Hope Valley, and finding the rush on I'm bound for Woona-Walla."

"And who may you be?" queried Jim Agnew of the stranger.

"A gentleman, sir, or the wreck of a gentleman," was the reply. "You call me Scott."

"And is this your child?"

"No, sir. Daughter of my ex-partner, Mr. Joe Taylor. He was another wreck of a gentleman. She was motherless, and when he died a few weeks ago he left her in my charge. Couldn't refuse to take her, sir—no gentleman could. Very interesting young person; bound to make a lady if properly reared and educated. She'll be waking up directly, and then we'll thank you for a bite to eat."

It was bearding the lion in his den. After two or three minutes the men recovered from their feeling of astonishment, and then there was resentment at the cool and nervy way their camp had been invaded. The man before them was ragged and unkempt, and dissipation was to be read in every line of his face, but yet instinct told them that he was not of their ilk. No matter what he was now, he had one day been a gentleman. There were mutterings and threats and presently Jim Agnew said:

"Say, I've heard of you! You are Scott, the gambler. You used to hang out at Red Hills."

"Your information is correct, sir. I used to be a gentleman. Then I was Scott, the gambler. At present I am Scott, the wreck of a gentleman and guardian of that child. Quite correct, sir."

"Hang your gentleman business!" shouted Jim as his temper began to boil up. "Say, boys, let's chip in and buy the kid. Mebbe she'll bring more luck than a humpback."

"Yes, let's buy the kid!" shouted half-a-dozen men in chorus.

"Gentleman," said the gambler, as he waved his hand towards the girl, who had been awakened by the shouts, "permit me to introduce Miss Ethel Taylor of Sydney, daughter of Mr. Joseph Taylor deceased, ex-convict, gambler, sharper, and bad 'un generally. In dying he left her in charge of his partner, the wreck of a gentleman who has now been a day and a half without food, but who wouldn't sell out his trust for all the gold in Australia."

"You'd better take a walk!" exclaimed Agnew after a long look at the gambler.

"After the girl has eaten, sir," was the quiet reply.

"The girl stays here."

"Not unless I am dead."

The man Agnew backed off a few feet and pulled a revolver from his belt and raised his arm until the muzzle was on a line with the gambler's right eye. The arm rested there, and as his fingers curled around the trigger he said:

"I'll give ye 'till I count five."

"My dear Ethel, good night and good-bye!" said Scott, as he half-turned and lifted his ragged cap to the girl.

She did not rise up nor call out. Agnew meant to kill the man before him if he did not move off, but after his words to the girl his arm slowly fell. There was silence for a minute, and then the boss of the gang said:

"Hang me, but you've got nerve! Sit down with the gal and fill up."

It was accounted a strange thing with the "rushers" to see a little girl among that band of "bad 'uns," each taking turn and turn about to carry her on his back, and both guardian and ward found themselves among friends. Indeed, before the new diggings were reached Jim Agnew and Scott were accounted "partners." It was stranger yet that little Ethel had a liking for Jim. He stood next to her guardian.

At Woona-Walla the child shared the tent or shanty with the two men. Child though she was, Scott treated her with almost as much formality as if she had been a girl of twenty. Agnew treated her as a child, and though his ways were rough and his speech shocked her at times, he won her heart more than the other.

Disappointment awaited hundreds of the rushers to Woona-Walla. One night, tired and discouraged, the two men sat smoking their pipes in silence for an hour, while the child played about or watched them and wondered if they had quarrelled.

By and by Scott looked up quietly and said:

"Jim, we are downed here."

"For sure," was the reply.

"Let's move on."

"Where?"

"Up the creek—down—over the hills—anywhere for her sake. I'm down to stay down, and the end is not far away, but I'd like to make a stake for her."

In the grey of the morning they took their way over the hills, one carrying the packs and the other the girl. Fifty miles away, on the banks of Brawling Creek, they made a camp, and two hours later were prospecting for gold. They found sufficient to encourage them to persevere, but not in quantities to rejoice over.

On the third day, the men left the girl asleep and moved further down the creek. She awoke and went searching for them upstream. She had walked for a quarter of a mile, calling as she went, when in trying to clamber up a bank she caught at and uprooted a bush. With the dirt and stones a nugget of gold rolled down into the stream and lay there like a spot of sunshine. An hour later Scott threw down his pick and said:

"Jim it's the richest spot on the face of the globe! There'll be a rush here of course, but we'll have our claims entered first. I'll start for Woona-Walla within half-an-hour."

In thirty minutes he was on his way over the hills, and in three days he was back again. It would have been no use to try to hide the new find. He had to state its location in order to file his claim, and the very official who made good his papers was at his heels as he made his way back to camp.

"I've got it," he said to his partner, after picking up the girl and kissing her. "Here it is—the 'Ethel Claim.' There'll be enough for both of you—aye! enough to make a dozen men rich!"

After supper that night the child climbed upon Scott's knee, and he stroked her hair until she fell asleep. For a long time after he had gently laid her down there was silence between the two men. He was the first to break it by saying:

"Jim, the girl is to go back to Sydney and be brought up a lady."

"Yes," replied Jim.

"Deal square with her and give her half."

"For sure, but where do you come in?"

Scott sat in the door of the shanty with his face upturned to the full moon. It was three or four minutes before he replied:

"Jim, you can't understand."

"But we've got gold—barrels of gold!"

"And I'm an old man—a drunkard, a gambler, a swindler, a wreck. Money could only bring new vices—new degradations. Can you understand?"

"No, hanged if I can."

"But you were not born and reared a gentleman. I wanted to make a stake for the girl. I've made it."

"And now what?" asked Jim.

Scott knelt down beside the sleeping child and kissed her. When he arose he held out his hand to his partner and said:

"Good bye, old man—give her a square divide."

"And you—you—?"

"Hush! Don't wake her!"

He passed out into the moonlight and up to the creek. Next morning they found his dead body half a mile beyond the last camp fire.

"Yes, he was my partner," said Jim as they called him to look at the dead man.

"And why did he kill himself?"

"Because he couldn't forget that he was once a gentleman."

On the Field of Battle

Bovril is playing a conspicuous part in upholding the British flag and contributing to the success of British valour. Sir Wm. MacCormac writes to the Lancet after the battle of Tugela:

"As each wounded man reached "the hospital he was served with a "hot cup of bovril, large cans of "which were boiling outside the "tents."

AN AFRICAN LOVER.

THEY didn't care much for Dahome; he was a sacrilegious being. To him the "Image" had no beauty; it was only a thing of stone. And as for sacred power, he, in his own degenerate mind imagined that he could create more happiness and good feeling by human acts of kindness. In the village he was considered a loafer.

To pass down the opening between the huts, which did service for a street, and see Dahome stretched out at full length on a mat, that at the time of his retiring was in the shade, snoring as only a vagrant can snore, was no more than could be seen three hundred and sixty-five days of the year; and, as was his custom in his country, his dark skin being generously rubbed with grease, and a herb that perfumed the said grease, the flies that shared the occupancy of the village found a very comfortable and remunerative oasis to camp upon.

It was just before one of these fractional relaxations that Dahome conceived a plan whereby he would gain a few hours pleasure and at the same time compel a certain family in the village to testify, upon the sacred image, that he was not entirely a heartless vagabond.

Of course there was an object. Dahome, though a loafer and a vagabond, had concealed beneath his tough black skin a heart as red, and as liable to be pierced by the arrows of the little black angel as the Great Chief who owned the hut opposite the temple, and who had many weed bags full of the brightest stones and shells.

The Object was the only daughter of a widow who had lost her husband in a war between the local warriors and the fighting men of a village four days distant, and who at present occupied a hut on the outskirts of the circle. This hut had been deserted by the former occupants on account of the close proximity to a stream, where, it is said, a lion was wont to come to quench his thirst after the night's dissipation.

Now, this lion was an obstinate beast, since he refused to be captured, and positively declined to be exterminated by the bands of hunters that ventured forth, very foolishly, to wreak vengeance on his majesty, but turning the tables, very often hunted the hunters. When the lion took this very foolish idea into his obstinate brain, one, and sometimes more than one of these sanguine huntsmen never came back. Then there was weeping and wailing.

Dahome, lying on his broad back, thought of his long-lamented father, and how, when just gaining man's estate, that proud, big warrior had taught his only son the valuable use of the javelin.

Night after night they would steal down to the stream and wait for the game to appear, and, at last, when a fine large buck came to take his drink, Dahome's father had grasped him by the arm and told him to "throw."

Ah, how his heart beat. Thump! thump! thump! He was afraid the buck would hear it and escape. Then how his fingers grasped the long tough shaft of his weapon. He tried to give it the proper poise, but somehow or other it would not balance.

Someone surely must have been tampering with it while it was lying in the sun to season. Well, he must throw at all events, for had not the buck nearly finished?

Raising it to the desired position, with the full strength of his young muscular arm, he threw and closed his eyes. What was that snort and crackling noise? And what was that disturbance by his side?

Perhaps he had missed, and the buck seeing him throw had decided to take revenge for the attack.

Whir-r-r! Why, that sounded like another javelin whistling through the air. Taking courage, Dahome opened his eyes, and, behold, there was his father, on the other side of the brook, bending over the carcase of the dead buck.

Picking his way across the stream, though with a very sheepish expression, Dahome learnt that his javelin had done no damage more than scare the buck. But his experienced father's had brought him down before he had gone half a heavy stone's throw.

But now matters were different. Though he was known as the village loafer, every afternoon, as the sun reached a certain stick, set there for that purpose, and until it had left half the hut in shadow, Dahome could be seen throwing his spear and flint knives at a target rigged some distance off. And as for hunting, well, no one in the village could supply the larder in as short a time as Dahome.

Reflecting on all occurrences, and planning his grand coup, was more than Dahome could endure. It was noticeable that he slept longer and more soundly than usual that day. So noticeable, in fact, that one of his neighbours, passing after the night was well set in, was kind enough to poke him in the ribs with a spear, and tell him that he had overslept himself. What a foolish remark! Didn't Dahome know very well that he had slept longer than was his wont? And then, again, what business was it of his neighbours whether he slept long, or did not sleep at all?

Reluctantly rising from his mat, and rubbing his greasy eyes with his more greasy knuckles, he growlingly went into the hut to prepare supper, only to find that through his laziness there was nothing in the place fit to eat. And, oh, he was so hungry! Well, there was only one thing to do, and that was to take his trusty spear and see if he couldn't bag some kind of game to sustain life until to-morrow. Acting as the cravings of hunger directed, he started out into the moonlight in search of his evening meal.

'Twas strange that he should find himself in front of a certain hut on the extreme outer edge of the circle, when he could have gone in the opposite direction from his abode, and with a better chance to secure game. But, nevertheless, there he was, and no game over his shoulder.

But what was that movement in yonder clump of trees? At last here is a chance for supper. Throwing himself on the ground at full length, Dahome crawled towards the tree. When within easy throwing distance, and while preparing his javelin, a soft purring sound which gradually swelled into a plantive love chant, floated from the clump of trees, and presently there stepped out, in all the beauty of her youth—by the thirteenth arm of the Image—the Object.

How beautiful she is! Her ebony skin reflects the moonbeams, and as she moves they strike at her, only to be parried and thrown off into space. Her beautiful hair is done up in one knot, on the top of her head, and

A STRAWBERRY PICNIC.

The Morning Leader, July 13th, 1898, says:—"Messrs. S. Chivers & Sons, "the well-known jam and jelly manu- "facturers, understand the art of "entertainment no less than the art of "jam-making. On Tuesday they "invited a number of Pressmen to a "strawberry picnic at their farm at "Histon, Cambridge. The wondering "pickers were delighted with the sight "of two-score top-hatted visitors "bending their backs to the willing "task of finding large strawberries. "It is just twenty-five years since "Messrs. Chivers started jam-making. "They now have a thousand acres of "land under cultivation, and employ. "when busy, eight hundred hands. "The jam factory is within the circle "of the fruit fields, and the fruit can "therefore be handled without delay."

At the luncheon which followed, a Cambridge Alderman and J.P. said:— "When he was shown over the factory "a year ago he was struck by the "healthy appearance of the employés, "the women and girls looking well and "joyous, so different from the condi- "tion of things in some factories he "had visited."

A London manufacturer expressed the opinion that the root of Messrs. Chivers' "success was the high excel- "lence of their goods, which had made "their mark in the commercial world. "People who had the goods once, "repeated their orders."

The Official Report of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, 1895, says:—"Messrs. Chivers' factory at Histon "is now well-known throughout the "country for the excellence of its "manufactures."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom.

resplendent with various coloured grasses; and in her nose the dearest little tusk that ever came out of an animal's mouth. How Dahome loved her! Hidden in the tall grass he could see her and admire to his heart's content. Listen! what are those words she is singing?

"Dahome, son of the Sun,
I love you, I love you;
Come to me, my own loved one,
For I love you, I love you."

Now, Dahome was not a bit bashful, so when such an inducement was offered him he was not slow in accepting it. To be sure, she was frightened, for, when her ardent lover answered the request, "Come to me, my own loved one," he did it so quickly that she found herself being very tightly hugged, and at first didn't know by whom. After scolding him for his impetuosity and the disarrangement of her hair, she was very willing, at his request, to retire back to the clump of trees and have him tell of his love for her. Unfortunately Dahome's voice was not a musical one, for when he tried to sing his love as she had done, he awakened the mother of the Object, who immediately demanded that her darling "should come into the house this instant," and, furthermore, that she "ought to be ashamed of being in the company of Dahome, the vagrant."

When Dahome aroused himself from the stupor in which he had fallen after the departure of the Object he realised that something desperate must be done to convince his loved one's mother that he was a splendid match for her charming daughter. And so ended his first night's wooing.

After that on every moonlight night, Dahome was to be seen hunting in the vicinity of the Object's hut. One beautiful evening, many moons after the memorable one, he had taken his friend, the javelin, and had ventured forth to procure his supper. It is needless to say that he eventually found himself near the stream, opposite his heart's desire's dwelling. Pausing in the tall grass, he relapsed into deep thought, thoughts of the future. How should he gain the goodwill of the mother? There was the rock on which he struck and stayed. Give her presents? That he could not do, for he had none to give. Become a warrior and gain glory on the field? No; for that was too much of a risk, and Dahome did not inherit his father's warlike spirit. Trouble and danger were things he did not care to look for. Ah, well, time and true love would find a way to overrule the matron's objections. Reflecting thus, Dahome had almost fallen asleep.

Lulled by the music of the brook, and the singing of the insects, a man less fond of the influence of Morpheus than our own vagrant, might have found it difficult to remain awake.

From a certain clump of trees came a soft, purring sound, that Dahome knew very well. As the music increased in volume and tempo, Dahome shook off the languid influence and planned a surprise for his loved one.

Arising, he commenced to pick his way towards the trees where she was singing. Ah! how he would steal up behind her and take her in his strong arms. He pictured to himself how she would start and scream, and try to escape, and then, after a word of love from him, she would stop struggling and, laying her darling little head upon his broad shoulder, whisper words of love.

There she is, reclining on a bank of moss. Her plump, round arms thrown above her head, and looking dreamily at the moon. How Dahome hated that moon, for is there not a man's face there? Who knows but that it is one of the gods trying to steal his darling from him.

Look! her lips move, but no sound reaches him. Her arms untwine from over her head and are raised towards that cursed face. Why, now, wonder after wonder, the lips of that face seem to move and smile! Oh, that the Image would put strength enough in his arm so that he could hurl his javelin through that hated bodiless god. But why not try? Grasping his spear more firmly he prepared to throw.

Stop! listen! There is no wind stirring, yet was not that a distinct rustling of the leaves. Again that sound. It is in the direction of the Object; but no, she is asleep. Soothed by her own song, she had dropped back on her improvised couch, and was now in the land of sweet visions.

But what are those two small spots in that dense blackness of the underbrush? Now the spots grow larger, now smaller, they come nearer, they are approaching the light. Now appears an indistinct form; now more clearly a majestic head, a lithe body, a flowing mane and a restless tail. By the shade of his beloved father—the lion! Now he is in the moonflood. How beautiful, how dangerously beautiful!

Dahome, Dahome, arouse yourself! Think no more of the ethereal god, there's better work for you now. There's a god of the jungle ready to destroy the beloved of your heart. I implore the Image to give you strength, not to reach the moon, but to fight a far more dangerous rival. For, see how the lion licks his red chops! Be careful, Dahome, he is going to kiss your love and you know that his caresses mean death. Don't allow him to embrace her, for when he shall have finished you may see her in the arms of the moon god. Now is the time to get her for yourself. If you kill the lion you may demand her from her stingy old mother by the right of conquest, and then think what a hero you will be in the village? Think of the bags of bright stones that await the man who brings the lion's head to the temple. Think of the crown of flowers that will be placed on your proud head. No more will they call you lazy vagrant.

There, that is right; fix your trusty spear and throw. Throw hard now, for there are no more spears at hand, and the first must kill. See how it glistens and sparkles as it cuts through the moonbeams. It strikes the lion—gods, what a deafening roar! Dahome, Dahome, you did not aim well, he is only wounded. Hide if you can, for he is looking for you. Ah, too late! here he comes. That's it, use your flint knife. Thrust, man, thrust for his heart. Oh, Image, if you've any power at all, use it in protecting this brave young man? See, the lion has borne him down. That's a good manœuvre, Dahome, let him chew that left arm; but use your knife with your right as fast as you can. One, two, three—and every lunge sends the knife up to the hilt in the body of the lion. Good, good! that last stroke reached his heart; for, see! he is still—thank the gods, he is dead. And now, Dahome, you may pull your scratched and torn self together and find that little girl that disappeared in the direction of her hut when the lion first roared.

Come man, get up, leave the embrace of that horrid, bleeding beast—you're a hero now, Dahome. Dahome! Ah, it is no use calling him—he is asleep again. But this time it's not a vagrant's snooze—it's the peaceful sleep of death, awarded to a hero.

The Brain Gymnasium.

On this page, under the title "The Brain Gymnasium," appear each week a series of puzzles calculated to occupy the attention of the competitors with interest and profit to themselves.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no list of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, March 19th, 1900.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1899.

'Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2llb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 81b., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to ake more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

MRS. H. COX, 23 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

MRS. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. BADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver nr Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

WRIST MACHINE

Physicians and Athletes have generally concurred that the wrist is the weakest portion of the human frame. It is the portion of the anatomy where strength is measured.

A person with weak wrists is a weak person constitutionally. When the wrists are strengthened the entire muscular system is made stronger.

There is no point in a man's anatomy where lack of strength is felt so much as in the wrist, nor where great strength is so useful, often seriously affecting his bread-winning power. With a systematic use of this machine only ten minutes twice a day you can double the strength of your hand in one month, and increase the size of your forearm very materially.

Purchasing and using a pair of Wrist Machines—one in each hand—saves half the time occupied in exercising both hands with one machine, and also ensures a more equal development of strength in the two hands.

SHORT STORIES

No. 585.] [1d.

For the Week Ending March 17th, 1900.

THE MASCOT OF THE CARABINIERS.

"HARTLEY!"

The voice came softly through the still African night, with a stealthy, guarded utterance, that conveyed a distinct note of danger.

The hat of a Cape Carabinier popped up from behind a boulder on the ridge above, and a strong, square-jawed face showed dimly through the darkness.

"Well?"

"Did you hear anything?"

"Nothing."

"Strange! I thought I did."

"Where?"

"Out on the veld yonder."

"Well, keep your peepers skinned down there. It won't do to be caught napping. This isn't anything in the picnic line, you know."

With which sagacious reminder, the face and the Carabinier hat disappeared again, and silence fell on the hill once more.

On the ledge below Trevor Hamilton continued to pace the length of his beat, his head going round towards the black void yonder every few seconds, where night hung over the silent veld.

The clank of the spurred heel upon the loose stones, the jingle of accoutrements, and occasionally the stifled yawning "Heigho!" that came from the weary Carabinier, posted somewhere on the hillside, were the only sounds that broke the stillness of the rocky height.

Suddenly Hamilton pulled up short, with a quick indrawing of his breath. His keen, sensitive ear had caught that sound again—that strange, far-off sound, which seemed so oddly out of place in this barren range of hill and veld.

"Hartley! I say, Hartley!" he called, as softly as before.

"Confound it! What?"

There was a querulousness in the tones which seemed to convey the suspicion that despite the caution which had dropped from him on the score of "napping," Trooper Hartley had been doing something in that line himself behind the boulder up there.

"Come here; quick."

There was a growl on the ridge above, and the big Carabinier came slipping and sliding down through the darkness, swearing softly but profusely at the Boers, the darkness, outpost duty, and human affairs in general.

"Well, what is it?" he asked, when he reached his comrade's side.

The other held up his hand, and bent his ear towards the ground.

"Listen!" he said. "Do you hear it?"

"By jove! I do."

"What do you make of it?"

"Seems a bit odd, but it sounds to me exactly like the mewing of a cat."

"So it does to me."

"But what on earth brings the creature out there on the veld? There's not a house—not even a Kaffir hut—for ten miles around."

"That's what we've got to find out."

They listened again—intently, breathlessly, and up from the plain floated the faint, plaintive mi-ouw. Somehow, it seemed to strike upon them like a call for help.

"Don't altogether like the look of it," muttered Hamilton. "Might be some crafty trick of the Boers, for all we know."

"Ay, if they were hanging about anywhere," answered his companion. "But they're a good twenty miles off still."

"Don't be too sure of that, my friend. They're always on the move, trailing about all over the shop. I shouldn't be a bit surprised if there was a strong commando out on the veld there at the moment, and that this was just a feeler of their scouts to ascertain if these hills are occupied."

"Hullo! here comes the relief," put in Hartley. "We'd best get back and report the matter, anyhow."

There was a steady tramp, tramp, on the ridge above, a challenge, and the rattle of carbines as arms were grounded. The two below scrambled up the rocky slope, both eager to request leave to investigate this curious affair.

Captain Dewhurst, the officer in charge of the outposts had come round with the relief, and to him they hastened to make their report.

"Seems strange, certainly," he said, when he had heard them out. "It might be just as well to get at the bottom of it, trivial as it appears; for with a small, detached force such as ours, no precaution can be overlooked. We don't want another Nicholson's Nek affair."

He thought the matter over for a moment, gnawing his moustache in considerable doubt and perplexity.

"Well, you had better slip down quietly, you two, and see what you can make of it," he said, at length. "Get back as quickly as you can; I'll wait here for your report."

Scarcely were the words out of his mouth before the two had disappeared from the ridge, and were creeping warily down towards the veld. So gingerly did they pick their steps that not even a loose stone was dislodged in the descent.

Once at the foot of the hill, with the hummocky plain stretching away before them, they felt in their element. Both were born scouts—the pick of the Carabiniers in this respect—and generally hunted together, too. A prowl of this kind, with a spice of danger to brace them up, was a sort of thing very much after their hearts.

It would have required a remarkably keen eye to detect either of the crouching figures as they slipped noiselessly along through the darkness. The plaintive mi-ouw mi ouw, still came to them, feeble and muffled at times, then louder and more distinct.

"Where do you think it proceeds from?" Hartley whispered across to his companion.

"Bear away a little to your right," was the answer. "It seems to be somewhere in that direction."

On they crept—wary, watchful, keenly on the alert. They were moving straight for the spot now; the cry was right ahead of them.

Presently Hamilton, who had the eye of a hawk, edged his way across to the other, and laid a restraining hand on his arm. In an instant both were down flat on the ground.

"What is it?" whispered Hartley.

Hamilton raised his head a little, and peered steadily through the darkness.

"I do believe—yes, it is a cat, after all," he said.

"Where?" asked Hartley, his eyes sweeping round.

Hartley struck a match, and, shading the light between his hands, took a good look at the animal.

Digitized by Google

"Perched on the top of that boulder yonder."

They stole cautiously towards the spot. A big, black cat, which was sitting disconsolately upon the stone, got upon its legs, and mewed at them with outstretched neck.

Hartley struck a match, and shading the light between his hands, took a good look at the animal. A stifled cry broke from him.

"Why," he exclaimed, glancing up at his companion, "that's Miss Kennealy's 'Kruger!'"

"Upon my word, I believe you're right," Hamilton answered, with a shade of uneasiness in his tones.

The two men looked at each other with grave, questioning faces, until the match burnt down and scorched Hartley's fingers.

If any doubt lingered in their minds, it was quickly removed by the creature itself. On hearing its name pronounced, it hopped nimbly off its perch, with a sort of confirmatory mi-ouw, and rubbed itself against their legs. Then it trotted away to some little distance, paused, and looked back at them, its eyes scintillating in the starlight.

"By Jove!" exclaimed Hamilton, "there's something queer in this, Hartley."

"Looks like it," answered the other. "It strikes me that we'd better follow 'Kruger's' lead for once."

The two carabiniers had started to run.

The cat, seeing they were moving after it, trotted on again. Every few seconds its head came round, as if to make sure that they were not lagging behind. It led them towards a dip in the ground, about fifty or sixty yards away.

Hamilton was the first to reach the lip of the hollow. Peering down he made out something white lying at the bottom.

The object, whatever it was, suddenly moved, and the next second a feeble moan of suffering came up to him.

"Good Heavens!" he cried out. "Is that you, Miss Kennealy?"

"Yes," was the reply. And then, with a sharp catch of the breath, indicative of pain, the girl added, "That is Mr. Hamilton I think?"

For answer, he went flying down the slope, closely followed by the astonished Hartley. In a moment they were at her side.

"Oh, I'm so glad that you are friends!" she cried, looking up at them, but without attempting to rise. "I thought at first it might be the Boers."

"The Boers!" they exclaimed.

"Yes. Have you seen nothing of them yet?"

"Not a sign."

"Oh, I am in time, then!" she cried.

"In time! For what?"

"To stop you from advancing. The Dutch are lying in wait for you among the Lothulia Hills—in ambush there. I——" She broke off suddenly, and caught in her lips with a little moan of pain.

"Are you hurt, Miss Kennealy?" asked Hamilton, bending over her with anxious solicitude.

"Oh, it is nothing very much," she answered, lightly. "I tumbled down here in the dark, and gave my ankle a nasty twist."

In an instant they had lifted her tenderly from the ground; and then, clasping hands, formed a seat for her. With an arm round the neck of each, she was carried from the hollow, and they bore her swiftly back towards the hill.

As they hurried on across the veld with their burden, the girl told them her story.

It appeared that a body of Boers had looted her uncle's place that very morning, and turned the two of them out of house and home. The old man they compelled to start off in one direction; the girl in another. Her cat "Kruger," who was accustomed to follow her about like a dog, stole away after her.

Before leaving the house, she had overheard two of the Boers in conversation. Having a fair knowledge of their language, she was enabled to gather from what they said that someone down at Freemont station was keeping them posted up in every movement on the part of the British. From him they learnt that a column was to be detached, in order to turn their flank, and a strong commando had been sent out to lie in wait for it among the Lothulie Hills. No sooner was she out of their clutches than she started off across country to try and intercept the column, and frustrate the treachery of the rascally spy.

Digitized by Google

"Did you hear the scoundrel's name?" Hamilton asked, between his clenched teeth.

"Yes," she said. "I think it was Plover, or Glover, or—— Oh, oh! you very nearly let me fall!"

No doubt they did. The name was familiar to both; and at the first moment their consternation was so great that they well-nigh dropped their burden on the spot. Joseph Glover was the English postmaster at Freemont!

"You are quite sure of this, Miss Kennealy?" asked Hamilton.

"Oh, yes," she replied, "It appears that every item of information is wired to them regularly."

That was quite enough. With a little cry the girl clutched them both tightly around the neck, for the two Carabiniers had started to run.

Captain Dewhurst was not a little astonished when he beheld his scouts bearing a white-clad form up the hill, and noticed that the little party was accompanied by a big black cat.

When he heard their story, he complimented the girl warmly on the splendid courage she had displayed in undertaking a ten-mile walk across the open veld in order to warn them of their danger.

The two troopers bore her on to the camp, where, when the news got out, she was accorded a magnificent reception. After a brief interview with the commander of the column, she was placed in the doctor's charge, while the Cape Carabiniers took upon themselves the care of the cat.

In less than half-an-hour a score or so of troopers rode out from the camp, and clattered away towards Freemont, which lay about five miles to the rear. Arriving there, Mr. Joseph Glover was hauled unceremoniously out of bed, and it required all the influence of the officer in charge to restrain the men from talking summary vengeance upon the scoundrel there and then.

As it was, a court-martial was held in the British camp that night, and at daybreak next morning the pitiful wretch met with his deserts.

* * * * *

The position occupied by the column being a strong one, it was decided to hold on to it during the day. At nightfall the force stole out, and trailed away across the veld, moving forward with the utmost rapidity.

But the Boers waited for them in vain among the Lothulie hills. Instead of proceeding in that direction as was originally intended, the British Commander gave it a wide berth, and slipped quietly past in the darkness.

At dawn next morning, he fell upon the main body of the Dutch, who, never for a moment suspecting that their little plan had miscarried, were taken by complete surprise, and the British force succeeded in turning their flank. The action was a most brilliant and successful one; and of all the troops engaged, the corps which distinguished itself most was the Cape Carabiniers.

Foremost in every charge they made that day were Troopers Hamilton and Hartley. The latter, indeed, was placed hors de combat towards the close, being dragged out of the fray with a brace of Mauser bullets in his big body.

As he lay in the field hospital that night, Hamilton, who felt almost like a brother to this great, big-hearted comrade of his, came in search of him. He found him woefully despondent.

"I'm done for, old man," said Hartley, looking up at him. "We'll do no more scouting together, you and I. But there's just one little thing I wanted to speak to you about before I go under."

"What's that?" asked his friend.

"It's—it's—about Miss Kennealy!"

Hamilton started, and looked down at the prostrate form as if a light had suddenly dawned upon him.

"Yes, you've hit it," responded the other. "I was fond of her too, you know; but I could see with half an eye that it was you she preferred, and so I kept in the background. Perhaps you'll tell her about it after I'm gone."

Hamilton, with averted head, pressed his hand in silence, and a great sorrow lay on his heart as he returned to his troop.

But in spite of his gloomy forebodings, Hartley did not "go under" after all. The Boers were often to feel the weight of his brawny arm again. When he returned to duty, and learnt that Hamilton was engaged to Miss Kennealy, he heaved a mighty sigh, and went off to try and get a slap at the Dutch by way of consoling himself.

Miss Kennealy presented the sagacious "Kruger" to the Carabiniers, and they regard the animal as a much-prized mascot. If you want to get their dander up against the Boers, just bring that cat to the fore.

The very sight of it seems to remind them of the day that a delicate girl was turned out on the trackless veld by those heartless wretches—to perish there, for all they cared.

THE POLICE CONSTABLE AND THE FRUIT-SELLER.

It might be interesting to consider what fateful power it is that seizes two individuals born at opposite ends of the earth and hurries them along through varied scenes and vicissitudes, each ignorant of the other's existence, bringing them together sometimes in love and friendship, sometimes in enmity and deadly hatred.

These philosophic thoughts were suggested a few days ago, as we passed a fruit stand, which stood at a busy spot well to the east of Aldgate Station.

By that stand, presiding over its destinies, was a black-haired, black-eyed, black-eyebrowed, olive-complexioned daughter of Greece. By that stand and gazing into those Greek optics was a stalwart form with red hair, blue eyes, blue coat and helmet, and Jubilee medal on breast. He looked good-natured and honest and wore a well-trimmed blonde moustache. There was one defect in his physique—he was so round-shouldered as to be almost humpbacked. His name was Michael O'Callaghan, or, as he himself put it, "Police Constable Michael O'Callaghan."

There they stand, the one for aught we know a lineal descendant of Leonidas, if that worthy had ventured into matrimony before he ventured into Thermopylæ: and the other—it goes without saying—a descendant of somebody equally ancient and illustrious. Yes, there they stand—from Ireland and Greece—making love to each other on the kerbstones at a busy spot in the World's Capital. Oh, love, they say you rule the court, the camp, the grove; you do indeed, and you rule the kerbstones, the apple stands, and the police force.

How Mr. Michael O'Callaghan had ever succeeded in making love to the fair Zoe—for that was the name of this Pythoness of the apple stand—the boy Eros himself only can tell! for Zoe's vocabulary in English was limited to such trade terms as "two fo' penny," "three fo' tuppence," and Michael's knowledge of modern Greek was, if anything, more limited. Love laughs at locksmiths; but the little rascal in this case seemed equally to laugh at languages, and the tower of Babel had no more penal consequence for him than if it never raised its defiant head to an offended Heaven.

The constable's beat embraced the spot on which stood the apple stand, and surely no policeman ever travelled his district so rapidly as he did. Ever and anon, his medal flashing coruscations of light, and his eyes, blue as his native skies, when it is not raining there, flashing coruscations of love, would round the corner and approach the apple stand

"How much?" he would say, holding an apple which Zoe had burnished that morning with a greasy rag, while the Volapuk language of love would say more truly than ever Byron said it

"Zoe mou sas agapo," and Zoe would answer with a smile and a not unmusical voice:

"Two fo' penny."

Then they would rummage amid the fruit, their hands would meet, a little surreptitious squeeze of the fingers would follow and then this guardian of the peace would march along, twirling his moustache, lowly whistling "The Girl I left behind Me," and dreaming dreams no "copper" ever dared to dream before. These day dreams generally took the form of a cosy little home, with Zoe its mistress, and a little Græco-Irish O'Callaghan crowing and kicking up its heels on the floor.

Several times each day that unspoken comedy of love was performed. Day after day Michael boldly gazed into those dark Grecian eyes, and Zoe stole bashful glances into the Irish blue ones, and the surreptitious finger-squeezing was perpetrated; but never a word was spoken save:

"How much?"

"Two fo' penny."

The time had now come when language was a necessity, and towards this desideratum our Lothario in blue as he marched through the crowded streets, bent all the energies of his thinking powers. Many methods rapidly suggested themselves to his fervid imagination and were as rapidly rejected, and many a smile played over his broad face as he saw the "bull" in some of those suggestions.

One day, when off duty, while immersed in deep thought, he was suddenly aroused by a commotion issuing from a crowd of small boys in a narrow court.

It was only a fight between two street-arabs. The others had formed a ring, and various words of encouragement were offered by the young spectators to the champions in the ring. At another time, Michael would have passed this matter by; but now he felt that he was prospectively the head of a family and that he would not tolerate such things. On tiptoe he approached the scene of the combat.

As Michael approached he heard someone in the crowd scream:

"Look out there, Jim, he's got a knife."

The boys, ranging in every degree of dirty-facedness and tatteredness, were too intent on the struggle to notice the officer, who reached the outer edge of the crowd unseen.

One of the boy combatants, with swarthy face, scrowling brow, and a recently acquired black eye, stood at one side of the ring like a hunted animal at bay with his hand behind his back and concealed under his coat; while the other urchin, small and wiry-looking, with his little hands clenched and his eyes blazing, stood like an infantile gladiator ready to spring on his antagonist and dare the worst, knife and all.

In a moment the policeman had each of them by the collar. In another instant he pulled the hand of the swarthy boy from underneath his coat, and wrenched from it a murderous-looking knife.

At the constable's approach the crowd of boys broke and scampered like rats on the appearance of their feline enemy; and, while he was wresting the knife from the swarthy boy, his late antagonist took advantage of the opportunity to regain his liberty, so that officer and captive were left alone.

The distance to the station was not far, and the officer carried off his little captive.

"Who gave you the black eye?" asked the officer, looking down from his six feet on the diminutive little man walking by his side.

"He give it ter me," answered the child, with a scowl that belonged to more mature years.

"And you came near killing him, and then you'd be hung."

"I'll give it ter 'im yet," hissed the boy through his clenched teeth.

"You're Italian, ain't ye?" queried the policeman.

"Noa, I wus borned in Greece."

"Ye're a Greek, are ye?" half soliloquized Mr. O'Callaghan, and immediately a secret sympathy sprang up in the mind of the captor for his captive.

Half-a-dozen thoughts now jostled each other through the constable's mind. His prospective paternity came upon him again, once more he saw the Græco-Irish scion of the O'Callaghan kicking his infantile heels in mid-air, and he softened toward Zoe's compatriot.

A thought came—he might be a brother of Zoe's, and this thought was voiced by the question, "What's yer name, my boy?"

"Petros; they calls me Pete for short."

"What's yer other name?"

"Zarouski."

That point was sattled. Was not Zarouski Zoe's name? They had almost reached the station when the officer suddenly turned round, saying to the boy. "Come along," and, walking through two or three streets, led his captive to his own lodging. Here he locked the door, and, putting the poor little urchin, who thought he was going to be tortured to death, in a seat opposite him, opened the ball thus: "Pete, do ye know what they'll do to ye there?" jerking his thumb in the direction of the Police Court.

"No," replied the lad, his short bare legs hanging down from the chair and six inches from the floor, while dismay was written on the face staring at his interlocutor.

"They'll send ye to a Reformatory School, where you'll have to work every day, get nothin' to eat, and be flogged every night."

The policeman winced at his own want of veracity, while the poor little fellow dropped his head on his breast in despair.

"You ain't a bad kid, are ye?" asked the constable.

"I ain't when I's left 'lone; I's bad when I's maddened," added the boy, candidly.

"Pete, I've took a likin' to ye," says the policeman. "and if ye promise not to hurt that boy that blacked yer eye, when ye meet 'im, I'll be yer friend, and ye won't go to the Reformatory School."

Pete didn't answer; it was not every day that people took a liking to him. He clutched his old rag of a hat tighter in his swarthy hands and the tears stood in his eyes.

"Now will you promise not to injure that boy?" queried the officer, with an assumption of that tone he had seen the police justice assume toward culprits. Still the child—child-man, rather—did not speak. He was doing his best to control the rising tears. He was afraid he would blubber out, and that, according to his code, would be unmanly.

"Well," queried the constable, "do ye promise?" The boy nodded his head, with a mass of black, unkempt hair on it, as a sign in the affirmative, and with a quick movement of his hand across his eyes managed to intercept a tear that in spite of his efforts escaped his eyelids. The policeman saw and was satisfied; then, addressing himself to the child, as if he was a full-grown man, and cheerily rubbing his hands, he said:

"Now, Pete, me boy, we'll have some dinner, you and me."

Very soon they were on the best of terms, and Pete would have gladly laid down his life for his new friend. He told O'Callaghan his little history.

But what interested the officer most was that Pete knew Zoe.

"Yes, I knows Zoe," said the little fellow, swelling with delight. "Zoe's been here on'y a little—about three months; her old fadder, he bought that stan' off a Italian feller, and Zoe runs it all her own self, she does."

The officer had early in their acquaintance determined to make use of Pete in declaring his love for Zoe, so that his friendship had a selfish motive, and was not at all so disinterested as was Pete's for him; so he took the little fellow entirely into his confidence, and the latter was as delighted at being able to do his great friend a favour as was the little mouse in the fable when it was given an opportunity to gnaw the meshes of the net that held entangled its great benefactor the lion. Perhaps the simile is a bad one in this case, as Pete was helping to entangle his friend in the meshes of a net, rather than to disentangle him.

The officer well knew that in the course he had determined on there were many difficulties to be overcome; he recognised the fact that it was a condition, not a theory, that confronted him, and taking a heroic resolve, determined to learn Greek; that is, he determined to learn enough Greek to pop the question in it, and Pete should be his teacher. It did not need many words, he soliloquized—one short sentence; and towards the production of this one great sentence our hero turned the full force of his great intellect; after covering, with a short stub of a pencil, quires of foolscap paper—why fool's-cap rather than any other kind of cap is not stated—he selected the following, more in despair of being able to do better than on account of its perfect fulness:

"Zoe, I love you. Do you love me in return?"

This was not such a bad sentence, our love-sick hero thought, as he surveyed it with his head first on one side and then on the other; and the author of this veracious history is inclined to agree with him and earnestly recommends it to young gentlemen in similar situations. Pete could put this gem of a sentence into pretty fair Greek, all but the words "in return"; what did that mean? he asked, and our hero replied, "Why, to love me in return means to love me back." Accordingly the sentence as Pete understood it read:

"Zoe, I love you; do you love me back?"

Now, Pete was a precocious child, and very bright in those things in which he had had experience; but a little knowledge of philology would have taught him there was such a thing as idiom in all languages, and that literal translation often gives a different and sometimes ludicrous meaning. But what he lacked in knowledge was made up in enthusiasm for his friend. He translated boldly like the reformation translators, and like them arrived at similar results. He knew no distinction between a noun and an adverb; so accordingly the adverb "back" he translated into a colloquial and somewhat slangy Greek noun meaning a "crooked back." Pete, instead of the personal pronoun "me," used the possessive adjective "my;" so that the sentence religiously committed to memory by Michael, instead of being "Zoe, I love you; do you love me in return?" read: 'Zoe, I love you; do you love my crooked back?"

At length the fateful sentence was learnt; and one bright morning in May, O'Callaghan, in his newest uniform, boldly marched toward Zoe and the apple-stand, with Pete closely following.

Zoe spoke to Pete in their own modern ungrammatical Greek, and to Michael in that language of the eyes where grammar cuts no figure. But this could not last always, and our lover, with his heart galloping all over his body, prepared for that terrible ordeal which it is said causes the bravest to tremble. Holding up in his hand a rosy apple so that passers-by would think he was asking the price, he repeated with terrible precision the sentence as he had learnt it.

Zoe did love him, and she said so in Greek so vehement and voluble that Pete, the would-be interpreter, did not understand more than every second word. She went on to say that she did love, and that she did not mind his poor crooked back the least bit. The words flitted by Pete so rapidly that he succeeded only in understanding and retaining the last sentence.

Judge of our hero's astonishment went Pete translated this back to him:

"She says she'll marry you, but she don't like your crooked back the least bit."

Zoe stood by, listening to Pete's English, her eyes beaming over with love. Now, laughter is closely akin to love, and for the first time our hero, in those Grecian orbs, saw only laughter; he was wounded in his most sensitive point, and that by her he loved. His beloved Zoe told him that indeed she would marry him, but she did not like his humpback the least little bit. With one reproachful glance at Zoe he turned and slowly walked away. Zoe saw the reproachful glance, and saw like the the soldiers at Balaclava, that "someone had blundered." Perhaps, she thought, he was going away, as he often did, because the passers-by were beginning to notice. Perhaps he would return.

Time rolled on calmly and inevitably as if nothing had ever happened to mar the happiness of two human beings. Time rolled on, and every morning Zoe burnished her apples with the same greasy rag, and always looked neat and trim, expecting him to return. She had learnt enough English now for all practical purposes. But he never returned. He is still single, somewhat more silent than he used to be, but a brave and faithful member of the force, and Zoe, with the blue-black hair that Michael admired so much, streaked with grey, is still the Grecian maiden of the apple-stand.

The moral of this story is; Never propose in a language you do not understand, and never employ Petros Zarouskis to interpret the reply. B. E. Drone.

THE WOLVES.

A dark December night—dark as the grave—a moaning storm, which congeals one's breath, freezes the blood in one's veins, and stirs up whole mountains of snow in front of it—heaven and earth amalgamated in an endless fog, an unlimited darkness, nowhere broken by so much as the twinkle of a light.

Even the lanterns of the fortress have been extinguished by the wind, which rushes through the midnight with an uproar like the howling and laughter of evil spirits. The redoubts and the rampart, the dry moat and the gates, are wrapped in gloom and silence.

The storm rages round the little guardhouse. It throws flying masses of snow against the thickly frosted windows, it sweeps across the roof, and ceases its clamour for a while, preparing for a new assault.

Inside, in the officers' room, the lieutenant on guard lies dreaming on the leather couch. His thoughts wander—far, far away from the fortress buried in the snow. The moaning and howling of the storm outside form the accompaniment to a vision which rises up before his mind,—a vision of sparkling lights, of sweet perfumes, and of soft dance music—and then, like another dream, the Nevski Prospect appears, filled with a noisy crowd, inundated by the bluish flood of electric lights, in the glare of which great snowflakes hover in gentle undulations to the ground. A sudden noise of heavy steps. The sergeant stands before him.

"Well, what is it?"

"I have to report to your honour that the cold is still increasing. The thermometer has gone down to 25 degrees."

"What's to be done, brother?" the lieutenant yawns "As it is, the sentries are relieved every hour."

"At your honour's service—but it's getting rather difficult at Post 5. The men just came back sweating as if they had been in a vapour-bath—they had to wade in snow up to their hips."

Post 5 was situated on a distant redoubt, which served as a powder-magazine. Directly in front of it was the river, now frozen to its lowest depths, which, on the other shore, gradually turned into a series of swamps. The latter were bounded, for miles round, by thick, undergrown woods.

"Well, they'll have to be patient to-night, that's all," said the officer. "Have you anything more to report?"

"Nothing, your honour."

"You may go, then."

The relieved sentries had come back; they were stamping the snow from their waterproof boots, shaking it off their sheep-skin coats, and disentangling their bashliks from their ears and necks.

"Well, brothers, how do you like this weather?" asked one of the soldiers, a thickset fellow with bright eyes and a grin on his good-natured face.

"Wait till you're frozen—you won't feel like laughing then," growled another, as he hung his heavy sheepskin on a hook.

The others had approached the table, where one of their comrades sat reading aloud from a small volume entitled, "Soldier Life." The men formed a circle round him, their eyes fixed intently upon the lips of the reader, from which issued detached words:

"—And—then—they—went—through—with—such—a—manœuvre——"

As the newcomers stepped into the circle of light thrown by a small lamp shaded by a tin reflector, the reader stopped:

"Is it bad outside?" he asked.

"Vassili Petrovitch almost got frozen, at Post 6; the storm is awful, it even fills the sentry-box with snow. You can't get away from it."

"Will you stop talking!" cried the sergeant, looking up from his guard-book. "That's no more than your duty—it's what you swore to do."

The men remained silent. Nothing was heard but the roaring of the storm outside.

"What was that?" said one of them suddenly, in a low voice, "yonder from across the river——?"

"What was it?"

"Don't you hear it, brothers? It's wolves!"

The men looked at each other. Then one of them said, derisively:

"Wolves? Nonsense. It was nothing but the storm."

The first speaker insisted:

"It was the howling of wolves, nothing else. They are on the other side of the river, opposite the powder redoubt."

That was where Post 5 stood. Who was the next to relieve him? All looked at Pantkratieff, a young recruit, who rose from his seat with a look of dismay.

The men laughed as if to banish their own fears.

"You had better look out, the wolves will tear you to pieces."

One of the fellows went down on all fours, showed his teeth, and approached the recruit, uttering a low growl.

At this, however, the sergeant started up angrily:

"Be quiet!" he shouted, "or you'll be sorry. A nice way, this, to behave on guard. Quick, get the next relief ready."

The soldiers wrapped themselves in their sheepskins and bashliks, and seized their muskets. Their faces had grown graver as the foremost threw open the door. They were met by a cloud of whirling snow and an icy temperature as they stepped out. To their eyes, dazzled by the light, the darkness outside seemed impenetrable.

They groped their way out, bending forward and bracing themselves against the storm, and disappeared in the gloom.

"Halt? Who goes there?"

From somewhere in the moat the voice of Post 5 came out of the darkness—hoarse and indistinct for the snow-dust filled the mouth of everyone who attempted to call or shout.

The sentries were exchanged in silence. The one relieved groped and waded away with the others through the storm. The young recruit remained behind alone at Post 5.

He entered the sentry box, which, at least, sheltered him from the tempest if not from the cold. Inside, he sat down, and set his musket by his side in the deep snow which had drifted in through the door, and listened in silence to the chaos of sounds outside in the darkness.

What were they doing at home now? There was snow, plenty of snow there, too, in the lonely village of the steppe. The low cabins would be buried in it. It was hard work to dig a passage from the door to the street, and keep it open.

Well, what of that? Snow keeps you warm. And what a happy time they are having in the village now, in the winter season. They go from house to house, in disguise, to visit their neighbours; they skim, in their three-horsed sleighs, across the boundless, snow-covered fields; and inside the cabin, in the cosy living-room, dimly lit by a flickering lamp, two old people just at this hour are sitting opposite each other at table, thinking of him, and talking about him, while after having crossed themselves, they eat their supper.

The young recruit felt a lump rising in his throat—a deep feeling of home-sickness came over him, here in the midst of storm and darkness, and an unspeakable longing for his loved ones.

What was the good of thinking. He rose quickly and seized his musket, in order to leave the sentry-box, when, suddenly——

A long-drawn-out, piercing howl came out of the profound darkness just in front of him, and lost itself in a hoarse, low growl. From the rampart above a second, deeper voice responded, and from farther off, beyond the river, the fierce sounds were repeated in chorus.

The wolves!

The blood of the lonely sentry seemed to freeze in his veins. Involuntarily he leant against the wooden sentry-box, so as to protect his back. Then he cocked his musket, and stared out into the night as if he would have penetrated the darkness perforce. His heart beat in vehement throbs; he bent his head forward in order to catch the faintest sound that the wind might bear to him.

But all was quiet, perfectly quiet. The young fellow drew a deep breath. The minutes passed slowly. When would the relief come?

He felt a mad desire to leave his post and run to the guard-house as fast as his feet would carry him. But he knew his duty. He could not desert his post, he was obliged to stay, dead or alive, where the orders of his superior had placed him.

"The wolves are gone," he thought to himself "they only wanted to frighten me, and——"

There, nearer than before, the lugubrious howl, and, without delay, the answer from the rampart above. But no longer from a single wolf! No, that was the snarling and barking of the whole pack, which had crossed the river in the meantime.

Evidently the wind had given them the scent, and they knew that solitary man was standing there in the wintry night, a man whose hair rose up with horror under his lambskin cap, and who clasping his musket with trembling hands, stared up at the rampart.

There, on the ridge, where the snow had been blown away, crouched the pack. Their horrible yelping alternately grew louder and died away again, only to recommence after a long pause. Each time, in long-drawn-out tones, the bass of a veteran wolf rose above the rest of the hoarse chorus. He appeared to be the leader of the company, and to be far in advance of the others. It seemed as if his shadow were visible in the darkness —and now, suddenly, two phosphorescent green points flashed out directly in front of the recruit, and more piercing than ever, the howls from above recommenced.

He aimed and fired.

Like a clap of thunder the report reverberated through the moat—then, a despairing whine from the rampart, a whine which brought the yelping of the pack to a sudden end. Dark shadows flitted to and fro, there were sounds of snarling, gnashing of teeth, and crunching—the wolves in mutual combat, were tearing to pieces the carcase of their comrade who had been shot.

In the meantime the sentinel was reloading his musket. He had but one cartridge left. That used, he would be defenceless. He must save it till the last moment.

But there was no time to lose. He raised his musket. Shadowy forms approached him from all sides—greenish lights came flickering towards him—the horrible sounds drew nearer and nearer.

Just as he was about to fire, an indistinct mass detached itself from the dark background of the rampart. It sprang toward him, but missing him, struck the ground in front of him violently, seizing, as it did so, the sleeve of his coat, so that the old skin tore, and a piece of it fell to the ground with the wolf.

At the same time the musket discharged itself upward. The recruit swung it, still smoking, in the air, turned it about, and brought the butt, with all his force, down upon the ground beside him, before the wolf whose mouth was still filled with fragments of wool and skin, could prepare for a new attack. The butt struck something hard, and when Pankratieff lifted the musket, the beast remained motionless. Its backbone was broken.

But in another moment he felt something tugging vehemently at the musket, something which had fastened its greedy fangs in the barrel. The horde of yelping shadows darted at him, the green stars shone on every side—the wolves dug their teeth into his coat—he fell to the ground under their weight, with his face in the snow. The hot, fetid breath of the creatures was all about him—he felt them tugging and tearing at his coat—now it was beginning to give way.

Suddenly a bullet came whistling over the group—a flash lit up the darkness—shot on shot followed—the soldier lay alone. The wolves had receded a few steps, and stood in a semi-circle, growling and showing their teeth in indecision.

But they perceived that it was no single enemy who was approaching—it was a whole troop of armed men—and suddenly all was still. Silently the beasts crept and trotted away through the darkness.

The young recruit lay on the ground motionless. All around him were the fragments of his sheepskin coat; his bent musket lay beside him. He was alive, he breathed, and seemed uninjured. And soon he recovered consciousness, and realized that a detachment of his comrades, who had heard his shots in the guardhouse, had rescued him at the last moment.

They took him under the arms and led him along the moat back to the warm guardroom. Behind him several of the soldiers dragged along the wolves that had been killed—three gaunt, long-legged beasts.

After that the redoubt was deserted.

In an hour the wolves returned. They renewed their howling and snuffed and looked about for a victim. But nothing living stirred round about. They had accomplished one thing—Post No. 5 was not occupied again that night.

TWO WOMEN AND MR. JOHN ALLEN.

I AM a commercial traveller. I have been one for years, and possibly shall remain one to the end of my working days. But do not mistake me; there are grades of commercial travellers as much as in every other profession or business. Take banks, for instance. Once, when I was a youth, I knew a bank clerk. It was Groggs' Bank, and he worked early and late and got very little money. But look at the position he held. Trusted with thousands of pounds! My heart glowed when I spoke to him, and I felt I was the envied of all beholders when I was with him.

Then I met another bank clerk. He was in the Bank of England. Wishing to ingratiate myself with this new friend, I told him of Biggs, in Groggs'.

Now this Bank of England chap was tall and had a cast in one eye, but he brought them both to bear on me as he replied in a tone impossible (in its utter contempt) to reproduce on paper: "Where is Groggs' Bank?"

So you see there are grades as I said before, and by dint of hard work and inherent talent for commerce I may say I was one of the commercial travellers. I was known in all parts of the world. I never stayed anywhere for more than a flying visit. Yet somehow the eccentricities of China, the hurry and bustle of New York, the glitter and daintiness of Paris, and the sombre magnificence of the Californian forests never gave me that utter feeling of restfulness and home as did a ride on the outside of a Hammersmith 'bus in London!

By which remark you will see that I was born a Cockney, and every stone in the dear, dirty old place was worth as much as a Kimberley diamond to me.

I could have ridden in cabs, I could even have kept my carriage, like some of the others did, but somehow I never cared to. A 'bus I loved and a 'bus I would have.

On the particular evening on which my story begins I was on the Hammersmith 'bus smoking a pipe and staring down on the tops of the hats in Piccadilly.

It was just the most perfect evening in May, when London was at its fullest, and I puffed away, well content with all mankind.

Suddenly, I found my pipe wanted refilling, and I hadn't a match!

This did not disturb me much, because there are always smokers on a 'bus, so having filled up I turned to borrow a vesta off a neighbour.

Not a soul was smoking!

I reviled my luck and fingered the pipe lovingly. It was one given me by a friend out at the Cape, and I had a great regard for it.

The only vacant seat was next to me, and presently a young clean shaven man came and sat on it.

He wore his hat at a rakish angle, and, joy! was smoking a cigar.

So I borrowed a match off him, and we struck up an acquaintance. I soon found out he had travelled a bit, but seemed to know more of parts of New Zealand than elsewhere.

Then he told me he was purser on board a P. and O., and spent half his time here, and half at Sydney.

I took a fancy to him as soon as I saw him. There was that healthy, manly, shall I say breezy, way about him that so many sailors have, and he was nice-looking too, with curly hair and open grey eyes that looked you straight in the face with a merry twinkle in them that I liked. Altogether, Jack Allen was a man that anyone would trust on sight, and I would have staked any amount he was one who could neither tell a lie nor do a mean action, which only shows how easily you can be deceived in this world.

I borrowed a match off him and struck up an acquaintance.

We chatted on till we found a mutual friend. There is nothing like a mutual friend. It is true he was only a billiard marker in Boston, but he was a good sort, come down. Anyway, he was a mutual friend, and that was enough. By the time we had found him we had reached Hammersmith, and both got down and on to the Kew tram.

Allen was as full of spirits as a schoolboy, and kept drawing my attention to every pretty woman that passed.

Now, I am perilously near forty, and must confess have not much knowledge of that most complex puzzle—woman.

As a young man I had no time. Some young men will tell you they can get on better when they have a woman to care about, but don't you believe it. They are an enticing, conceited lot, and most expensive. That is for my young men readers. My father gave me this advice, and I took it when I got on a bit. Women folk, somehow, did not take much interest in me, so I got left again; so, as I say, I never had much opportunity of studying them. But, Allen! I don't think a girl passed our 'bus that he did not have a look at her. First this side and then that, till I had to tell him of it.

"I presume you are a bachelor, and that makes you so anxious to look at every face," I said sternly.

He reddened a little under the tan.

"Not I; I'm a married man, with the best and dearest wife any man had. But I always was the same—I love any and every girl I see!"

I felt mildly scandalised.

"What's more, I shall prove it to you, because I am going to take you home with me to-night, and you will meet Mrs. Allen and the baby. She'll be delighted, too, if you will stay to supper."

I stared a minute and then recollection came to my aid.

He was as good as his word, and we alighted at a small house covered with creepers just putting out their new green leaves. In front was a garden, with a large rose-tree in it, a fact which interested me at once. Always devoted to flowers, I hold the rose as the queen of the garden, and it is my firm belief that to graft a wild double cherry on to a white—but, then, I forgot myself for the moment. This is not a treatise on roses. Mrs. Allen opened the door to welcome us, and unaffectedly kissed her husband, while she held the prettiest little baby out of harm's way under her arm.

I own, then, for the first time in my life, I should think, I realised I had lost something, and the mental picture of my comfortless and desolate lodgings came vividly before my eyes.

Mrs. Allen—her name I heard was Mary—was a petite fair woman, with a trustful nature and a sweet pretty face, and one of the loveliest babies I have ever met. Her name was Marjorie, and my heart went out to her at once. Some old bachelors have weaknesses—mine is a pretty baby.

We spent a very happy evening, and I left the Allens' house with regret; but not before I had received an invitation to come again, which I eagerly accepted, and a kiss from Marjorie.

After that I met the Allens many times. Through having no settled home I had many acquaintances, but few friends, and I found the little house at Kew more to my liking than the most gilded saloon bar in the West-End.

Mrs. Allen, too; how kind she was to me. There was nothing that little woman would not do; from mending my gloves to letting me help her transplant the rose tree.

In fact, at length, when Allen's leave was up and he went to rejoin his ship, I found myself, to my great consternation, thinking more of my friend's wife than I considered strictly in accordance with the views of society. The shock was so great to me, that on making the discovery I started at once for Paris, for I knew that there is no fool like an old fool.

From there I drifted onwards, and by degrees the little house at Kew faded from my memory, and was put away among the recollections of the past in the back of my brain somewhere. I had been to Japan, and thence to China, and after several months found myself in sun-baked Sydney. The leaves on the trees of the side walk were glimmering in the blaze of the sun, and unable to bear the glare, I stepped aside into a doorway that was nicely shaded and so looked less roasting than the others.

The door was open and the blinds of the house down. There was a kind of seat in the doorway, and I sat down upon it, too hot to go any further.

Suddenly, from the interior of the house, loomed a familiar figure. I stared a moment, and then recollection came to my aid.

It was Jack Allen!

I grasped his hand effusively, and felt as glad as possible to have met him, but somehow his greeting struck me as not so enthusiastic as I might have liked.

He seemed almost to be annoyed at meeting me.

"Well," I mused, "it is often so—out of sight out of mind."

"I was so hot, old chap, I took refuge on this seat, without a notion as to whose it was. How have you been?" I said, mopping my face.

"Well, very well, thanks. How are you?"

"And how's your wife?" Even then I hesitated over this question. I saw a distinct look of fear come into the man's eyes.

"She is quite well—indoors," he said slowly.

"Your wife here?" I cried. "Well, that is good. I should like to meet her."

"Yes, yes!" he said nervously. "But if you're rested we'll just step over to my office first—over that little business I told you of!"

And he ended his sentence in a loud key, as if for the benefit of someone inside.

"Certainly, certainly!" I replied vaguely, and, putting on my hat, "the sooner the better."

"Yes," said Allen in a low voice, "the sooner the better."

Feeling a mystery was in the air, yet quite unable to find the drift of it, I followed the young fellow down the baking street.

Suddenly he stopped and faced me.

"Can I trust you, Carter?" he said.

"My dear fellow, I am sure you can," I answered.

"Well, it's like this. I never expected to meet you out here, or I might have been prepared for it. But here you are, and I am not the man to cut a friend, no matter what I fear; but my wife, whom you will see when I go home with you, is not the one you met in London!"

I own I was rather dumfounded. With such a wife as Mary, here was this man living——

"Don't mistake me," he said, cutting my meditation short. "I love both women as truly as ever man did. You know I am capable of loving half creation. I love them both, and—Heaven help them!—they love me. I have married them both, and I am true and straight to them. Half my time I spend out here with Helen, half I spend in London with Mary. Two dearer girls never lived on this earth—and hanging is too good for me."

I felt really sorry for the young fellow. He was evidently so distressed.

"What an awful thing to have done!" I said. I could not help it. To think the man I believed as upright as myself was a bigamist!

"Of course, neither knows of the other," I said.

"Neither; each thinks she has my whole heart. I am heavily insured both out here and at home—one policy for her, one for Mary. I have done everything I can, but the life I lead is awful sometimes. Look what I have hanging over my head!"

"Yes, if they found it out they could inform against you."

"That wou'dn't matter. It would come out then that one was my wife and one not. The shock to my wife to find I had been faithless would be bad enough—but Heaven help the one who found she was no wife at all!"

We stood still in the sunshine. I did not know what to say.

"But come back, Carter. Helen will be pleased to see you, and the twins"—here he hesitated, and, I was glad to see, changed colour—"are ripping; you'll like them. But, remember, Helen's and Mary's peace of mind is more to me than my life—so I will trust you."

As much out of curiosity as anything, I went back, and was introduced to Mrs. Allen. She was a tall, slight girl, with a pale, oval face and scarlet lips, and her dark hair parted in the centre and covering her ears.

Novice as I was in woman's looks, I could not help but acknowledge that Allen had remarkable taste, and evidently liked a contrast, as nothing could have been wider apart in appearances than these two wives.

The twins, as he said, were ripping—two strapping boys of three years, with all the manly ways of their erring father and the beauty of their mother.

As I walked home that night I found myself wondering who was the wife and who wasn't, and somehow I hoped she wasn't. My sympathies were with the little girl in England. She had not the spirit of the Australian, and I felt sure the knowledge would kill her, were she ever to find out the truth.

I did not stay long in Sydney, as my business was soon done, so taking a berth in the first ship I arrived in London some time before Allen, whose boat was the next but two after mine.

Instinctively, I was drawn towards Kew. I put it down to my fancy for the Hammersmith Road bar, but in my heart of hearts I knew better.

Mary was pleased to see me, and told me how dull she had been.

"That's the worst of having a husband like Jack. You only see him half the time, the other half he is away goodness knows where, and up to goodness knows what! Not that I don't trust him. My Jack is as true as the day, I know, but really, a friend who knew him out in Sydney said he could easily have a wife out there and I should never know it; and really, Mr. Carter, so he might."

I felt I could break the head of the "friend" who said such a thing, but I only laughed.

I went back and was introduced to Mrs. Allen.

"Yes; and you know what a man he is for pretty girls, don't you?" she added, laughing at the joke, whilst I felt a cold shiver run through me to hear her speak thus.

"Now you've seen him latest, Mr. Carter, how many wives had he got when you saw him?"

"Only about four," I answered easily.

She clapped her hands.

"Wait till he comes back, I'll tell him what you say."

"For goodness' sake don't," I said in consternation. "He might not like it."

"Oh, Jack is the best fellow in the world, he'll think it a great joke. By-the-bye, you haven't seen Marjorie, have you?"

And the rest of the evening passed away very pleasantly.

It must have been a year after this when I received a telegram in Paris from London, which ran:

"Come at once, Mary!"

I read the missive through twice wondering what she, who was scarcely ever out of my thoughts, should send thus urgently for me.

Was Marjorie, my dear little girl as I call her, ill, dead, perhaps! But no, a second idea came into my mind, and came to stay.

She had heard of Helen!

Hastily concluding my business, I came home and drove straight to the little house at Kew.

The blinds were up, and inside, the gas, unprotected by any globe, flared in the evening breeze. Straw and paper littered the garden path, and a large van stood at the door. The house was open and I stepped in. Ready dressed, with her veil turned up over her little black bonnet, stood a ghost of my pretty Mary. Her face was white, and great rings surrounded her sweet grey eyes, that were filled even now with tears.

I came forward and took her hands in mine.

"Poor child," I said, seeing how broken she was.

"Mary," I said, taking her hands in mine, "will you trust me?"

"You know?" she asked, looking pitifully round.

"I guessed what it was."

"Have you known all this time?"

"Partly, not all."

"Oh, good Heaven, to think all these years I have never been his wife!"

"You have never been his wife?" I said, starting forward.

She shook her head most sadly.

"No, he married—her—first, and then met me. Oh, my poor Jack, and how I love you still!"

"Where are you going?" I asked, unable to say more on so painful a subject.

"I am going to stay with my sister for a while—goodness knows what will become of me afterwards. Look at me. Worse than that—look at Marjorie!"

I own I thought the future very dark for the poor girl.

"Mary," I said taking her hands in mine once more. "Will you trust me—I will be a good husband to you for ever and ever—I know I am no girl's fancy and am not much to look at, but I love you dearly, Mary."

She was silent a moment. Then she said:

"I couldn't—oh, I couldn't—I love him so much, I could never love anyone else in this world."

"I do not ask it," I said. "Marry me and I will make you a good husband. I know you can't love me. I am not worth loving. But you like me and I love you, and Marjorie shall be my little girl."

* * * * *

"And a better husband no girl ever had—and I certainly never deserved——"

Mary has just written this and insists on my leaving it in—so I have done so. You can judge for yourself if you know us.

A NIGHT OF DREAD.

AN INCIDENT OF A TOUR THROUGH CORSICA.

DOWN a long stony valley in the Corsican mountains two men were riding bicycles. They were Americans and were "doing Europe." Among other things, they had thought a bicycling tour in Corsica the correct thing to do; but half way through they very much wished they had not undertaken it. At the large towns of Ajaccio, Bastia and Corte they could get very good food and accommodation but the country inns were simply impossible, and ought not to have been called inns at all. Some black bread and a skinny chicken, killed while they waited, was their usual fare; no butter, no milk, no meat.

"What on earth do they live on themselves?" said Adolphus E. Ward to his friend, "they look healthy enough, too."

"Oh, stuff made of pounded chestnuts, I believe," said Henry Cardew, who was short and fat, "let's try it."

So they did, but soon repented, the chestnut polenta required an apprenticed taste. Down the stony ravines of the mountains, the principal roads were fairly good, they put up woodcock in several places and much regretted the guns they had left at Nice. Once a savage looking old boar charged across the road just in front of them, and disappeared among the maquis and arbutus bushes on the left. In the early mornings the wild myrtle of the maquis scented the air and attracted clouds of birds, who grew fat on the berries. They had a chart of all the cycleable roads in Corsica, and the stopping-places possible to sleep in, clearly marked, so there was no danger of losing their way.

It was December, the best month for an expedition of this kind. They had first crossed over from Nice to Ajaccio; it had been a very stormy night and for several hours the little steamer had to lay to, in case the force required to breast the waves should break her single screw. Henry Cardew had been very sea-sick indeed, and the French third class passengers of which there had been a great many on board, had howled and shrieked as if their last hour had surely come, and so no doubt they thought it had.

However, a few hours later than their advertised time they sighted the jagged edges of the Iles Sanguinaires, and after rounding them the rough water was left behind and they steamed up the lovely Bay of Ajaccio in comparatively smooth water. Then they just stayed two days in Ajaccio to recover their internal balance and also to enjoy the good living and comfort of the Continental Hotel. Then they started along the good road that crosses the Island to Bastia, and found it very hard work, for quite half way, it is a continued ascent, up to the snow line near Vizzavona. After that the road slopes easily down again to the Plains. The afternoon we saw the two bicyclists was a dull grey one worthy of England and her fogs and mist; no sign was to be seen of the brilliant sunshine of the Mediterranean islands, all was dull stone colour. They stopped at mid-day to eat the lunch packed in their knapsacks, and drink the whisky in their flasks.

"By Jove, I'm tired," said Cardew to his friend, "I don't know how it is, but you long skinny fellows can take much more exercise without getting so done up as fellows like me."

"Train a bit," said Adolphus, peaceably. "You're a long way too fat, my dear boy. By the way, just take out the map and see how much farther we've got to go to-day."

Harry Cardew took out the map and studied it carefully.

"There's a little place called Cuchilla only four miles off," he said at last, "and it has a house that calls itself a hotel, I see."

"Oh, they all do that out here," said Adolphus, "that doesn't count for much. Still, if it's marked on that chart at all, it must be fit to sleep in. I'm feeling rather tired, too, and I propose we go no farther than Cuchilla to-day, and put up there for the night."

Harry Cardew agreed, but as they had so short a way to go, they dawdled about where they were for some time longer and it was getting dark before they mounted their bicycles and went down the steep valley to Cuchilla.

"There are rather a rough lot of people in some of these out of the way Corsican places, you know," said Adolphus E. Ward, "a man in a shop at Ajaccio told me the brigands were by no means extinct in the country places."

"Well, we can't help it if the place is stuffed with them," said Harry Cardew stolidly, "brigands or no brigands, I don't go a yard further to-night if I know it. I'm thoroughly beat."

Just then two or three scattered houses came in sight; on a signboard on the right Bureau de Poste was written up, outside a kind of shed, and across the road was a house of three storeys high.

"This must be Cuchilla," said Harry Cardew, "look, there's a board of some kind over the door only it's so dirty, one can't read what's written on it."

They got off their bicycles before the entrance, unnoticed by anything but two pigs who were grubbing about, close to the step, and some goats and chickens, who evidently lived in the rooms on the ground floor.

"So do the pigs, I suppose," said Harry Cardew meditatively.

Digitized by Google

"Pigs do what?" said his friend, who was unstrapping his tool bag from the back of his seat.

"I say I suppose the pigs live in the hotel too," said Harry Cardew, disgustedly, "and the goats and the fowls."

"Of course they do," said his friend briskly, "good sign, if there are fowls there must be eggs about. Bang the door, there's a good chap.'

Harry Cardew obediently banged the door, but without getting any answer, then, as on looking in, they saw nothing but a stone cellar and a staircase leading up to the floor above, they left their bicycles below and ascended it. On the first floor they heard a sound of voices, so they again knocked at one of the doors. This time an old woman appeared and made signs to them to come into the kitchen, where there was a table in front of a large wood fire, with bottles of red country wine on it and several rough looking men sitting round.

One man came forward, evidently the proprietor of the inn, who could speak something more like French than the usual Corsican patois, and after some feeble remarks in bad French, the Americans made him understand they wanted supper and two beds for the night and a place in which to stand their machines. This last request evidently puzzled their host very much, so they went downstairs with him and brought up the bicycles to the first floor, where he put them in a little parlour off the kitchen. Then he took the two young men up another flight of stairs to a poor looking attic with two beds.

"All right," said Harry Cardew, "this must do whether we like it or not, and now ask him if he can get us something fit to eat."

Adolphus was the spokesman always and he rather enjoyed showing off his superior French, which, as a matter of fact, was very feeble indeed. He asked for water to wash their hands in before dinner, a request which the man evidently thought very unreasonable. However after a long interval of waiting, he re-appeared with a broken lipped jug of water and one very small basin, but no towel.

"However one can't expect too much at one go," Harry Cardew remarked as he dried his hands on his pocket handkerchief.

Then they went downstairs again to the kitchen and were offered very hard black bread and some stewed meat, off what animal it was impossible to determine.

"I should say a hard worked donkey," said Adolphus E. Ward, pensively, as he vainly tried to saw bits off the steak.

"I think it's goat myself," said Harry Cardew, "and died of some disease probably, I shall keep to the bread and cheese. The cheese isn't half bad, it's like the red American sort at home."

Being young and hungry they made a fairly good meal off the food set before them; the other men looked on sullenly and left soon after they came in, one by one.

"I don't much like the look of our host, do you, Harry?" said Adolphus, in a low tone.

"Not particularly," said the youth, calmly, "but what's the odds? We have two beds and we leave here tomorrow morning. Come let's go to bed now, I'm jolly tired."

So they picked up the oil lamp from the table and wishing their host a civil good-night, to which he responded only by a grunt, they went upstairs. There was no fastening to their door, so they moved one of the bedsteads against it, undressed and went to bed, and were soon fast asleep. The night went on, as nights usually do.

Adolphus E. Ward was a light sleeper and he suddenly woke up with the acute feeling we all have had sometimes, that someone was near. Creak, creak, stealthily some footsteps were creeping up the stairs. By stretching out one long leg, he was able to kick his companion in the face, an attention by no means appreciated and which occasioned some low toned remarks, unfit for publication. But just then Harry Cardew also heard the creaking footsteps, and they both sat up and seized their boots, their only weapons of defence. The steps stopped outside their door.

"One at least must be killed," said a whisper, in a man's gruff voice, carefully subdued.

"It is a pity," said in French, another person, a woman, "but yes, it is necessary."

"Which say you, the long and thin one, or the little fat?"

"The long and thin," was the answer, "he will give the greater profit."

"I say the little fat," said again the woman's whisper.

("Blood hirsty brute," muttered Harry Cardew.)

"But why not both," said the man, "it is easy, they are both asleep, one screw of the neck and it is finished."

"Ah, Joseph," sighed the woman, "it is murder, but yes, I will do it—softly, they stir."

Then the steps crept away from the door. Adolphus E. Ward and Harry Cardew sat on their beds, boots in hand, awaiting the murderous attack, from what side they knew not, perhaps the wall on one side was hollow, perhaps there was a hidden door, who could tell? So they sat there waiting till the faint blue-bell tints of morning crept up the Eastern sky. Still they did not dare to sleep, perhaps from a hole in the wall their enemies were watching for their opportunity.

Yet nothing happened. At eight o'clock they put their boots on their feet and boldly walked down the stairs. The proprietor's wife, a young woman they had not seen the night before, came forward, and smilingly said breakfast would soon be ready.

"Look out for poison" said Harry Cardew gloomily, "it was her whispering last night."

They waited in the little parlour off the kitchen. The sun shone, the pigs squeaked cheerfully outside. Soon the proprietress came in, bearing in triumph on a dish on which reposed the skinny carcase of an ancient fowl.

"There, messieurs," she said proudly, "is he not fine? My husband would have killed rather the young one, but there is more flavour in this. Last night we discussed the matter at length before deciding he must be slaughtered. Ah, my dear friend Coco," she added affectionately, "never shall I hear you cackle again."

Ward and Cardew looked at each other rather shamefacedly and then burst out laughing.

"You killed him in the night, Madame?" said Adolphus.

"But yes," she sighed, "he slept in the loft near your room, poor cherished one, he slept, and with one screw of the neck his life was gone. We feared to disturb messieurs, but no doubt, fatigued, you slept well."

"Oh, yes, thanks, we slept very well indeed," said Harry Cardew hastily. "I say Adolphus Ward, you are a flat."

But Adolphus E. Ward made no answer, he was masticating the defunct Coco. SADI GRANT.

Briton or Boer?

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

INTRODUCTION.

For years past Britain and the Transvaal have been spoiling for a fight, and it was left to that well-known author, Mr. George Griffith, to write this strong and exciting serial nearly four years ago graphically describing a huge war between the two countries.

The story, coming so soon after the Jameson Raid, was read with unusual interest.

Now that Briton and Boer are in deadly conflict it will be interesting to read the story, and see how far the imagination of the author has actually come true.

SUMMARY OF OPENING CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.—The scene opens on the Rand. It is the eve of Amajuba day, and a State ball is being given. To this comes Prince Paul Rexna, a Polish nobleman, and his daughter, Princess Vavara. They are introduced to Dr. Leyds.

CHAPTER II.—Dr. Leyds returns to Pretoria to attend a midnight consultation at the Government buildings. The Prince's rooms are in the Grand Hotel opposite. By tapping the wires, which cross the street at this point, the Prince and his daughter overhear all that goes on, and telegraph the result by secret code to Europe.

CHAPTERS III. AND IV.—Amajuba day dawns. The Secretary accompanies the Prince and Princess to Krugersdorp where, from the base of the Monument of Independence, the President makes a great proclamation. The Convention of London is abrogated, the absolute independence of the South African Republic is declared; the President unfurls a Union Jack and rends it to pieces. So the storm bursts!

CHAPTERS V. AND VI.—On the following day Major-General Carrington learns at Buluwayo that all the wires have been cut between Rhodesia and the south and east. He concludes that this is due to Boer hostility, and prepares to meet it. Meanwhile a powerful British squadron appears unexpectedly in Delagoa Bay, and Lieutenant Ferris is sent ashore to take possession of the telegraph station.

CHAPTERS VII. AND VIII.—A Russian squadron is in the Bay at the same time. The flagship Navarin fires on the British destroyer Thrasher. Admiral Dale takes this as an act of war. There is a battle and the Russian squadron is defeated and captured. Michael Ostroff seeks to escape in the Sokol. He is taken prisoner, and important dispatches are found in his possession. Admiral Dale calls a council of war.

CHAPTER IX.

ROUNDING UP THE REBELS.

"Bust me, Jack, if old Fighting Fred hasn't got the niggers this time! Lawd love us, did you see that shell? plumb centre in the middle of the impy! Good old B Battery! That's the place to put 'em. Let her go! There's another on the left horn, and another, and another. Gawd, 'ow they serve those guns! Hope the beggars don't do a guy before we can get a chance at 'em."

"Shut up, you blighted idiot! If your eyes were as wide open as your mouth is you'd see the vermin crawling round the shoulder of that kopje. Look! Up yonder to the left! Ah! Got him in once. Take the next, Ned; see what they mean? They want to get behind us. Good! The other chaps 've got on to them. Steady and straight, lads, and we'll show them how to turn the flank of the 'K' boys. Put yer head down, Mike, you bally idiot; what were rocks made for? Lawd he's got it! I'll bet my old barker to a peashooter no kaffir ever fired that shot. There, take that and go home you blacked-up Dutchman."

"Well shot, Jacky boy! Six hundred yards if it was an inch! Those bally Boers won't have much to teach us in the shooting line when we do meet 'em. That chap never kicked before he dropped. Ah! Good again! See the rock fly! That shell was as good as six, and that's what the Boers 'll find out when they get lying down beyond the stones and thinking that we're going to run up to them and get shot down like sheep, like those poor chaps at Laing's Nek did. Seven pounder melinites at four thousand yards is what they want, and by the Great Scoop, they'll get 'em."

"Hope so, sure, Ned. There'll be more sport in it, anyhow, than this nigger-hunting, and it's coming soon, too, for this game won't last much longer. Freddy's got 'em this time. They never thought they were going to get anything like this rush through the mountains and bein' jammed up in a mantrap like this. Good old screw-guns! That's the way. See 'em scatter down the kopje with the rocks after 'em. I thought so! Right down to the veld! Let 'em go! Sharpshooting made easy! Hooray! There goes the bugle! Put on the toasting-forks. Bullet and bayonet is the word now, Ned. Down we go!"

The foregoing conversation took place seven days after the news of the cutting of the wires had come to Buluwayo, between Troopers John Hinton and Edward Dempsey of Macfarlane's "K" troop of horse as they lay side by side behind a sheltering ridge of stones on the slope of a hill a little to the north of the Nuanetzi river down towards the angle where the river and the old Pioneer Road join at Nuanetzi township.

The hills here meet in a somewhat sharp curve, and about midway between the two ranges there is a kopje, or isolated hill, which Sir Frederick Carrington, or "Fighting Freddy," as his men affectionately termed him when out of ear-shot, had purposely left unoccupied, when, after six days hard marching and skirmishing, he had hunted the Matabele and their Mashona allies out of their retreats in the Matoppo hills and driven them down, mile by mile, into the cul de sac between the Nuanetzi and the Lundi which he intended to be the final scene of the war so far as the rebel kaffirs were concerned.

He had left one road, and one only, open—that which led through a chain of hills that ran from north-east to south-west across the plain. They had passed through this by night unmolested and confident of forcing their way over the Pioneer Road and into the wild Amaduna country beyond, but when morning dawned they found the hills lined with sharpshooters and every outlet guarded by the terrible little "loud-speakers" and the long "big-talkers," and it was just after sunrise on this particular morning that Troopers Hinton and Dempsey exchanged sentiments to the accompaniment of the cracking of rifles, the "spatspat" of the bullets on the stones, and the bang and whistle and crash of the shell-fire, about half-an-hour after "the circus had opened," as Trooper Dempsey put it.

The Matabele, seeing themselves surrounded, had instinctively fallen back into their old formation, and were preparing to rush the hills to the eastward, feeling that there, and there alone, lay their only chance of escape. There were between ten and twelve thousand of them, and as the bugle rang out they had formed up under the shelter of the isolated kopje, and were swinging out in their crescent-shaped formation round the shoulder of the hill, fairly well covered by the brushwood.

The last notes had scarcely died away when every man of the "K" troop had loosed the knee-halter of his horse and was picking his way down through the stones, with the bridle on his left arm and his rifle lying across it, ready for instant use. Across the valley they could see other men and horses picking their way down, and stopping every now and then, as they did, to take a chance shot at a black shape crawling among the rocks, or to reply in kind to a bullet that came singing out of a cloud of smoke behind a stone.

Then when they reached practicable ground the halt was called, and every man stood by his horse ready to shoot or ride as the order might come. Meanwhile, the long brown crescent of the Matabele warriors, alive with plumes and waving spears, and guns and shields, was swinging round the base of the kopje to the left, and flowing in a torrent of desperate valour towards the slopes of the eastern hills, and to the right of the kopje another line, some twelve or fifteen hundred strong, was moving up the valley to intercept the threatened charge of the troopers.

"It'll be half-a-dozen volleys and up an' at 'em, Ned, you see."

"Yes, bayonet and pepper-box against assegai and shield, and pretty warm work it'll be, too, when we get to close quarters, for those black devils mean do or die this time, seeing it's get through or kingdom come for them—if they have a kingdom come."

"That's it, Jack. Here comes Mac. Thought so! Six volleys and shoot low, then mount and at 'em. Good-bye, Jacky boy, if I don't see you again. Remember me at home if you get there and I don't. This is going to be a blazing hot half-hour."

"By-bye, Ned, and do the same for me if I get an assegai between the ribs and you don't. O reservoir, old man! Now then, let her go and shoot straight, and don't aim at the same nigger as me. We've no lead to waste."

The two chums shook hands.

The two chums shook hands, as many another pair of good chums did about the same time, for, as Trooper Hinton had remarked, the next half-hour or so bade fair to be blazing hot. The Matabele outnumbered them some six to one, and were coming on as though they meant business. When they were about twelve hundred yards away the long rifle-barrels dropped across the saddles, and the fire and smoke began to spurt from the muzzles up and down the line across the valley.

At the first discharge the Matabeles stopped, and about a fourth of them threw themselves upon the ground, and flashes of flame jumped up from among the grass, and bullets came singing and hissing over the troopers' heads. Then they sprang up and made another rush forward, ann again the rifles spoke—this time with better effect thad before, for some of those who lay down didn't get up again.

The bayonets drove through the tough shields.

Then for four more rounds it was load and fire as fast as aim could be taken, then, almost as one man, troops "K," "G," and "F," swung up into the saddle, the bugle sang out its message, and, with revolver in the left hand and bayoneted rifle in the right, they raced away in a long, close line on to the solid advancing mass of the Matabele.

They were met with wonderful coolness and steadiness — a coolness and steadiness which betokened something better than native drill and discipline. The three or four hundred who were armed with rifles ran out in front of the line, dropped to the ground when they were about three hundred yards off, and let go a volley that emptied a score of saddles and wounded twice as many horses. Then the rest charged forward over the prostrate bodies, swinging their spears and waving their shields.

At twenty yards the spears began to fly and the revolvers to crack, and then footmen closed with horsemen; the short, heavy-headed stabbing assegai clove its way into the breasts and flanks of the rearing, screaming horses, and the weighted bayonets drove down through the tough shields, and through bone and muscle behind them. The dusky braves clutched at bridle and mane and ears, and by sheer weight and strength dragged many a horse to its knees and rolled many a rider on the grass never to get up again.

But at last the deadly six-shooters and the swift-stabbing bayonets did their work, and the troopers began to forge ahead. Little more than three-fourths of their number got clear on the other side of the dusky line, but they re-formed in an instant, loaded their rifles, poured a point blank volley from the saddle into the broken-up masses of the Matabele, and then charged in again, this time riding clear through them.

Then to their rear from the eastward there came the sharp thudding roar of the Maxims, the dull banging of the seven-pounders and the shrill crash of the bursting shells. At the familiar but dreaded sound the Matabele wavered for a moment, and then broke and run, only to be ridden down and bayoneted and shot by the now infuriated troopers. But the maxim bullets and the shells were not for them. The main impi had by this time reached the foot of the eastern hill-slope and was making a gallant but useless stand against the storm of fire and hail of lead that was raining down upon them.

"Halt, lads, and see to the wounded for a bit. You'll not be wanted yet," Captain Macfarlane shouted as he rode along the straggling line of panting horses and powder-blackened, blood-bespattered men. "Let the Maxims get their work in, and then we'll take them in the rear."

Then the line broke up, and men went to look for dead and wounded chums and comrades, and do what they could for those who could still be helped. Dead horses were pulled off the crushed limbs of wounded men; others, kicking and writhing on the ground, got a revolver bullet under the ear to end their misery; limp, blood-stained forms were lifted tenderly by strong, gentle hands, and carried away to the shade; water-bottles were unslung, and flasks came out, and presently field-surgeons came galloping up with splints and bandages, and so the work of healing and friendship went on to the strange accompaniment of the grim music of death until the roar of the guns began to slacken.

Then the bugle sounded again, rifles and revolvers were loaded, and every man who could ride got back into the saddle, the line was re-formed, and with a last glance backwards at the dead and wounded, the troopers trotted down the valley and round the left shoulder of the kopje. As they rounded it a frightful scene came into view. Of the eight or ten thousand Matabele who had made up the impi that had charged the fatal slopes, scarcely half were left alive, the rest lay scattered about, bullet-riddled and shell-mangled on the bloody grass, amidst the splintered trees and brushwood. Those left alive were making for the kopje at the top of their speed, as the General had intended they should before the battle began.

Suddenly the firing stopped altogether, the bugles sang out again, and a long straggling line of nearly twelve hundred horsemen, composed of companies of Mounted Infantry, Hussars, Lancers, Cape Mounted Rifles, Cape Boys, and the Rhodesia Horse—which, true to time, Sir Richard Martin had brought down from Salisbury by the Victoria road—rode out of the trees amidst which the Maxims and seven-pounders had been planted, and, forming up into their respective squads, charged with lance and bayonet and revolver into the midst of the flying Matabele.

Trooper Hinton nursing a leg that had an assegai driven into it.

At the same moment troops "K," "G," and "F" swung round their flank, cutting off their way of escape to the plain.

Some turned and died in a fashion well worthy the blood of the old Amazulu, stabbing and clubbing and dragging men from their horses, and bringing their kerries down on their heads with the last effort of their lives; but most of them ran for the shelter of the trees on the kopje as fast as their legs would carry them, flinging their arms and shields away as they went.

At the foot of the kopje the pursuit stopped, for even "Fighting Freddy" had no heart to shed more blood than was necessary; so the bugle sounded the halt, and the different companies were divided into squads and picketed within sight of each other all round the hill, and the Maxims were brought down and posted so as to sweep all its lower slopes. Lastly, the mountain batteries that had been brought with infinite labour from Buluwayo were run out and placed in conspicuous positions as a gentle hint to the Matabele that, unless they surrendered pretty promptly, means might be taken to persuade them.

"I hope these black beggars 'll see things in a reasonable and natural way," said Trooper Dempsey to his chum about midday, when all the arrangements had been made, and they had finished comparing casualties. "We don't want to stop here a week, you know. Those ain't the chaps we've got to fight. It's them 'airy-faced, unwashed, biltong-chewin' sons of guns down yonder, and every hour we're kept here the stronger they'll be gettin' on the frontier, bust 'em!"

"Yes, that's so, old man," replied Trooper Hinton, tenderly nursing a leg that had had an assegai driven about three inches into it. "Our work ain't here now; it's down yonder, and thundering hard work it's going to be, you believe me."

"You can bet your ugly face on that! Give us a fill and pass your flask; mine's empty."

CHAPTER X.

A Black Dutchman.

The afternoon passed away without any further incident than the ordinary operations of camp life under the given conditions. The dead were buried in the valley with all due honours, the wounded were cared for in the field hospital that had been promptly established. Men with lighter hurts got them made comfortable, weapons were cleaned, artillery overhauled, camp kitchens made ready, and all due preparations made for a "blooming picnic," as Private James Anson, of the 17th Lancers, better known as "Jumping Jimmy," from his extraordinary activity, tersely put it.

His right fist shot out from the shoulder.

But if it was a picnic to the men, it was anything but that to the officers. On the contrary, it was a most anxious time, for during the six days' campaign rumours had kept flying up from the South with that marvellous rapidity of transmission which is characteristic of all higher savage races, and all these were substantially to the same effect—white men armed with long guns and dragging "little loud-speakers" and "big-talkers" with them were coming up from the south and taking possession of the drifts, or river-fords, occupying the most difficult parts of the road, and, worse than all, creeping up on Puri and towards the Mangwe Pass.

There could be no doubt now who they were, for they could be none other than the Boers; but there all certainty ended.

Had there been a formal declaration of war, or were the Boers doing as they did at Bronkhurst Spruit in 1881, when they murdered sixty-nine, and severely wounded eighty-three, unarmed men of the 94th regiment as they were marching into Pretoria with unloaded rifles and ammunition screwed up in the boxes on the waggons?

Was the Imperial Government alive to the situation, and sending troops from England and India, or would it wait for another Laing's Nek and Amajuba before the Empire put forth its strength? Or had the secret treaty with Germany which Dr. Leyds had brought back with him from Berlin, when he went to have his throat seen to, come into effect, and, if so, was England so far embroiled in complications at home that she could send no adequate aid to the loyalists of South Africa?

They woke up Trooper Hinton.

These were the questions which, with many a one like them, were anxiously debated by the leaders of the little force on the Nuanetzi as they lay round the kopje waiting for the rebels to surrender. It was true that matters might have been hastened by shelling the woods and rocks, but in view of the work that was to be done, there was no ammunition to spare for this. The impi might have been turned out at the point of the bayonet, but then honourable members would have got up in the House of Commons and asked spitefully humanitarian questions about butchery of unarmed natives, quite regardless of the fact that these gentle savages had been amusing themselves for months past with the looting and burning of stores and homesteads and the torture and butchery of men, women, and children.

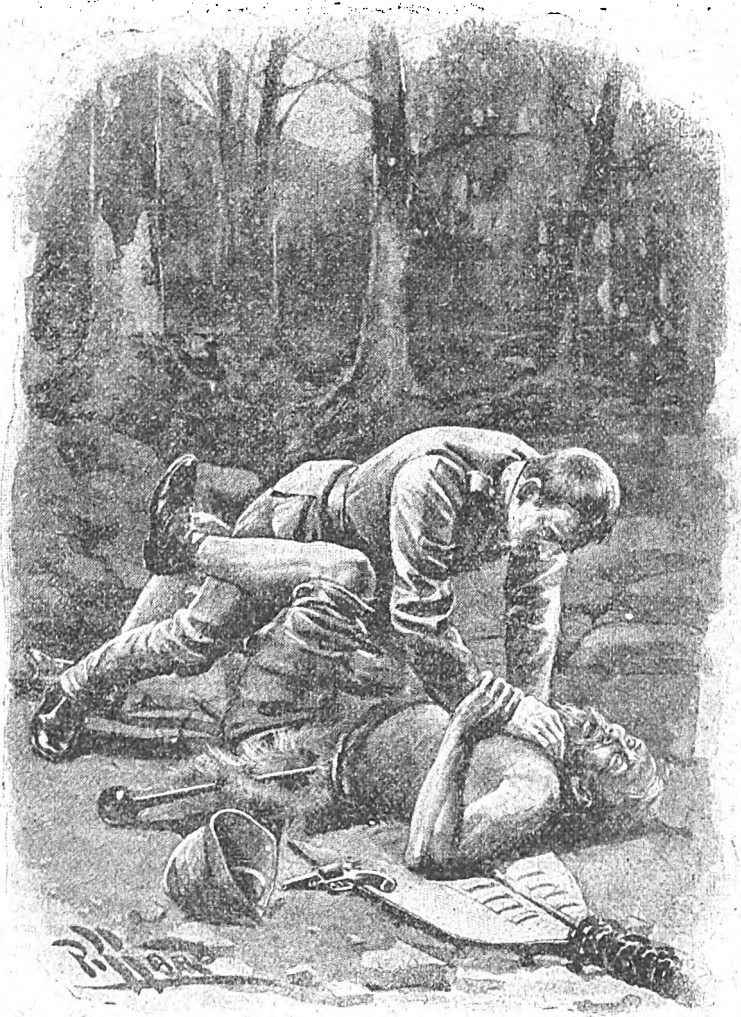
Added to this there was another reason why General Carrington desired a general and unconditional surrender in preference to turning the rebels out by force, and this reason was made apparent later on, in somewhat unexpected fashion, through the agency of our two friends, Ned Dempsey, of the "K" troop, and Private James Anson, of the Lancers.

These two, as it happened, were Cockneys to the soles of their boots, and, more than that, old acquaintances in their unregenerate days before they exchanged the wilds of the Mile End Road for the wilderness of South Africa.

"K" troop was stationed next to the Lancers, and "Jumping Jimmy" had accepted an invitation to supper. At nightfall the sentries were doubled, and a ring of great fires blazed all round the kopje. Between these the sentries walked to and fro, but in consequence of the smallness of the force and the great extent of the circle to be guarded the sentries were somewhat few and far between considering the bush craft and cunning of those they had to confine to the hill.

It was a clear moonless night, and Trooper Dempsey and Private Anson, having tucked up Trooper Hinton and his game leg for the night, went out for a stroll and a last pipe behind the lines before turning in for the night, as their sentry-go wouldn't come round till sunrise. Their troops were stationed on the south side of the kopje, and about a mile away to the southward was a low range of sparsely-wooded hills, on the other side of which flowed the Nuanetzi.

They were strolling towards these hills deeply engrossed in such talk as a couple of thorough-bred Cockneys might be expected to indulge in under such circumstances, and their thoughts were far away in the "little village"—in fact they were both standing, in the spirit, at the bar of an East-end hostelry well known to both—when Trooper Dempsey, whether from long habit of watchfulness, bred of much campaigning in the wilderness, or by some idle, unaccountable impulse, happened to turn his head round.



Trooper Dempsey had jumped on to his man and was choking him.

The next instant a muttered oath in the pungent vernacular of the Mile End Road broke from his lips, his right fist shot out from his shoulder and landed snugly under the chin of a tall Kaffir who had risen like a ghost from the grass, and was in the act of bringing his knob-kerrie down on Private Anson's forage cap, which he was wearing in the cool of the night instead of his helmet.

The Kaffir's teeth clashed together, his head went back, and he tumbled over sideways with a dislocated jaw.

At the same moment Private Anson whipped his revolver out and wheeled round just in time to cover another black, half-naked figure that had risen to its knees and was pointing a heavy Colt six-shooter at Trooper Dempsey. The Lancer's revolver cracked first, and the figure rolled backwards, sending a bullet into the air as it went.

Meanwhile Trooper Dempsey had jumped on to his man, and was choking him, quietly but firmly, into insensibility, and in a few seconds more Private Anson was kneeling on the stomach of the man he had shot, as he soon discovered, clean through the right shoulder. He was groaning and writhing with the pain of his wound and the unpleasant pressure of a pair of bony knees on his midriff, and, not a little to his surprise, the Lancer heard the word "Allemagtij!" come, half-spoken and half-groaned, through his clenched teeth. He let out a little low whistle of surprise, and then he said:

"Have you settled that josser, matey?"

"'Alf a tick, Jimmy, and I'll have the belt round his elbows and a puttie round his legs, and then I'm with you. What's up? Did you kill that nigger with the shooter?"

"Nigger be sugared! This ain't no blooming nigger, unless they've been learning lately to cuss as well as shoot in Dutch, and he ain't dead, neither, though I've got him fair through the right shoulder. Lie down, bust you, or I'll save you the rope to-morrow and throttle you right away. Here, let's see what colour the Lawd made yer."

Private Anson possessed a good deal more of the bulldog courage of the British Tommy than he did of refinement in the use of ways and means, so he just spat in his hand and rubbed it hard on the cheek of his captive. When he took it away there was a broad, dirty grey streak down the side of the man's face.

"Come here, Ned, and look at this," he said in a voice a little husky with excitement. "If you and me doesn't get a stripe apiece for this night's work, there ain't no justice in the British Army. I know'd this wurn't no nigger. He's a blooming Dutch spy, that's what he is—one of them bally Dutchmen wot's been teaching the kaffirs to shoot straight, and giving them Lee-Metfords and cartridges. Strike a match, and let's have a good look at him."

"'Strewth, matey, but you're right," Trooper Dempsey half whispered as he held the flickering light of the wax match over the face of the prostrate man, who had now opened his eyes, and was rolling them from one to the other. "He's no more a Kaffir than I am. I wonder what his little lay was?"

"His little lay?" echoed Private Anson, with a tinge of scorn in his voice. "Here, take my putties off and tie him up while I hold him down, and, I'll tell yer. Can't yer see?" he went on as Trooper Dempsey began to unroll the long strips of cloth which encased his nether limbs from the knee down. "He's managed to sneak through the line somehow with this Kaffir, and the Kaffir, knowing the country better nor you know your prayers, 'ud have took him across the river and guided him as straight as a bee line, as the Yanks say, to where them pals of his is on the frontier, and he'd have given the whole show away if he'd once 'ave got there.

"Yer see this is what the General was waiting for. We could have chucked the niggers out of the kopje right enough, but he knowed there was Dutchmen among 'em, so he wanted to cop the whole kit of 'em and catch the Dutchmen corpus delicty, as I heard a lawyer sa once about a burglar as the coppers had nailed 'alf in and 'alf out of a kitchen window."

"Well, strike me pink!" exclaimed Trooper Dempsey, as the truth d wned upon him. "I should never have tumbled to that in a blue moon. Why, if these chaps had got clear away, they'd have brought the Dutchmen up in no time on them quick-stepping, scraggy little 'orses of theirs, and they'd have caught us here in this valley like a regular man-trap, while we was picnicing round this blooming kopje, waiting for the niggers to come out.

"There y'are. Now he's 'elpless as a 'obbled hostrich, and there's the chaps coming from camp at last to see what the row's about. Come on, mateys," he shouted to a dozen dark forms that were hurrying through the long grass and stumpey bushes towards them. "Come on; you don't want yer guns. We've got a half-dead nigger with a broken jaw and a black Dutchman with a bullet in him for you to carry back. Some thick-eyed idiot as thought he was a sentry let 'em through from the kopje. Gawd help him if Freddy spots him; but, 'strewth, won't the General be glad to see this chap!"

Trooper Dempsey never came nearer to the unadulterated truth than he did when he made this last remark. The General was pleased when he carried and the sham Kaffirs were on crossed rifles into camp, and the adventure was reported to him. He was so pleased that he confined himself to a bare three minutes of expletives with reference to the sentry who had let them through; then he ordered half the troops to patrol the whole circuit of the kopje for three hours, and then to be relieved by the other half until daylight, when he intended to take sharp and decisive measures to end a situation which the exploit of Trooper Dempsey and Private Anson had proved to be of a very serious character indeed.

The Kaffir-Dutchman he sent away at once to be washed and have his wound attended to, directing him to be brought before him at daybreak the next morning. He paid the two heroes of the exploit a brief but meaning compliment on their luck and the promptness with which they had turned it to account, and sent them off to turn in before their sentry-go came round, instead of which they went and woke up Trooper Hinton, and promptly set him swearing with envy by glowing and much-debated accounts of how the whole thing happened, for, of course, by this time each had naturally got his own version of the adventure, and the more they thrashed out the details, and the more pipes they filled and emptied and the more of the readily-offered flasks they pulled at, the more widely did the two versions differ from each other, until at length the one adventure had become two, and the heroes of it were scarcely on speaking terms.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE WAR.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of H. B. Vogel's "Maori Maid," to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. A. Hutton, of 3 Lanage Street, Bradford. Attempts for this week's prize should deal with WAR ANECDOTES and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 19th. Post-cards only, please.

A Scotch Reservist.

SCENE: Suburban train up north. Two passengers discussing South African situation.

First Passenger: "Man alive, ye hae nae patriotism aboot ye ava, or ye widna talk in that strain!"

Second Passenger (pro-Boer): "You see, sir, not being a soldier, I am not forced to be patriotic. Many of our Reserves are not patriotic, either, but have to appear to be."

First Passenger: "G'wa wi' ye, ye're haverin'! Only the ither day I heard o' a Reserve man laid up for repairs wha had tae be strappit down while a bloke in the street persisted in soondin' a bugle!"

Answered.

NOT long ago a venerable Pat landed for the first time on Chinese soil. Soon he was surrounded by natives, who began to chatter a broken sort of English.

Pat, who was quick-tempered, was not long before he aimed at one of them with a dish which he seized from a shop close by.

A Chinaman's face was badly cut, and Pat was soon brought before the English Consul.

"Why have you done this?" demanded the Consul, to which Pat replied:

"Och! sure the ugly haythens spake broken English, so I gave them broken china in return."

Lucky for the Officer.

AN officer went into a barber's shop the other day for a shave. The barber had just gone out, and the boy, expecting him back soon, had lathered the officer; but as the minutes went by and he did not return, the officer grew impatient, and asked the lad if he could shave him.

"I'll try," was the cautious reply.

Whereupon the officer, thinking to frighten the lad, drew his sword and laid it before him, saying sternly:

"Well, try; but if you cut me, I shall cut off your head."

The boy went over it carefully, and finished without mishap.

The officer, after examining his face in the glass, turned to the lad, and said:

"Well, my lad, and weren't you frightened?"

"No," was the reply; "I meant having first go. If I had cut you, I should have cut you properly."

Prophetic.

SOME years ago a gentleman in Liverpool, who had the misfortune to lose his nose, was followed by an Irish beggarwoman, who kept exclaiming, "Heaven preserve your honour's eyesight!"

The gentleman was at last irritated by her importunity, and said, "Why do you wish my eyesight to be preserved? Nothing ails my eyesight, nor is likely to do."

"No, your honour," said the Irishwoman; "but it will be a sad thing if it does, for you will have nothing to rest your spectacles upon!"

A Bragging Match.

A PARISIAN paper relates the following story of a contest in boasting, which, it says, took place between three artists of Marseilles. It should be explained that Parisian writers always put their "tall talk" into the mouths of Marseilles people.

"My dear sir," said one of the artists, "yesterday I painted a pine board in imitation of marble, and did it with such fidelity that when the board was put into a pond of water it sank like a stone."

"Pooh!" said the second, "that is nothing. Yesterday I happened to hang up my thermometer on the back of the frame of my 'View in the Arctic Regions,' and the mercury instantly went down to twenty degrees below zero."

"All that is nothing at all," said the third artist. "You know my portrait of the old Marquis of Camargne? Well, it is so life-like that it has to be shaved three times a week!"

E. E. H.

Really Extraordinary.

Two Irishmen got a job to clean some lofty windows.

Having no ladder, however, that would reach the windows, they were rather puzzled how to get to them.

"Pat," said Mike, "I have it. Get a plank, put it through the window. Oi'll sit on the plank outside and you sit on the plank inside."

All went well until Mike at the outside cried out:

"Oi let the window-leather fall."

"All right," again replied Pat; "stop where yez are, and Oi'll git it."

Away went Pat downstairs, and getting into the street, exclaimed:

"Be jabers, Mike, you're here first? Which way did you come?"

Corroborative Detail.

A German, being pursued by a policeman, ran into the shop of a friend who was a crockery merchant and hid himself in a bag.

The policeman coming in after him knocked on all the bags and baskets to find out where he was.

When he came to the bag where the German was hid he knocked and not hearing the rattle of china said:

"The German must be in here, for if it was china it would go 'tinkle, tinkle.'"

"Dingle, dingle," said the German inside.

Beyond His Means.

A certain beggar in a large town has quite a regular staff of almsgivers. On a recent occasion this man accosted one of his patrons as usual, and received from him half-a-crown.

The beggar took it, thanked the donor, but apparently seemed dissatisfied.

"Well, what is it?" said the gentleman.

"It is this, sir. Every month for years past you have given me five shillings, but to-day you give me only half-a-crown. How is that?"

"Well, I'll tell you," said the gentleman smiling good-humouredly. "I have had some unusually heavy expenses this month. My eldest daughter has married, and the outlay for her trousseau has compelled me to retrench in every direction."

"Ah, yes, I see," said the begger. "But, sir, I really can't afford to contribute anything toward your daughter's wedding expenses."

The Joke that Saved His Life.

A poor widow, in a West-of-England village, used to fatten a pig every year, and this was her only meat supply.

One year, about a month before "piggy" was fit for the knife, it was taken ill, and fearing it would die, the poor woman was in great trouble, and she sent for the vicar, and stated her sad case to him, saying:

"Oh, paason, my poor peg be main bad, and Oi be afraid 'eel die, an' Oi shan't 'ave a mossel o' mate vur a yur. Do ee pray vor'n to live—do ee."

This was a puzzler for the vicar; he felt for the widow, but he didn't like to pray for a pig. But a "happy thought" struck him, and going to the sty he looked as solemn as he could, and said in deep tones:

"O pig, if thou livest, thou livest; but if thou diest, thou diest."

The poor widow thanked him heartily. Fortunately the pig lived, which was a great comfort to the poor old woman, who firmly believed the "paason's" prayer had wrought the cure.

Some time after, the vicar was very ill with quinsy, and was thought to be dying. Upon hearing this, the widow begged so earnestly to be allowed to see him, that at last her request was granted.

Going to the bedside, with tears streaming down her aged cheeks, she sobbed aloud:

"Oh, paason, I be main zorry vor ee! Oh, paason, if thou livest, thou livest; if thou diest, thou diest."

This so amused the vicar that, remembering the pig incident, he laughed so heartily that it broke the quinsy and his life was saved!

No Watch Needed.

"My father," said the small boy to the friend who was calling on his mother, "is a great man. He knows what time it is without even looking at his watch."

"What do you mean, Tommy?" queried the visitor

"Oh, when I holler out an' ask him what time it is in the morning, he always says it's:

"'Time to get up.'

"An' when I ask him what time it is in the evenin' he always says:

"'Time to go to bed, Tommy.'

"Oh, I tell you my father is a great man!"

He "Surrhounded" Them.

Private Mike McGeever had been out foraging, and had been chased by a party of Boers till darkness enabled him to elude them.

When tired out he fell asleep behind some bushes which afforded good hiding.

At daylight he was wakened by hearing a party of seven Boer scouts, who had left their horses behind a hill and were viewing the British camp. Mike all at once was struck by a daring idea and he proceeded to carry it out.

"Presint arrums," he shouted, "an' be riddy to fire."

He then stepped boldly out in front of the astonished Boers and said:

"Put yer rifles down an' march in front av me into camp quietly or I'll giv the orther an' you'll get a dozen bullets aich."

The astonished Boers, thinking the bushes were lined with soldiers, obeyed, and when Mike had seen them secured he reported to his captain, who asked him:

"How did you manage to capture them yourself?"

He answered, "I surrhounded thim, sur."

One Question Too Many.

A certain judge was always noted while he was on the bench for his pertinent questions to witnesses.

One day, a suit was tried before him in which a steamboat company was required to show cause why it should not pay for the damage to certain goods which had been destroyed by some truck horses, that were frightened, as it was claimed, by the horrible and unearthly whistles of the steamer which was about to depart from the pier.

One of the witnesses was Michael Sweeney, an Irishman, who was present at the time of the accident.

The council for the plaintiff, asked Sweeny if his horses were frightened by the whistle of the boat.

"They were not, sor," he said.

"But what kind of an ear have your horses, Mr. Sweeny?" said the barrister.

"They have good ears, sor."

"Did you hear the whistle yourself?"

"I did, sor."

"But," interrupted the judge, turning to the innocent looking Irishman, "what kind of a truck was it that you drove, Mike?"

"A hand cart, sor."

"Ah," said the judge, turning to the counsel——"we have asked one question too many."

THE WOMAN DOCTOR.

FRANK MELVILLE had the toothache.

That fact was undeniable. Equally undeniable was the fact that it was a pretty bad one—nay if that gentleman himself had been questioned about it, he would have insisted on it that no human being had ever been under the sway of such a fiendish pain before—that it was impossible for a man to endure such agony five minutes—and this in the face of the fact that he had been suffering its red-hot tortures for fifteen minutes, and was still sufficiently alive to swear like a trooper at each extra twinge.

All day long the tooth had "growled," and now, in this dismal, little rainy town, where he was to spend the night, it had set in to ache at full swing.

Frank Melville's teeth were his pride, and he disliked the thought of having to lose any one of them; but being a man of prompt action, he made up his mind that having it out was preferable to the death which would inevitably overtake him, should he suffer until morn.

On learning there was no dentist in the town, he determined to call upon the kindly offices of the first physician.

"Where does the nearest doctor live?" he inquired of the landlord.

"Just across the way, but——"

Before he could go further, however, the agonised victim was half-way across the street.

There upon the brass door-plate Melville saw the legend in black letters:

"Dr. M. Ravers."

"Is Dr. Ravers in?" demanded he of the neatly dressed maid who answered his summons, with such fierceness that she fell back, fearing him to be an escaped lunatic.

"Is Dr. Ravers in, I asked you?" demanded he again, still more impatiently.

"Yes, sir, yes, sir."

"Then what are you staring at?"

"Nothing, sir. Walk into the surgery," answered Mary in her politest manner, feeling that any other course placed her in imminent danger of being eaten alive.

Obedient to her order, he walked into "the surgery" without further ceremony.

Instead of the doctor, however, he saw a young girl reading a book. She rose politely, and, acknowledging his presence, handed him a chair.

She waited a second or so, with an expectant look upon her face, and then asked, in a sweet, clear voice:

"Can I do anything for you? You seem to be suffering."

"No, thank you. I want to see your father."

This was at random, of course, but then Melville was not in a condition to be very lucid, or anything else that was rational.

"My father?" echoed the girl, with wonder in her voice. "Why, he has been dead ten years."

"I mean Dr. Ravers. I beg your pardon for assuming that he was your father, but this confounded toothache makes me forget everything, my manners included."

A burst of soft merriment made him look angrily at this girl who dared to laugh while he was in such misery.

"It is now my turn to ask your pardon, but I think you will understand my laughing, and excuse it. I am Dr. Ravers. Now, can I do anything for you?"

It was Melville's turn to fall back a step or two, or he would have done so but that he had seated himself at once on entering the surgery; but it is no exaggeration to say that his misery was swallowed up in the momentary shock of amazement.

"But, good heavens—I hate women doctors, and I want this tooth out," he replied angrily, as if he resented her sex, and considered himself personally aggrieved thereby.

"I'm sorry, but I don't see how I can help it now," demurely answered Dr. Ravers.

"Help what?" asked Melville.

Being a woman doctor, he knew she was laughing at him, although there was not a ghost of a smile on her face, and she shook her head gravely, as though she deprecated the circumstance.

"Where is the next doctor, or is she a woman too?" asked Melville impatiently.

"No, 'she' is a man, and lives a little further up the road, but is away for the night. If you'd wait till about noon to-morrow?" she suggested wickedly, in a questioning tone.

"Heavens! wait till noon! why don't you suggest my waiting till doomsday?" he replied savagely. "Is there no other?"

"Yes, one other—Dr. Walton."

"Is he a man or a woman?"

"He's a man, too. But——"

"But what? Tell me quick. Good gracious! woman, did you ever have the toothache? Hurry up and relieve me."

"I'm perfectly willing to be of any service. Dr. Walton who is your only remaining hope, is sick in bed. Still, you might try there. If not, come back and I'll lend you my forceps, so that you may pull it out yourself."

Melville shot out of the door, muttering to himself.

"A woman doctor! Humph! wanted the job herself, likely, I bet I'll find somebody to take out this confounded mass of pain. Lend me her forceps indeed! A woman that will stand and laugh at a man in my misery must be a perfect fiend."

But then, what could be expected of a woman who would study medicine?

Muttering to himself, he wandered up and down the muddy streets, but all to no purpose.

Misery finally brought him back to Dr. Ravers' door.

"I've come to ask you to lend me your forceps. I'm going to get some man to pull out this thing."

Dr. Ravers hesitated a moment, then said, bravely:

"I offered you my forceps in a spirit of mischief, well knowing you would never undertake the thing yourself. But I cannot put them in the hands of an ignorant person. I am too much of a physician not to be aware of the grave insults that might follow from an injudicious use of them. Yet I don't like to refuse you, for I know you are in much misery, and it seems as if I wanted to do it myself."

Melville could not help admiring the brave manner in which this little lady faced an unpleasant situation.

"Can you really do it? You don't look strong enough."

"I can really do it, and I am strong enough."

"You won't hurt me?"

"That I cannot promise. I will not hurt you unnecessarily."

Doubtfully eyeing the doctor, Frank took his seat and prepared for the operation, which, he persuaded himself, could not be much worse than the misery he was already suffering.

In a moment it was over, but so was Melville, for the sudden revulsion had caused him to faint.

In a moment he came to himself to find soft hands bathing his head.

"Am I dead?" he murmured.

"Oh, no," gaily answered the doctor. "People don't ask questions when they are dead."

Melville sat up straight and looked around in bewilderment. Suddenly it all came to him, and he exclaimed:

"By Jove! You're a plucky one!"

The doctor laughed and seated herself at some little distance while he recovered his equilibrium.

"May I ask you Mr.—Mr.——"

"Melville," supplemented Frank.

"Thank you. May I ask you, Mr. Melville, why you dislike women physicians? Is it on principle?"

"It is, madam, though it sounds ungracious in me to say so."

"But on what principle, Mr. Melville?" persisted the doctor. "Are you acquainted with many of my profession who have proved unworthy of the trust placed in them?"

Frank Melville could not think of a satisfactory answer.

"Ah! then I understand, Mr. Melville. It is prejudice, not principle."

"Mary," she continued, as the maid appeared in answer to her summons, "tell John to harness Jerry now. I shall be ready in a minute or two."

"Are you going out on such a night as this?" exclaimed Melville in amazement.

"Why not? Is it not my business to do it?"

"Well, but I thought women only half did these things."

"I never half do anything I undertake, or I should, perhaps, have left half your tooth in," she replied with dignity. "And now I must also wholly dismiss you, as there is a sick baby waiting for me two miles away."

Bewildered, Melville went over to the hotel. But weariness overcame his bewilderment, and sleep soon had possession of him.

Whirling away to the city the next day, Melville was suddenly struck with an idea that caused him to crimson and strike his knee vigorously.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed aloud, regardless of surroundings. "I never offered the woman a penny for what she did. What must she think of me! The idea of going into a doctor's office, abusing her whole tribe, and then after she had done her very best for me, never even mentioning money to her. Well, what must she think of me."

And the thought of Dr. Ravers' mirth-filled eyes, as she, no doubt, enjoyed the situation, was almost as hard to bear as the toothache had been.

"I'll send it to her as soon as I get home," he muttered.

Sitting down in his room to send the desired money, he found himself in a quandary. He did not know what her charges were. To offer her too little was shameful; to offer her too much looked like ostentation or charity. Further, if he sent it by post he would never know whether she received it unless he asked her to acknowledge it, and if he did that—ask a woman to acknowledge the receipt—he would look mean.

Altogether he found himself caring much for the opinion of this much to be despised "woman doctor," although he told himself he didn't care what she thought.

He settled it that he would go down specially and see her, and pay his bill in the course of three or four days, and "be done with her."

But before he had a chance, important business took him across the Atlantic, and the annoying matter was swallowed up in matters of greater importance.

After three months of hard work, he sat down upon he deck of the Umbria to rest. Noting the bustle and confusion of voices around him, there came to him from some little distance away one "good-bye" that affected him strangely.

Turning to note the owner of the voice, he saw a face strangely familiar yet curiously unknown. Upon the arm of the young girl leant a sweet-faced, white-haired old lady.

"Be careful, mother," said the voice he knew, "you will fall."

But the warning came too late. The old lady tripped and fell directly into Frank's arms, spread to catch her.

"Thank you, sir, oh, thank you!" exclaimed the daughter, in a frightened voice. "Mother, dear, are you hurt?"

"Not at all, Maud," but the mother trembled still with fright.

"Let me take your mother downstairs," said Melville earnestly.

At the sound of his voice the daughter started (she had not looked at him before) and looked at him quickly.

"Thank you, Mr. Melville," she said, with a smile, "I shall be glad to have you help me."

"Dr. Ravers!" exclaimed Frank, enlightened at last as to the resemblance and voice which had baffled him.

The voyage was a beautiful one, and these three, so strangely thrown together, and knowing no one else, found much to say to each other, and Mrs. Ravers, who thought of what her baby boy might have been had he lived to be strong and tall, and tender as this young man was, had a very kindly feeling for Melville.

Many times Frank wished he could speak of that thoughtless act of his, but innate delicacy prevented, and he felt that, unless something extraordinary happened he must for ever have that in his mind. Frank had one peculiarity—a hatred of small obligations—and this made him uncomfortable under the present circumstances.

A few days more, and they parted, with an earnest invitation from Mrs. Ravers to come and see them—an invitation heartily accepted by Melville.

"Really," he said to himself, "I must go and see the dear old lady soon."

"Soon" proved to be at the end of a week. Week followed week, and with it, every Wednesday evening, with unfailing regularity, was Frank found at the Ravers, visiting the old lady. Maud flitted in and out, and paid no particular attention to him. But her mother noticed with a smile, that lately on Wednesdays Maud seemed in somewhat of a hurry, and managed to get through with her regular visits earlier in the day, so as to give the evening only to "casuals."

But one evening came when Mrs. Ravers was unwell and unable to see him. A sudden resolve fired Frank.

"Dr. Ravers," said he, bravely looking at her with his honest eyes. "I owe you a debt. Wait!" as she was about to interrupt him. "A year ago to-night, and just such a night, I came here for your services. Well, no," he corrected himself, with a laugh, "not exactly that, for your father's services. I have never settled the debt I owe you."

"Mr. Melville!" she exclaimed, with a hurt look that nearly distracted him.

"And to-night I am determined to pay it."

"An offer of money from you now, Mr. Melville, I regard as an insult, and one which I never expected to receive at the hands of one whom I had grown to regard as a dear friend." And tears trembled in her eyes, showing how deep was the wound in her heart.

"Miss Ravers," exclaimed Frank, with an intonation that made her tremble, while the blood drifted slowly away from her face, though she would not meet his eye. "I did not intend to offer money, I intended to offer myself. Not," he added, hypocritically, "that I consider myself anything like an equivalent for the sum due to you."

Maud looked up and laughed; she could not help it. The abject humility of this last was too much for her. It is no doubt very improper to laugh on such occasions, but it cannot be denied that she laughed.

"You see," he continued, "I want to pay my debt with interest—nay, more than interest, with love!"

"But you forget, Mr. Melville, that I am 'a woman doctor,' and you 'hate us all.'"

"Oh, no, not all, my darling!" seeing no denial in her face, "for I love you. Come!" and he held out his arms to her.

A second's hesitation, and she went forward into the shelter of his arms, saying, as she laid her head against him:

"I am tired, Frank, and you always rest me so; though I would not have acknowledged it before," she added roguishly. "But doesn't it strike you as being a rather conceited way of paying a debt?"

"I admit it," he assented, with much humility; "and even now you have a perfect right, if you prefer——" and his hand travelled towards his pocket.

"No, never mind," she replied, laughing. "A fair exchange is no robbery."

"To think I should have sold myself for five shillings!" exclaimed Melville dolefully. W. Merstone.

His Friend, - - the Lady Burglar.

AMONG the very few persons of any note in the Metropolis who had never been interviewed, whose drawing-room had not been photographed and reproduced in the illustrated papers, and whose personal habits, tastes, failings and favourite amusements had not been set forth in black and white for the edification of Tomkins and Watson and Jobbings, was Miss Brenda Winchester.

Miss Winchester had written sixteen novels in three years, a record which the Saturday Scorcher described as marvellous, and the Weekly Scalper as scandalous. Each of the sixteen had gone into eight editions, and the name of Winchester was a household word from Penzance to Pentonville. Hammersmith to the Highlands. And yet, Miss Winchester had never been interviewed, not once.

It wasn't for want of trying on the part of the Press that she had escaped a two-column dialogue in The Young Schoolgirl, or an illustrated interview in the Ball's Pond Gazette. Miss Winchester had not published her third novel, "The Woman Who Tried Very Hard To But Who Failed In The Attempt," before the interviewers were on her track. They hung round her hall-door and peeped down her area steps; they were to be discovered peering over the walls of the back garden and listening at the key-hole of the kitchen door. Further than that they never got. The talented authoress turned a deaf ear to the glibly written invitations from enterprising editors, and declined to admit a single representative of the Fourth Estate.

The mystery surrounding the personality of Miss Winchester only made the appetite of the public for information concerning her the keener. The wildest stories were set afloat concerning the lady, her habits and her doings. It was asserted by some that she lived the life of an ascetic, that her house was as bare of furniture and the common comforts of life as a monastic cell, while others asserted that she revelled in the most elaborate luxury, and lived the life of an Eastern voluptuary.

In course of time the Press grew disheartened, and caught chills and things, or were moved on by the police, and so gave up the ghost. Miss Winchester was written off as a "bad debt," and dismissed from the editorial mind as an unproductive material for the making of "copy."

Only one pressman remained who stuck firmly to his post, and resolved that, come what might, he should enter Trefoil Cottage or perish in the attempt.

Young Flinnigan, of the Trumpet, was an enthusiast and a firm believer in the axiom that if you want a thing, and wait long enough for it, that particular object is sooner or later bound to become yours. So he stuck to the pursuit with dogged determination.

His reward came one evening

It was announced that Miss Winchester had gone to Monte Carlo to recruit after the arduous labours incidental to the production of her seventeenth chef d'œuvre "A Nineteenth Century Cain, and other stories for the Young," and curious to verify the accuracy of this statement, Flinnigan betook himself to Trefoil Cottage. The house was in darkness, the blinds were drawn down, and an air of desolation reigned over the place. He wandered round to the back of the house. All was darkness there also. There was not a sign of life. He was about to move away when he noticed with a feeling of the keenest emotion that a window in the lower portion of the house was partly open.

"The work of a careless servant," he muttered, "but it is my opportunity, and why should I not avail myself of it? Surely it is a stroke of fortune, and I should be unworthy of my noble profession if I allowed the magnificent chance to slip through my fingers."

Two minutes later his mind was made up, and he had scaled the wall, crept across the lawn, raised the sash, squeezed himself through the opening, and entered the house.

Once inside it took him some moments to collect himself. The enterprise was a daring one, and the utmost caution was necessary if he did not wish to raise an alarm and get himself into trouble.

He lit a candle, and producing a note-book, began hurriedly to examine his surroundings. It was not long before professional zeal overmastered his first natural feeling of nervousness, and he was busy with note-book and pencil, jotting down details and making rough sketches of everything and anything that seemed to be worthy of record. From one room he passed to another, gloating over his success and picturing to himself the brilliant descriptive article which he would turn out.

Digitized by Google

"It will be a triumph for the Trumpet!" he exclaimed to himself as he crept upstairs, "all London, all England, would read it, and it will be the sensation of the season."

He passed into Miss Winchester's bedchamber, a dainty apartment decorated in egg-shell blue and white, and filled with the prettiest furniture and knick-knacks that wealth and taste combined could bring together.

He was examining some curios in a cabinet when he became aware that someone was ascending the stairs.

His first thought was that a vigilant constable had observed the light, and "having suspicions," had entered the house with a view to discovering the cause thereof. But the step was not of a policeman. There was an airy, fairy-like lightness about it which never belonged to a police boot. It was the step of a woman.

"One of the servants," Flinnigan muttered, his ears wide agape to catch the smallest sound. "What an idiot I am! I might have known that the house would not have been left entirely tenantless. I will hide for the present, and at the first favourable opportunity make my escape."

He slipped into a large cupboard, having previously extinguished his candle, and awaited developments with a beating heart.

He had scarcely concealed himself when the door of the room was opened and a woman, young, pretty and graceful, entered, bearing a lamp.

Unconscious of the fact that she was not alone, she closed the door and locked it, and placing the lamp on the dressing-table proceeded to disrobe.

Flinnigan burst out into a cold perspiration.

He had not reckoned upon this incident and the spectacle unnerved him. For some moments he remained breathless and unhappy, a silent spectator of the scene before him.

Thus things reached a crucial stage, and resolving to declare himself, make a clean breast of the whole business, and throw himself upon the clemency of the stranger rather than be discovered and cause a scene, he coughed twice, and then emerged from his seclusion.

"Madame," he said, as calmly and quietly as he could, "I beg, I implore you not to be alarmed."

The young woman regarded him coolly.

"Do not distress yourself," she replied. "I am not in the least alarmed."

"Thank you," answered Flinnigan, considerably relieved, "that makes my task of explanation all the easier. I am here——"

"Any explanation is quite unnecessary. I am perfectly acquainted with the reasons which prompted you to enter this house."

"You are," he exclaimed with surprise, not unmixed with joy at the unexpected turn of affairs, "I am indeed delighted to hear it."

"Then understand," continued the young woman calmly, "that I am here on precisely the same errand, to pocket every portable thing I can lay my hands on."

"A burglar?"

"Precisely—like yourself."

"But, pardon me, you make a mistake I am——"

"That will do, my friend. I know a pal when I see one. I thought that I should be the first to crack this crib, and I didn't expect to find anyone had got here before me."

"But I thought you were going to retire for the night."

"I am going to retire directly—through the door. When you interrupted me I was taking off my things with the intention of dressing in some of the nice frocks which are stowed away in these wardrobes. You can put several silk frocks on, one over the other, you know. It's an easy way to carry them, and you don't excite suspicion. And with a big fur cloak over the lot, there's a beauty on the third hook yonder, one can walk past the sharpest-eyed constable without causing him to look at you twice."

"Very clever, no doubt, but as that is not my business, I'll wish you a very good night."

"Oh, no you won't my friend," said the damsel, retreating to the door, taking the key from the lock and calmly pocketing it, "you've been here before me, and of course you've picked up all the best bits. I thought there wasn't over much jewelery about."

Flinnigan couldn't help smiling.

"You've made a big mistake," he said, "I've got nothing, absolutely nothing."

"That's all my eye. Turn out your pockets."

"With pleasure."

Flinnigan took everything he possessed out and laid it on the dressing-table. The collection was not a particularly valuable one. A watch, bunch of keys, twelve shillings and sixpence in silver and bronze, a much worn cigar case, some odd papers and letters, his precious note-book, a lead pencil and a briar pipe. The unknown surveyed the collection grimly, and taking up the note-book examined it closely.

"What's all this description for?" she asked presently.

"Well, if you must know, I'm on the staff of the Trumpet, and that's to be worked up into an article and published in to-morrow's edition."

"I see," she said dreamily, "and so you are a newspaper man, at least so you say. Well, it may be so. And I daresay you would get a guinea or so for this, eh?"

"I should get five or six guineas at least. It's exclusive news."

"You shan't be done out of this. I'll write the article for you myself."

"You?"

"Oh yes, I can write a bit. I'm one of the New Women, you know; can do a little of everything: cycle, skate, play billiards, twang the banjo, sing a comic song, smoke a cigarette, dance the hornpipe, and all that. Now, sit down and be quiet and I'll turn you out some splendid 'copy.' I know every inch of this house, and I can write about things that you know nothing of. You can smoke if you like, but you mustn't speak. And if you stir I'll make it warm for you."

She went to a side table, opened a box, produced a revolver, loaded it, cocked the trigger, and placed it in front of her. Then she sat down took a pen, dipped it in the ink, reflected a moment, and then bending over a sheet of paper, she began to write with extraordinary rapidity.

Flinnigan, completely dumfounded, sank helplessly into a chair, and watched her as one bewitched.

She wrote for an hour without stopping; then she laid down her pen, and pinning the sheets neatly together, she placed them in an envelope and sealed it up.

"May I not see what you have written?"

"There is not time now. You shall see to-morrow."

Then she finished dressing, and donning a hat and cloak, she unlocked the door.

"You will wait here until I return," she said; "there is no possible means of escape, so it is useless trying to get out. There are bars outside the window; besides it is sixty feet from the ground; so you would break your neck even if you got outside, which you can't. The door, too, is bolted on the outside, and the chimney's too small to admit you. So the best thing you can do is to sit still and finish your cigar quietly until I return."

She vanished, and he heard the bolts shot home.

He sat there until daylight broke and the lamp went out. He tried the door, the window, the chimney. All was as she had stated. He was a prisoner in an empty house with no possible chance of escape.

He watched the hands of the clock travel round as the hours slowly sped away. Then when noon was reached he grew desperate. He opened the window and yelled. He beat the door and tugged at the bell, he screamed and smashed things. Was he to be left to starve, to go mad, to die of thirst, without being able to let anyone know that he was locked in like a prisoner? One o'clock, two o'clock, three o'clock. He began to grow desperate.

Another night in that awful solitude would turn his brain. Four o'clock struck and daylight was beginning to fade when the door opened and his friend, the lady burglar, entered.

She had a newspaper in her hand. It was the Drum, the deadly enemy and most caustic rival of the Trumpet.

"It is the fourth edition," she said sweetly. "It has got your article in it. Unfortunately I sent it to the wrong paper, but it doesn't really matter, for all London is talking about it."

Speechless with rage, he tore the sheet from her hands and sat down and read.

The article was a long, scathing, and mercilessly detailed acount of his own adventures, of his capture, imprisonment and degradation. The headlines alone cut him like a knife.

THE INTERVIEWER SCOTCHED!

A SMART JOURNALIST TRAPPED BY A PRETTY WOMAN!

THE COWARDLY PENMAN AND THE BOGUS BURGLAR!

SHUT UP FOR TWELVE HOURS WITHOUT BREAD OR WATER!

The rest was to match.

And the article was signed in large capitals:

Needless to say, Flinnigan never did much in the interviewing line after this escapade.

BOAT RACE COMPETITION.

ON Saturday, March 31st, the Oxford v Cambridge Boat Race will take place. There is every reason to believe that the contest will be an exciting one, and so that our readers might take additional interest in the national event we offer a Prize of £5 to the sender of the coupon, printed below, giving most nearly correct: (1) The Winning Boat; (2) the distance separating the two boats at the finish; (3) the time taken by the winning boat in the race. The third condition will only be used to decide the actual winner of the prize in the event of more than one giving equally correct answers to the other two questions.

The Judges' decision of the race will be our standard for making the award.

Having filled up the coupon to your thinking, sign your name and address in the space provided on the left and get two friends to sign their names and addresses on the right. In the event of your winning the prize they will each receive £1. Competitors may send in any number of attempts, all of which may be signed by the same witnesses.

In the event of two or more competitors qualifying for the first prize, the £5 will be equally divided. The witnesses will also share in the same way.

Up to the present time fifty-six races have been rowed. Oxford have won thirty-two and Cambridge twenty-three races, the 1877 contest being a dead heat. Cambridge won last year by 3¼ lengths, the time being 2 min. 4sec. Oxford won the races for the preceding nine years, their times being from a minimum of 18min. 47sec. to a maximum of 22min. 15sec., and their wins during that time from half-a-length to thirteen lengths.

All envelopes containing coupons should be addressed: "BOAT RACE COMPETITION," Short Stories, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should reach us not later than the first post, Wednesday, March 28th.

TOMKINS AND POTTS' DOG.

A MAN called on a solicitor the other day, and said, "My name is Tomkins. I called to see you about a dog difficulty that bewilders me, and I thought maybe you might throw some light on it. Might give me the law points, so's I'd know whether it was worth while suing or not.

"Well, you see, me and Potts went into partnership on a dog; we bought him. He was a setter, and Potts and I went shares in him, so's to take him out shooting. It was never exactly settled which half of him I owned or which half belonged to Potts; but I formed an idea in my own mind that the hind end was mine and the front end Potts'. Consequence was, that when the dog barked I always said:

"'There goes Potts' half exercising himself.'

"When the dog's tail wagged I always considered that my end was being agitated, and, of course, when one of my hind legs scratched one of Potts' ears or one of his shoulders, I was perfectly satisfied; first, because that sort of thing was good for the whole dog, and second, because the thing would get about even when Potts' head would reach round and snap at a fly on my hind legs.

"Well, things went along smoothly enough for a while, until one day that dog began to get into the habit of running round after his tail. He was the most foolish dog I ever saw. Used to chase his tail round and round until he'd get so giddy he couldn't bark, and you know I was frightened lest it might hurt the dog's health, and as Potts didn't seem to be willing to keep his end from circulating in pursuit of my end, I made up my mind to chop the dog's tail off, so's to make him reform and behave.

"So last Saturday I caused the dog to back up against a log, and then I suddenly dropped the axe on his tail pretty close up, and the next minute he was running round the yard howling like a boatload of wild cats. Just then Potts came up and he made remarks because I'd cut off that tail.

"One word brought another, and pretty soon Potts set the dog on me—half mine, too, mind you—and the dog bit me in the leg, see that; look at that leg. About half a pound gone; eat up by that dog.

"Now, what I want to see you about is this! can't I recover damages for assault and battery from Potts? What I chopped off belonged to me, recollect. I owned an individual half of that setter pup, from the tip of his tail right up to his third rib, and I had a right to cut away as much of it as I had a mind to; while Potts being sole owner of the dog's head is responsible when he bites anyone or when he barks at night."

"I don't know," replied the lawyer, musingly, "there haven't been any decisions on cases exactly like this, but what does Mr. Potts say upon the subject."

"Why, Potts' view is that I divided the dog the wrong way. When he wants to map out his half he draws a line from the head to the tail. That gives me one hind leg and one fore leg, and makes him joint proprietor in the tail. And he says that if I wanted to cut off my half of the tail I might have done it, and he wouldn't have cared; but what made him mad was that I wasted his property without consulting him.

"But that theory seems to me a little strained, and, if it's legal, why, I'm going to sell half of the dog at a sacrifice sooner than hold any interest in him on those principles. Now, what do you think about it? Don't sue Potts, you say?"

"I think not."

"Can't get damages for the piece that's been bitten out of me?"

"I hardly think you can."

"Well, well! And yet you talk about civilisation, and temples of justice, and such things. All right. Let it go. I can stand it; but don't ever anybody undertake to tell me that the law protects human beings in their rights. Good morning."

"Wait a moment, Mr. Tomkins, you've forgotten my fee!"

"F-f-fee! Why, you don't charge anything when I don't sue, do you?"

"Certainly, for my advice. My fee is one guinea."

"One guinea! Why, that's just what I paid for my half of that dog. I haven't got a shilling to my name. But I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll make over all my rights in that setter pup to you, and you can go round and fight it out with Potts. If that dog bites me again, I'll sue you and Potts as sure as my name's Tompkins."

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by Monday, March 26th, 1900.

No. 64.

From the letters contained in words signifying "a mark," "a fruit," "a large bird," "a small bird," "to idle about," and "a fast ning," form the names of three well-known sports—two words being used for each game.

No. 65.

The name of a celebrated painter will give the letters used in w rds signifying "a measure," "condition," "trim," and "a company." If these words be prope ly arranged, their diagonal, read downwards from left to right, will give a word meaning "a weapon." What is the name of the painter?

No. 66.

The initial of a word signifying "to cut" can be changed eight times, so that eight other words are given. The letters of each of these words can be transposed so that nine different words are formed. If the finals of these are changed, nine other words are given. What are the words?

No. 67.

NOBODY WILL STEAL THEM.

There are two reasons why the Crown jewels are never stolen from the Tower of London. They are in a strong place, well guarded, and are dangerous things to handle when dishonestly come by.

Most losses of valuables are due either to carelessness on the part of the owners or custodians, or to bribery. Perhaps the burglar's vocation is under no circumstances an absolutely safe one, but not infrequently he chances upon a "job" which is both easy and lucrative. I do not mention this fact for the unworthy purpose of inducing any of the youth of the land to enter the profession, but solely to throw illustrative light upon quite another theme. Still, there is a relation between them, and we shall hit it after we have talked a bit about the case of Mrs. Mary Rowlands, who lives in Wales.

The lady says that no longer ago than February (1898) she had a severe attack of influenza, followed by bronchitis. At this point we are concerned to know whether the influenza was in any sense responsible for the bronchitis, as cause and effect. If so, why? It is well understood, of course, in England, where influenza is so common, that other ailments do follow it; yet, probably, the majority of us have not settled in our minds the reason for it.

At all events, Mrs. Rowlands had a low, bad time. The trouble lingered along as, sometimes, winter does, away down into the period proper for May blossoms. She could not seem to get the better of the throat ailment nor master the lethargy and weakness left her as a legacy by the influenza. Her condition may be likened unto that of a ship which has indeed survived a gale but finds herself stripped of the sails needed to enable her to take advantage of gentler winds.

The lady's hope of getting back her lost strength by taking plenty of solid, nourishing food was illusory. Every meal of that kind caused fearful distress in the stomach and acute pain at the chest. Nature distinctly repudiated the solid food, and almost as strenuously objected to the liquids, such as broths, teas, and milk. It looked as if Mrs. Rowlands must starve at her own table.

Then came on asthmatic symptoms, so bad, she was often obliged to gasp for breath. Between this combination of complaints she got but little rest day or night. Soon after arose a threat of a still more serious disease—a threat happily not fulfilled. I refer to the cold, clammy sweats that broke out upon her, pointing to a fatal decline. The fear was natural, as grim Consumption, with his poisoned dart, often approaches by that same road.

"I became so reduced and feeble," the lady writes, "that my daughter had to nurse me constantly. I could not get into or out of bed without her help. In the house, or to others, I was of no use at all. The doctor who attended me left nothing untried that he knew of; but, in spite of all he did, I grew worse and worse.

"Where I should have been to-day, whether in the land of the living or not, who can tell, if a kind Providence had not intervened to save me? In some way my husband heard of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and persuaded me to try it. I began taking it, and soon felt better. My appetite returned, and all kinds of food agreed with me. With plenty of nourishment I gained strength rapidly. The asthma and the bronchial trouble vanished, and almost before I could realise it, I found myself in the best of health, and have continued so to be ever since. For my remarkable and unexpected recovery I am under obligation to Mother Seigel's Syrup; and so I tell all whom I know.—Mary Rowlands, Deri, via Cardiff, August 31st, 1898."

One thing Mrs. Rowlands says in her letter which I have reserved for this place, namely, that she was a dyspeptic. Her system was weakened and her blood rendered impure by indigestion. That is the main point. That is why she was open to the attacks of influenza, bronchitis, and asthma. Her body castle being weak, the precious jewel of health was stolen.

Keep the digestion strong, and the blood clean and pure, by the frequent use of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and there will be no soil for the germs of disease to grow in. The system, thus guarded, protects the health as the walls and doors of the Tower hold safe the Crown jewels.

The Merits of Guy's Tonic.

Taken immediately after each meal, Guy's Tonic mixes in the Stomach with the Food you have eaten, and helps to Digest it. It further stimulates a flow of Gastric Juice, and increases the efficiency of the Digestive Functions themselves.

Food is therefore enjoyed because Digestion is Easy and Natural. This does away with Pain and Discomfort after meals, Wind, Acidity, Heartburn, and Water-Brash.

Guy's Tonic gently compels a Sluggish Liver to greater Activity, whilst thinning and rendering less resinous the Bile in the Gall Bladder. This makes the Blood purer and freer from Biliary Poisons, so that the drag on the Energies and Depression of Spirits are removed, and you become more Buoyant, Cheerful, and Energetic.

The Digestion of Food in the small Intestine is also better and more completely performed when the Liver is rendered active and in good working order by the use of Guy's Tonic. You are thereby freed from the poisonous Gases bred by Decomposing and Undigested Food, which cause Flatulence and painful Distension. The natural Functions are also brought at the same time into a Healthy, Normal condition.

SHORT STORIES

No. 586. ONE PENNY

For the Week Ending March 24th, 1900.

THE WONDLEFORD MYSTERY.

IT was a coincidence, and a very curious one, which brought those two men together at Wondleford.

Jim Banks used to say it was the "darnedest, rummiest start" that ever he had come across. Jim was there, too, in the capacity of the necessary outsider, and it was through him that the story became known, for Tony Blake, with his emotional Irish temperament, never cared to speak of that night's experience.

Tony had spent a night at Jim's father's station en route for one, two days' journey on, where a mob of cattle was awaiting him. Jim was anxious to go on the roads for a bit, and Tony was on the look-out for a man, so it was quickly arranged that the young fellow should go, and they made an early start next day, for the only good camping ground with food and water combined was a long forty miles away.

As they left the slip-rails of the home paddock a traveller, who had been camping on the creek, hove in sight. He was a tall, black-bearded man, with curiously white hair, shabbily dressed, and with the shaking hand of an habitual drunkard. As he was evidently making for Old Wondleford crossing too, it was only natural that he should join the other horsemen. Three is not company, as a rule, but, as the stranger preferred to ride along in silence a pace or two behind Banks and Blake, they were undisturbed by his presence.

Blake had taken up a selection adjoining Jim's birthplace, and Jim had heard him spoken of as a mad Irishman, who sold his selection for a song, and made tracks for the old country, where it was generally understood that he had found a fortune and spent it, turning up again years afterwards in Queensland on the droving tack, and bidding fair to stick to that particular line for life.

After dinner they left the grassy slopes and ring-barked paddocks of Banks's property, and got into a country of thick scrub and stony, barren ridges. Once they passed a hut in ruins, and then ran up against the remains of a kangaroo fence.

Tony followed the fence with his eye, as it sagged like a broken-backed snake across a dry swamp.

"What's come to Roper letting the fence get into this state?" he exclaimed. "It was in good repair—bran new, in fact—when I saw it last. I'll speak about it to him myself to-night."

Jim turned in his saddle, and stared into Tony's handsome, florid face.

"Speak to Roper to-night! Why, man, where have you been? Roper's been gone these ten years, and Wondleford deserted. Haw, Haw! Speak to Roper about his fences. Now that is good."

"Is that so?" said Tony. "Well, you see I never came up this way but once, and that's a matter of twelve years ago, just when I was making tracks for the nearest railway station—a good three hundred miles further off than it is now, my boy. I never got as far east as your father's place before, and for particular reasons I did not call in that time, but I remember the road all the same. So Roper is gone, and his pretty wife with him, I suppose? Ah, she was a jewel," and Tony sighed retrospectively.

"Mrs Roper!" cried Jim. "Gone; I should think she was, and a matter of two years before Roper went. By gum, Blake, did not you hear about her being murdered? It must have happened before you left. I was a nipper of ten at the time, but I remember how excited all the district was about it. You see it was never found out, and everyone used to feel a bit scarey for a time. There were no police nearer than Crow's Nest in those times, and just then they were after the chaps that stuck up the Crow's Nest gold escort. Do you remember that?"

"Oh, yes; it happened a week before I left. But I called in at Wondleford on New Year's Day. Mrs. Roper was at home, and right as could be; the prettiest, jolliest little woman I'd set eyes on for many a day. I'd heard that Roper was as jealous as a man could be over her, and didn't encourage visitors, so I was just as glad he wasn't there. Bad luck to those who harmed her; an' for what was it done, and what was Roper doing not to bring the murdering rogues to justice?"

"Oh, he couldn't do anything. They fired the house, and burnt everything, but it was proved that she had a bullet in her brain before she was burnt. There was another dead body, a man's, found too; he had been shot as well. Some thought he was the murderer, and had shot himself in remorse, but it was impossible to find out. One of Roper's horses, saddled and bridled, was standing in the stable to complicate matters more."

"An' what was Roper doin' to leave such a young thing alone?"

"Well, he had to go to an out-station, with all hands to put out a bush-fire and burn a boundary. He left a gin, who used to cook for them, with her, but Mrs. Roper took a fancy to get pie melons, and sent the gin out to One Mile Creek to get 'em, telling her to camp the night, and bring home some fish as well next morning. Instead of that, the gin marched off to the out-station, and hung about looking for melons there.

"The boss found her, and sent her straight back with a message to Mrs. Roper, saying he'd rather she did not stop alone; but the gin was frightened Mrs. Roper would be angry if she returned without the melons, so camped on the creek, and didn't get home till late the next day, to find Wondleford burnt to the ground, and the boss gone off for the police and for help. He had got uneasy, and gone home before daybreak—suspected the gin of tricks, I suppose. It was night, of course, when he got to our place. I remember seeing him—a tall chap with black hair and queer deep-set eyes. Mother said he was like a madman.

They left the grassy slopes and got into a country of thick scrub and stony barren ridges

"Then afterwards I used to hear 'em saying that he was drinking himself to death, and was letting Wondleford go to the dogs, and then he cleared out altogether, and no one knows what became of him, and fancy you never hearing about it. Why, man, where have you been?"

Tony laughed. "Well, I was at sea a week or so afterwards. Do you remember the date at all, or about when it happened?"

"New Year's night," said Jim promptly. "And you say you saw her on New Year's Day. Didn't notice any strangers about, did you?"

"Yes—that is—no, of course, but it must have been the time, because the gin was away, and Mrs.

Roper got us some lunch herself. Poor little woman; poor pretty little thing."

Jim looked at him with bright unsympathetic eyes. "Why, you only saw her once," he said. "Anyway no one ever found out; a murderer isn't always discovered, you see."

"No, my lad, not when that murder was an act of justice, an eye for an eye, a soul for a soul, a—"

"What's up with you," said Jim, interrupting the rapid utterance of the stranger who had abruptly broken in upon his recital. "What do you know about it?"

"Nothing," said the man sullenly, dropping back a pace or two to his original position. "Only I've known murders that were justice, and that's the reason they're never found out. So put that in your pipe and smoke it, youngster."

Jim resented being called youngster above all things, and answered accordingly, but the black-bearded man was evidently not listening. Tony gave a sharp look at the vacant, deep-set eyes, and nudged Jim, tapping his forehead significantly. "The man's a bit of a pea-eater," he said, and Jim's wounded vanity was appeased.

He had more to tell yet, and returned to the murder theme, asking Tony if he was afraid of ghosts.

"Not afraid of 'em," said Tony. "But why do you ask; does the poor little woman walk?"

"Not that I know of, only there's a yarn that travellers sometimes see the homestead just as it was, before it was burnt. I've never camped here myself-but we may see it. Hope we do." A wish the Irish man did not echo.

A black thunder cloud was shadowing the west as the sun went down, but Wondle Creek, clattering and sighing over the stones, told them the journey was ended, and the travellers made for the grassy pleateau on the ridge, strange to say, the black-bearded man leading as straight as a pointer on the scent. He set about making a fire at once, and seemed inclined to do all the work, leaving the other two to stroll about and cut a few bushes for beds.

"The station ought to be down here," said Blake. "If that storm comes on it would be as well to have a roof over us. I suppose there's an outhouse or two standing?"

"Not a skillion even," said Jim. "It was only a small place, mostly under one roof, and the few outhouses soon fell to pieces. Father was past here a year ago, and he said——"

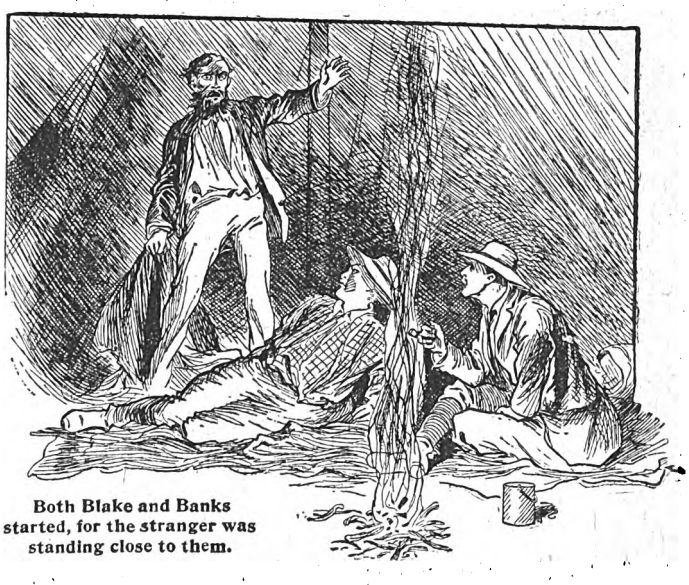
"You young rascal, what's been your game. It's meself would like to know?"

Blake had pushed through a screen of saplings and was gazing downwards. "Well, what do you call that?" he added.

Young Jim looked curiously across the little plain, through which Wondle Creek twisted like a silver ribbon.

"Rum—very rum," he said, after a pause.

Words which did not at all suit as descriptive of the scene before them. Dusk was already falling, but the long, low shingle roof, and the two tall chimneys of Wondleford-house could be plainly seen through the garden trees. Even the rails of the stockyard and the dark out-buildings were distinct enough, and a pretty picture it made against another green slope crowned with thick scrub as background.



Both Blake and Banks started, for the stranger was standing close to them.

As the men watched in surprised silence a moment, a big chestnut stallion dashed out of the shadow of the garden trees, followed by a troop of long-maned, flowing-tailed horses, and the thunder of their galloping hoofs brought Jim to himself.

"Brumbies," he said, briefly; "and brumbies don't flit in and out of gardens like tame birds. There's no house there."

"Will you bet?" said Blake.

"A quid," answered Jim.

"But you're a fool to do it. Look at 'em tearin' back again. If you watch you'll see 'em going up the hill to the scrub; through the hall door, I suppose," this with sarcasm.

Sure enough, when the wild horses had finished drinking, they made straight back, and went apparently through the garden—if not the house—but impetuous Blake was already down the ridge, and seeking for a crossing-place at the creek, before Jim could show a larger scorn.

The Irishman crossed on a fallen log, and ran quickly towards the garden.

It was growing dark very quickly, and there seemed to be no fences to bar his progress. A tangle of creeper stretching from a pine tree to a rose bush caused him to turn a little. The place was neglected certainly, scrub, oak, and other saplings springing up everywhere. Then he came across a knotted and twisted apple tree close against a charred and blackened post. Surely he remembered that, there used to be a slip of an apple tree against the back door? Mrs. Roper had told him to be careful not to let his horse near it that day; but somehow he had missed the house, and was out on the slope at the back, but there was the tall chimney and the shingle roof in front of him again. Once more he plunged into the shadowy garden; once more he struck the charred posts and the deformed apple tree; but, not to be beaten, he tramped about in all directions, finding nothing, however, and, thoroughly mystified, made the best of his way back to the camp and the triumphant Jim.

"Father would call it an optical illusion," said that worthy; "but I don't believe in meddling with that sort of thing. Cheer up; you're not the first that's been fooled. I'd like to send old sulky-face to look at it, only the sight would probably send him off his dot altogether; and we don't want to camp with a lunatic. Come and have your tea."

After it was over "sulky-face," as Jim had christened the stranger, rolled himself in his blankets, and apparently fell asleep. Blake and Banks smoked and talked a little longer, and the former grew communicative.

"Fact is, Banks," he said, "it did give me a turn to hear your yarn to-day. I've good reason to think I know whose that other body was, and he was a friend of mine. I might as well tell you the yarn, for it can't affect anyone now, and I don't know any more than you who the murderer was."

"Oh! there was someone with you then?" said Jim. "I thought as much."

"Yes, it was young Walter Benham — a ne'er-do-well brother of Mrs. Roper. He came to me the night before I was starting east. He had saved my life from blacks once, and I owed him a good turn. He was in the gold escort affair, more by ill-luck than any premeditated mischief, but he was wanted, of course, and had no way of getting a horse. He had written to his sister, telling her all, and asking her to get him a mount. Roper didn't approve of him, and so she was to keep it as dark as she could. I let him ride my pack mare, and disguised him a bit, and we made tracks for Wondleford, and by looking out well never met a soul. Naturally, as Benham had put me in an awkward position rather, I was anxious to get away as soon as I could before the police came this way, so I only stayed an hour at Roper's, and pushed on, leaving Benham to get away after dark, which I always supposed he did, for he had plenty of money, and meant to get off to America if possible.

"Now, it seems to me that he shared his sister's fate, because the saddled horse must have been his. I wonder if he was followed by some of the gang, and shot for fear he should inform; but then why was she murdered too?

"By George, he was a handsome lad, like her, but fair as she was dark, and I never saw two so fond of one another."

"Well," said Jim, slowly, "I don't know, but I think you should tell the police what you know. It's very likely the murder was committed by some of the escort robbers, and——"

"Good Heavens! Her brother! Her brother!"

Both Blake and Banks started, and sprang to their feet, for the stranger was standing close to them.

"What on earth's up with you now," said Jim, "can't you sleep without having nightmare?"

"Can you swear that on New Year's Day twelve years ago you left Mary Roper's brother with her at Wondleford—a brother she was fond of, whom she would kiss and caress and cry over? Can you swear, man—are you sure?"

As the stranger spoke he seized Blake's shoulder, and drew him round, so that he could look with his burning eyes straight into the Irishman's face.

"Sure, of course I'm sure. I knew Walter Benham at one time as well as I know myself; but what has it got to do with you?"

"I was Mary Roper's husband—that is all," said the man, loosening his grasp on the other's shoulder, and in the surprised silence which followed he turned and rushed away in the darkness.

"Well, I'm sugared!" said Jim Banks. "Fancy that pea-eater being Roper! But I swear I believe he's telling the truth. Twelve year's drink and a beard alter a man, but those queer eyes reminded me of something. It's him, right enough."

"Poor chap!" said Blake. "I must go after him. The storm will be on us in a minute. You give the tent pegs an extra drive, and I'll fetch him. I'm willing to tell anything I know—Why, what's that?"

A red glare in the western sky made them turn and run to the edge of the ridge. The stranger was standing looking downwards, close to the screen of saplings.

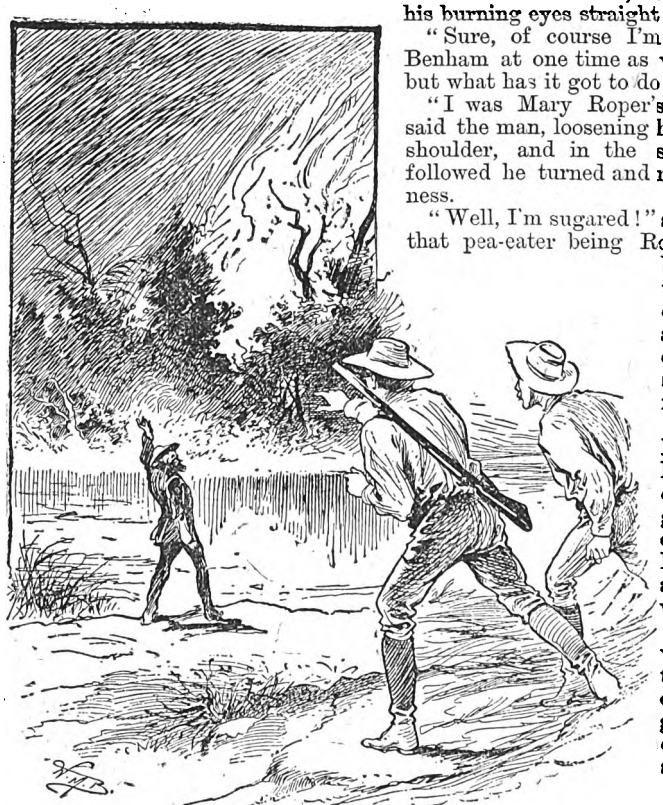
"Look!" he shouted wildly. "Look! False wife and broken vows! It was justice, only justice. Look!"

"Mad as a hatter," began Banks in an undertone, and then he stopped, open-mouthed, for the little creek was reflecting flames, and tongues of fire shot up above the trees, plainly showing against the shingle roof of the house on the plain. There was no mistake this time. A house was on fire, and there might be human beings in peril.

"Come along!" shouted Blake, and he sprang down the little slope towards the creek.

With a cry, the stranger followed, and outstripped him. Jim, more cautious, took his time.

It was pitch dark this side of the creek, and the glare of the fire dazzled his eyes. A peal of deafening thunder and a jagged flash of lightning added further to the disorder of the scene.



Roper stopped for a moment on the bank of the creek. "I cannot wait," he shouted.

"Hi! Roper!" he shouted. "Not so fast; you know the lay of the country better than we do."

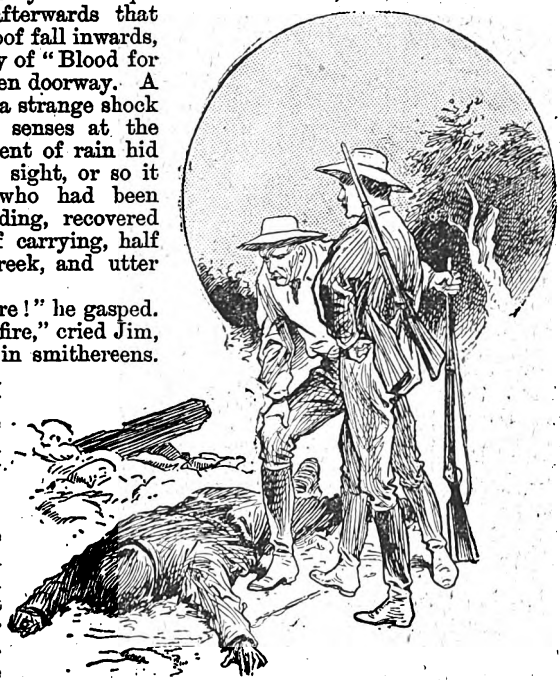
Roper stopped for a moment on the bank of the creek. "I cannot wait," he shouted. "Blood for blood! Don't you hear them calling?"

A minute afterwards Tony and Jim had waded through the shallow waters, and rushed towards the burning house. They were only a few paces behind Roper, and both declared afterwards that they plainly saw the red-hot roof fall inwards, just as Roper, with a wild cry of "Blood for Blood!" sprang in at the open doorway. A fearful crash of thunder and a strange shock deafened and stunned their senses at the moment, and a blinding torrent of rain hid house and garden from their sight, or so it seemed, for when Blake, who had been nearest to the burning building, recovered himself, Jim Banks was half carrying, half dragging him towards the creek, and utter darkness reigned.

"Roper—the house—the fire!" he gasped.

"There's no house and no fire," cried Jim, "nothing but an apple tree in smithereens. I'm off that lot. Roper can take care of himself. Any way, you don't catch me hunting lunatics through houses that ain't houses any more."

Half-stunned as he was, Blake allowed himself to be led back to the camp, and when the fury of the storm abated, with daylight, he went down with Jim to look for traces of the madman. Perhaps he had got into the scrub, with his wild fancies and poor tortured brain. Had they all been more or less demented the night before? for in the clear light of morning neither from the ridge nor anywhere else could a trace of the haunted station be seen! The creek babbled over the stones, the birds sang merrily among the trees of the old garden surrounding the few charred posts of the long-ruined homestead, and the sun sent bright shafts of light everywhere.



Face downwards amongst the crumbling soil lay the blackened singed body of a man.

"Lightning!" said Jim, briefly, pointing to the splintered trunk of the apple tree. "Lucky for us we were out of its reach. Good Heavens! here's Roper."

Face downwards amongst the crumbling soil lay the blackened, singed body of a man, perhaps where twelve years ago those other two charred bodies had lain, on the hearthstone of the home, destroyed by his own hand. For, somehow, the truth came with a flash to both the men standing there, and they saw as in a dream the arrival of the maddened, jealous husband, the loving parting of the brother and sister, the stealthy figure, wild with hate and passion, and the eyes burning with the light of madness. That Roper had shot his wife and the lad with her, and in his frenzy had set fire to the house, they had no doubt. The final act of the tragedy—Roper's death—after his late discovery of his wife's innocence, they did not try to understand. It was only, as Jim Banks said "The rummiest start he'd ever come across, anyhow."

* * * * *

After the police had been informed, Roper's remains were interred by the creek, close to two other grassy mounds. Wondleford was quite an important place in the scantily settled district for a time, and several people interested in such things camped for a week on the ridge, in hopes of seeing the shingle roof and tall chimney-stack amongst the clump of trees on the plain, but from the night of Tony Blake's and Jim Bank's weird experience, I have never heard that it was seen again.

AN APT PUPIL.

When people heard the name of Professor Draycott they pictured to themselves a man past middle life, and they were surprised to find, on meeting the gentleman, that he was very little over thirty, and looked younger than that. He was indeed a young man to have attained to such a position as that which he occupied, but that naturally was all the more to his credit.

Draycott had obtained during the past year or two a reputation for curing complaints and diseases by means of hypnotism. He was a firm believer in that science, and occasionally delivered lectures on the subject. He had been invited to Whitelock, where mesmerism was having a vogue, to deliver a course of four lectures in the public hall, and he had managed to sandwich this course between two other courses which he was to deliver in different parts of the country. He was exceedingly pleased to have the opportunity of going to Whitelock, as that city was noted as a centre of intelligence, and he prophesied that hypnotism would make a great stride in public favour if he could succeed in making a hit there.

Three of the lectures had been given and he was now preparing to deliver the fourth. It was Saturday, and it would be necessary for him to leave Whitelock on Sunday afternoon in order to reach Malton, where he was to deliver another course, early on Monday.

In his concluding lecture, Professor Draycott always endeavoured to impress upon his audience a fact concerning which he himself had not the slightest doubt; this was that everybody possessed the power of hypnotism to a greater or less extent.

He was always enthusiastic about his subject and spoke in a tone that in many cases carried conviction with it, but on this occasion, having due regard to the important city in which he was endeavouring to propagate the science, he was actually preparing a short speech on this particular point in order that every word should tell.

The hall was a large one, but it was simply crowded on that Saturday evening. The professor was delighted; it proved how great was the interest excited on the previous evenings, and augured well for the future of hypnotism.

Draycott warmed to his work as he had never done before; he explained the theory and he gave practical examples of his power on various members of the audience who "honoured him by stepping up to the platform." Then came the final remarks.

With an earnestness that abundantly demonstrated his convictions, Professor Draycott told the audience that every one of them had this strange power latent within his or her being; that if it were developed it would enable each one to do much for the alleviation of suffering and the cure of disease in his own circle; and that everyone was under the moral obligation to cultivate the gift for the benefit of mankind. There were some, he told his hearers, who disputed his assertion, but it was perfectly true and they would find it so if they made up their minds to try.

It was late that night before the professor could woo sleep; his ears still rang with the plaudits of the audience at the conclusion of what had been a remarkable séance, and he was so elated with his success that it was a wonder he was able to sleep at all. But when unconsciousness did fall upon him, it lasted for many hours—for he was thoroughly exhausted with his efforts—and he slept until nine o'clock on the Sunday morning.

After breakfast he went for a long walk, returning to his hotel for luncheon at one o'clock. That repast finished, he set to work leisurely to pack his bag for the journey.

The course of lectures had been arranged on a somewhat peculiar basis so far as payment was concerned. He usually had his fee paid in advance, but as the proprietors of the hall at Whitelock had had some doubt as to the success of the venture the professor had agreed to accept a precentage of the money received for admission. This was paid to him at the close of the lecture on Saturday evening, and in cash.

The result had been far better than anyone had anticipated, and he found himself with £100 in notes and coin as his share of the proceeds. The notes he placed in his pocket-book, while the gold and silver—being heavy—he stowed away in his bag.

He had finished packing his bag and was looking round to see if he had forgotten anything, when a porter knocked at the door and handed him a card. It bore the name of Miss Dora Callan.

"The lady says that she would like to see you on a very urgent matter," said the porter deferentially.

"But I do not know this lady," returned Draycott, surveying the card with a perplexed air. "Are you sure she mentioned my name?"

"Yes, sir; she said I was to give it to Professor Draycott, the hypnotist," replied the man.

"Very well I will come down," said Draycott. And two minutes later he found himself bowing to a remarkably pretty young lady.

"You wish to see me on some urgent matter, I understand?" asked Draycott, when they were both seated. "We are, of course, strangers and I am wondering——"

"Oh yes, I know you must be!" She spoke with some confusion, which seemed to add to her beauty. "I know it must seem—very—rude of me to disturb you, but I thought you could help me to cure someone."

She was very timid, but the professor rather liked that; he had never given much thought to the opposite sex, except to think that some of its members were very bold and forward, and this pretty face, rendered more bewitching by the shyness of its owner, was causing him to experience quite a new feeling.

"To cure somebody?" enquired Draycott, overcoming the tendency to forget science. "I shall be glad to assist you if it lies in my power. Let me know exactly what you mean."

The young lady explained in a somewhat hesitating manner as though she was still afraid that the great man might resent the intrusion, that her mother had been suffering for some time from ill-defined pains which it had been impossible up to the present to dissipate; that during the past week her sufferings had increased considerably and the medical man who attended her had been unable to alleviate them. The young lady had been present at the lecture on the preceding evening, and had heard the professor's remarks about the power of hypnotism being latent in everyone. This had suggested to her that she might be able to do something for her mother, if she could obtain information concerning the methods to be employed. How was she to go to work in order to exercise the power which, according to Draycott, she possessed? Once more she reminded the hypnotist of his remarks on that point, and concluded with a timid observation that perhaps he was not quite sure that everyone had the power.

Draycott felt just a little bit nettled at the idea of any doubt being cast upon his statement; he was also strangely stirred by the apparent timidity and the beauty of the young woman who sat facing him; and he was anxious both to prove that he was correct, and to do something to relieve the mother from pain. By helping the mother he would be doing a service to the young lady also, a thought which increased the peculiar feeling which he was experiencing.

"I am quite sure," he observed gently, yet firmly, "that you possess the power to a greater degree than many other persons. Your eyes shine with much brilliancy, and although you are somewhat timid at times, it is my belief that you are gifted with considerable will-power."

Unconscious'y, for the professor was not quite aware of what he was saying, he had spoken the truth; a close observation of the young woman's eyes revealed great strength of character. "This is how you proceed."

Draycott drew his chair a little nearer to hers, looked at her fixedly and began to make passes with his hand.

"You fix your eyes full upon those of the person whom you intend to hypnotise," he continued. "Then you make a few movements with your hands, just as I am doing, in order to confuse them. It is strange how effective these few movements are upon the minds of the ordinary individual. And the combined action upon the mind of these movements and the glare of the eye is remarkable, even in the case of a person who may claim to be fairly strong-minded. Only when a person deliberately makes up his mind that he will not be mesmerised is the action of these two methods rendered null; on the other hand, if the patient is willing or is unconscious of what is about to be done, the result is certain."

"Oh, thank you so much!" said Miss Callan in a tone that was full of gratitude. "I feel sure that I shall be able to send my mother off. Your lucid explanation has quite cleared away the doubts I entertained. Now let me see. Had I not better go through the movements here, so that you can see whether I do them correctly? But perhaps I am taking up too much of your time. Oh dear! I have been here quite a long time already and I am afraid that I have been very rude in thus bothering you."

"Not at all!" Draycott hastened to assure her, and he did it with a warmth that would have surprised all his scientific friends. His face was animated, though there was a slight flush on his cheeks and in appearance he was very different from the cool, studious-looking man of science who posed as the apostle of hypnotism. "This has been a very pleasant experience for me—very pleasant indeed! and I am charmed to have the opportunity of propagating the science and conferring immediate benefit upon a human being at the same time. By all means make the experiment and I will correct you if you are wrong."

Draycott shifted his chair still a little nearer to Miss Callan and lay back with an air of great contentment, as though he were a patient willing to be operated upon. This was decidedly a pleasant experience, he had never gone through anything like this before, and he caught himself wondering dreamily whether a bachelor's life was really the blessed condition which he had hitherto imagined it. Just imagine what it must be to have a partner for life similar to the girl who was now gazing at him with those glorious eyes! How pretty she looked! And how deftly she moved those dainty little hands in front of his face! He felt half tempted to grasp them and ask her to be his wife. That would have been rather sudden, but Draycott believed in quick decisions.

He tried to tell her that she was performing her task splendidly, but the words would not come; his eyes were kept fixed by the glare of hers—yes, it was really a glare. In a dazed manner he recognised that she was exercising the mesmeric influence over him and he felt pleased; he would tell her afterwards how the gleam from her eyes had fascinated him, how the pretty face with its slightly flushed cheeks had enchanted him, how splendidly she had understood what he had explained to her about the movements and all the rest of it.

"Now," said Miss Dora Callan, two minutes later, "I think we can proceed to business. How much money did you get out of your lectures?"

"Just over £100," replied the hypnotised Professor.

"Ah! I thought it would have been a little more than that," continued Miss Callan, "and where is that money?"

"The notes are in my pocket-book, but the gold and silver are in my bag," came from the lips of Draycott.

"It was rather a foolish arrangement about the manner of payment," resumed Miss Callan pleasantly. "It got into the papers you see, and it made people say that if you were so devoted to science, you ought not to have worried about such trifles as fees. Kindly give me your pocket-book."

Draycott did as he was bid, and Miss Callan quietly extracted the notes and handed the pocket-book back to its owner.

"Now I will trouble you to go up-stairs and fetch your bag. It would not be quite the proper thing, or I would prefer to accompany you or even to get the bag myself. But you had better bring it down into this cosy little reception room which, fortunately, we have entirely to ourselves."

Professor Draycott left the room without the least show of resistance and returned in due course with his bag. Miss Callan quietly locked the door on the inside, and then requested the professor to find the money and hand it to her. The hypnotised man did as he was told.

"Thank you." Miss Callan smiled pleasantly as she took five sovereigns from the bag containing the gold and let them fall among the professor's papers and clothing in his travelling bag.

"You will want some money for your journey. I understand that you leave by the 5.30 train this afternoon?"

Draycott nodded assent.

"Very well. I will write a short note which will explain to you what has happened, otherwise you may be inclined to blame the hotel authorities for the loss of your money when you wake up."

She took up a pen and wrote a few lines rapidly on one of the sheets of paper that lay on the table. When she had finished she sealed it in an envelope and addressed it to Professor Draycott.

"Take this and go back to your room, where you are to remain in this condition until five o'clock. You will just have time to catch your train, and I shall be out of your reach."

With a smile of intense satisfaction and a pretty bow, Miss Callan turned her back on Draycott, unlocked the door and walked out.

When Professor Draycott came to his senses at five o'clock, he gazed in bewilderment at the envelope which he still held. Rising from his chair he looked about him in an endeavour to explain to himself how it was that he felt so confused.

"I must have been asleep," he murmured. "How did this letter come here and who brought it?"

The simplest way to solve the mystery was to open the letter, and, as a man of science Draycott recognised the fact. He cut the envelope and began to read.

The note told him what had happened on that eventful afternoon, and it further explained that the writer, being sadly in want of money, had hit upon the bold idea of hypnotising the professor himself and relieving him of the proceeds of his lectures.

Fortune and a pretty face had enabled her to carry out her plan successfully.

"You ought to be greatly pleased," the writer concluded, "at this proof of the accuracy of your views, and at having so apt a pupil. I do not know whether we shall ever meet again, probably not; but neither of us is likely to forget the experience of this afternoon. It was pleasant to me, and I am convinced that you found it equally agreeable—at least, at the beginning."

Draycott examined his pocket-book and then his bag. It was perfectly true, he had been robbed by a pretty and daring female thief; he was too much a scientist to spend useless time in giving vent to his vexation and indignation; he was convinced that he had been hypnotised by the young woman who had called upon him, and that the hotel people were not to blame for any act of dishonesty on the part of an employée. Then he suddenly remembered his train.

The thoughts of the learned man were not agreeable ones as he travelled towards the town where he was to stay the night, and from which he would take an early morning train to Malton, but it is impossible to conjecture what they would have been had he known that Miss Callan, much disguised, was a passenger in the same train. When he alighted at his destination, he lingered on the platform and watched the train as it left the station to continue its journey. He was just turning away as the last coach passed him, when a woman's voice uttered the words: "Good night, Professor Draycott."

He started and stared. The voice was familiar and the mocking tone was significant. Then it came to him—it was his afternoon visitor.

The train was gone. He might have made an attempt to catch her, but he really had very little positive proof to convince a judge and jury that she had taken the money, and just think of the ridicule that would be heaped upon him for having allowed himself to be caught in that way.

Professor Draycott's friends have remarked that he has ceased to allude in his lectures to a fact which he formerly emphasised, namely, that every human being possesses the power of hypnotism.

SILKY OF THE GUARDS.

On the regimental muster roll his name was inscribed as Second Lieutenant the Honourable Eustace Borrowdale. To his brother officers, he was known by the less portentous appellation of "Silky"; while Society—by whom he was much in request, both because of his acres and his inches—affixed the distinguishing title of —"of the Guards."

From what source the nickname had sprung, was never made quite clear. Possibly it arose from his behaviour on the occasion of a visit to the "International Sporting," when Miles Dogherty—the Limerick heavy-weight—knocked out Sam P. Simpson—the Bowery champion—after a fight lasting through ten rounds, with much damage to the Transatlantic worthy's visage—"tapping his claret," and "bringing up his peepers," in a manner worthy of the best traditions of the "noble art."

Instead of going into ecstasies over the capacity of the one to endure punishment, and the science displayed by the other, "Silky" was heard to remark, that it was a beastly exhibition, "by Jove!" and he was proceeding to express his regrets, that he had allowed himself to be inveigled—into witnessing such a display of pure savagery, when a deadly pallor crept over his face, bringing his remarks to an abrupt termination, and himself to the ground in a dead faint.

Conduct such as this could not—in the eyes of the half-dozen veterans of the regiment who accompanied him—be anything else but chicken-heartedness—absolutely appalling in a chap who had chosen the service for a vocation.

To these seasoned warriors, who had seen men's blood flow like water amid the iron hail and clashing steel of many a hard-fought field, the lad's nausea at the sight of a prize-fighter's face reduced to the appearance of pulpy liver, was incomprehensible.

What wonder, then, that old Brodrick, the senior major, who considered such conduct little short of a disgrace to the regiment, growled out: "The boy will do no good in the service. He's as soft as silk."

It is very probable that the cognomen originated thus, for the story of the lieutenant's squeamishness afforded amusement at the mess-table for many a night to come. On the other hand, the young fellow's feminine voice and shy, nervous manner—he was barely twenty-two—might have had something to do with it.

While yet again, the small head, with its close-cropped, but still curling ringlets of silky golden hair, the blue eyes, the smooth, fair skin, delicate as a woman's—all so absurdly out of place, set, as they were, on a pair of shoulders, and stalwart form of a very Hercules—might have been responsible. Whether "Silky" had his own ideas upon the subject was never known. Certainly, at first, when so addressed, his cheek would flush hotly, and an expression of annoyance creep into his eyes, but gradually as time passed, he appeared to become indifferent.

Yet he was anything but effeminate in his habits. He had shot big game in Africa, stalked deer in the raw of the morning in Scottish Highlands, and in the hunting-field—heavy weight as he was—had invariably been found in the first flight—he, and his big bay—Roger—taking fences and stone walls in a manner worthy of Galway itself.

And no one among the subalterns had passed more rapidly through the hands of the drill sergeant than he; while the true cavalry man's seat in the saddle seemed to come to him by instinct. As a swordsman, too, the regiment were bound to admit that "Silky" would be bad to beat.

When the cloud—as yet no bigger than a man's hand, yet, to the far seeing, charged with the very thunderbolts of Jove—loomed over the Transvaal, and rumours of the probability, in the event of hostilities, of certain of the Household troops being called into requisition leaked out, there were many among the officers who whispered that the great Borrowdale interest would be put into motion to transfer "Silky," into a home-staying battalion.

Yet the cloud grew larger, spreading over the Free State, and casting a black shadow across the whole of South Africa, and still "Silky's" seat at the regimental mess-table remained filled.

So, too, during the phases which followed, from the issuing of the insolent ultimatums, to the calling out of the reserves, and the momentous day, when, as part of the composite regiment, he, and others of his brigade, received orders to prepare for active service.

Indeed that night, when toasts were drunk in honour of the brave soldiers holding the forts in far-off Natal, at Mafeking, at Kimberley and Rhodesia, there were none who drank deeper than "Silky," or whose eyes sparkled more brightly, or showed greater apparent gratification at the prospect of taking his share in the defence of the Empire.

Only when the moment of embarkation came, and he had said "good-bye" to a grey-haired lady, who had called him again and again "her darling boy," and besought him to run no unnecessary risks, for her sake —"for her sake"—did "Silky" betray emotion. Then indeed he broke down.

As the tender moved off, indifferent to the thousand eyes upon him, he leant—white and trembling—against the bulwarks, watching the bowed figure on the receding dock, while the tears streamed in a very torrent down his cheeks.

There were many white, drawn faces round him, as they looked on what perhaps might be their last, on those who were nearest and dearest to them—yet none so broken-hearted as "Silky."

Old Brodrick, with the remembrance of their visit to the "International Sporting," still in his mind, and whose breast was as impervious to emotion as his cuirass, could not resist expressing himself upon the subject to the Colonel standing at his side.

"That lad will want watching," he observed. "Ten to one he'll get scared, and show the white feather the first time we get under fire."

"The old man"—as his soldiers called him—looked hard at the lad. Then, tugging nervously at his grey moustache, and with a suspicious mist creeping over his keen, grey eyes, he replied shortly:

"I don't agree with you. That boy is not ashamed to show natural grief, and I take that as a good sign. To me, that requires more courage, in a place like this, than to ride on a park of artillery. I know that kind of lad. They shake and tremble at the start of the action, but when they warm to the work, they are capable of deeds that old soldiers, such as you or I, Brodrick, would shrink from. Remember your own youth, Major; you've been a soldier so long that you appear to have forgotten what it is to be a man."

The white cliffs of Albion grew faint in the distance.

The Major accepted this rebuke in silence, only shaking his head doubtfully as he turned away.

So the great transport sailed, and the white cliffs of Albion grew faint in the distance, then faded away.

Day and night, under the impulse of the great revolving screws, the heavily-laden trooper ploughed her way toward the war-torn continent.

The heights of Table Mountain loomed large on the horizon. Troops and stores were landed, then, once more, the troopship—carrying details for Natal, of which "Silky's" troop was one—steamed out of the bay and made for Durban.

Then the rush commenced. Men and horses, guns and ammunition were hurriedly entrained and sent to the front. A few busy days, when hours seemed but as seconds, passed.

The eve of a great battle arrived, and then morning dawned; the moment was at hand when "Silky" was to give proof as to whether his Major's fears or his Colonel's confidence would be justified.

Yes! The time had come!

For hours the field artillery had plied their guns upon the rugged kopje behind the shelter of which the Boer force was entrenched, every boulder covering a marksman, every hillock disclosing a rifle barrel.

The enemy's guns had been silenced, and under cover of the confusion and dismay, caused by our well-planted shells, the infantry had advanced to the assault.

Undaunted by the storm of bullets which fell round them like hail, unchecked by the constant dropping of men, they had crept up and up.

A fierce hurrah as the summit was gained; loud cries of vengeance; shrieks for mercy; wild oaths; the whip-like cracking of the officers' service revolvers; then the cold chink, chink, as the British bayonets swept aside the feeble parry of the clubbed Mausers, and bit deep in the Dutchmen's flesh.

Afterwards the wild cheer of triumph, as the enemy lost heart, and taking to their horses, streamed over the veld, scattered like deer, by the resistless onslaught of the despised "Rooibatjes."

Yes, the time had certainly come!

To make the rout complete, the cavalry must pursue the retreating commandoes, and, if possible, take their guns.

Instinctively each man gripped his sabre hard, and gathering up his reins, settled himself firmly in the saddle—drawing a long breath, as if he thought it might be his last.

The officers glanced at their men—forgetting in their anxiety for them, to look at each other. Though, had they done so, they would have learnt nothing, for each and all were deadly pale—some from intense excitement—others from a swift reflection of home, and dear ones, from whom they were going, perhaps, to be cut off for ever.

It was fortunate for "Silky" that his brother officers were so engaged, for the feeling of deadly fear, which had come over him at the commencement of the action, when he received his "baptism of fire," had now increased tenfold. His hand trembled so, that but for the swordknot at his wrist, the weapon would have fallen to the ground.

His knees had lost all grip upon the saddle, and only by the instinct of balance, given by long practice, did he keep his seat. His face was livid.

"Good heavens!" he thought. "I am a coward!"

To the young fellow, scion of a race of warriors, whose names were written large in the glorious page of England's dead heroes, the thought was torture.

Yet deny it he could not. He did not, he felt, so much fear death, although, so far he had found life very sweet, still the feeling of indefinable terror was each moment increasing.

"Close up! Trot! Gallop!"

For a space, the voice of his Colonel ringing out like a trumpet, the jingle of accoutrements, the bounding gallop of his horse, the wild shouts of the men, at whose flank he rode, the necessity of keeping his eyes fixed on his commander, who, a horse length ahead of his men, by the repeated sweep of his sword arm, indicated an increase of speed, made him oblivious to all, and he rode as one in a dream.

A riderless horse dashed past him.

But as the heavy forms, and unkempt, rugged faces of the enemy, who had turned sullenly at bay with their machine guns and Mausers raining death upon them, came into view, and the wild trumpet sounded the charge, the feeling of sickening dread overtook him once more.

The regiment had extended its formation. Now the men, deploying right and left, each fixed in his mind's eye his adversary, and rode down upon him at the full speed of his charger.

"Silky" was alone in their midst, forgotten! Involuntarily checking his horse, he glared round him, searching for a means of escape.

Spat! A sound such as might have been made by a stick striking a wet cloth; the gallant horse which had carried him so nobly, staggered beneath him, plunged madly forward in a last desperate effort to overtake his stable companion—now a dozen lengths ahead—then fell prone to the earth, hurling him from the saddle, far out upon the veld.

"Was he hurt?" he asked himself. "No!"

Then fortune had favoured him!

Where he lay, a slight rising in the almost dead level of the veld, sheltered him from the rifle fire. He was in comparative safety. Luckily, too, he had struck against a pebble or something in his fall, which had raised a lump upon his forehead. He decided to remain where he was, assuming insensibility. Should the charge—as was practically certain—prove successful, he would be picked up by the bearer corps, who would suspect nothing. If, on the other hand, as had frequently happened before, the Boers had retreated merely to lead the cavalry into an ambuscade, he would be taken prisoner. Under the circumstances, he would prefer the latter. He would be safe there!

Imprisonment at Pretoria was not a pleasant prospect, but was better, after all, than the dangers of the campaign. So he reasoned, while the sound of whistling shots—the whir-r-r of the machine guns—and the shouts and yells of the combatants, died away in the distance.

Then came the re-action, the contemplation of his own cowardice.

Through his closed eyes, he seemed to see the figures of his dead ancestors, contemplating him with scornful looks—even the gentle face of his mother, who had begged him to be careful for her sake, appeared to be looking at him reproachfully.

He thought of his brother officers—those gallant fellows with whom he had spent so many happy hours—of his grey-haired Colonel, now far ahead; all fighting for their lives, while he, who should have been at their sides, was lying there in safety, and lastly, came the thought of his soldier's oath—of his duty to his Queen and country.

It was agony! He would have given empires to retrieve his act. But the die was cast—there was no joining them now!

Stay! What was this?

A sound of galloping hoofs—of ringing scabbards—a trooper of his regiment galloped past him—his head bare and bleeding from a ghastly wound in the neck, and his face white with fear.

Another followed—then three riding abreast—half a dozen—twenty! What was this? A retreat?

Borne on the moaning wind, which was springing up, he heard the words: "A trap! Every officer down!"

He saw it all like a flash. The Boers, acting on their usual tactics, had fallen back on a strong force held in reserve. The officers of the regiment had been picked off, and the men, leaderless, had been seized with panic.

A burning desire, not only to retrieve his own self-respect, but his regiment's prestige, a fierce yearning to avenge the deaths of his brave comrades, sprang up in his breast.

The warrior spirit of his race, the indomitable repugnance of the Englishman to acknowledge defeat, awoke, and he leapt to his feet.

A riderless horse just then was dashing past him.

To seize its trailing rein, and leap into the saddle, was, to the guardsman, the work of a minute. With a torrent of wild shouts, and, in his excitement, fierce oaths, to gather his terror-stricken men round him, was the work of another; then regaining courage from their young leader, they dashed down anew upon the foe.

There was no resisting their mad onslaught. A few moments of hard work, and they were through, only to reform, and charge again. Singling out the leader, a man of note among them, "Silky" slew him with his own hand. Then with helmet off, and his golden ringlets blowing hither and thither in the breeze—wounded in a dozen places, yet feeling none—he hacked and hewed his way among them, like a very demi-god of war.

Like the white plume of Henri of Navarre his golden head was to his men, a very oriflame, and soon, shouting that the British rooineks were devils, not men, the stubborn Boers—those there were left of them—melted over the darkening veld like dew before the morning sun.

To pursue the remnant into the now rapidly falling darkness, was, as "Silky" realised, but to court disaster, and re-forming his men, he turned to ride back to the camp.

As he picked his way through the dead and dying, lying in every imaginable posture round him, a familiar form caught his eye, and he leapt from the saddle, and placed his hand upon the wounded man's heart. At the touch, the keen, grey eyes opened, regarding him in a dazed, wondering way, and the Colonel—for it was he—sat up and looked about him.

"Where am I? What has happened?" he asked.

"Silky" stood silent; his face flushing painfully, his eyes fixed upon the ground.

Before the eyes of his chief, the remembrance of his former act filled him with shame.

The old man placed his hand to his forehead, from which the blood was oozing, and continued brokenly:

"I remember, but,"—with a puzzled look—"where did you get to? Someone said they saw you shot down as we got to close quarters."

Still silence from "Silky," who felt ashamed to speak.

But from a trooper, who had drawn near to aid his officer: "The Lieutenant was knocked over, sir, at the first rush. I saw him and his horse go down myself, and see," calling attention to "Silky," now reeling from the loss of blood, "he's been hit more than once. But," with intense admiration—"he's a plucked one, he is, sir, and no mistake, though we did think him soft. When you and the other officers went down, sir, we got badly scared, and I'm ashamed to say it, but it's true, sir, we bolted. But for Lieutenant 'Silky,' sir," in his excitement, the worthy private used the familiar name, "it would have been a bad day for the 1st Life. We'd a never dared hold up our 'eads in Pall Mall again, sir. But he rallied us like a man, and," modestly contenting himself with a sweeping gesture, at the bloodstained ground round them. "Well, you see the result, sir. They won't call us carpet soldiers no more in London, I reckon!"

"You saved the honour of the regiment."

The Colonel, whose wound was fortunately superficial, staggered to his feet, and grasped the young officer's hand.

"My dear fellow!" he said. "You have saved the honour of the regiment, but it was only what I expected, though there were those amongst us, who, alas! have fought their last fight, who said you would show the white feather in the fight."

The young fellow could contain himself no longer, and blurted out the truth.

"So you see, sir, they were right after all," he concluded brokenly.

"I'm hanged if they were!" growled a voice, as its owner, limping painfully, and with a deep sword cut over the head, which made him almost unrecognisable, extricated himself from under a dead charger, close at hand.

"A chap, who has the courage to make a confession like that, is no coward. I was wrong, and you right. Colonel, see that he gets the Cross."

"Captain Borrowdale shall have it, Major!" was the reply.

And he did!

Hubert Bartlett.

From the Snare of the Fowler.

THE great ocean steamship, homeward bound, was shearing her way through the waves at the rate of twenty odd miles an hour, and her passengers, scattered up and down the deck, were making the most of the evening light before the dinner bell should summon them below. Two young men, cigarette in mouth, were watching another couple, a man and a woman, who stood leaning over the rail of the ship at a little distance. The man was gazing with an expression of rapt admiration into his companion's eyes—very fine eyes they were, too, of a deep sea blue, and well worthy of all the admiration that Reginald Oldroyd had in his power to offer.

It was evident that a conversation of more than usual importance was being carried on between the two, for the lady hastily turned away her face, gazing silently over the broad Atlantic, whenever any one strolled that way.

"Did you ever see such a young idiot?" said one of the smokers, indicating with the lift of an eyebrow the young couple at the rail.

"Don't know, I'm sure. Seems to be enjoying himself," said the other, flicking the ash off his cigarette.

"I knew Reggie at school, and even at that age one could see that he was just the sort of fellow to make a fool of himself over a woman."

"Oh, my prophetic soul!"

"He thinks that he is a man of the world, and he is as easily taken in as a child. I bet you he has swallowed every word that woman has crammed him with, and if he is not delivered in some miraculous manner, ten to one he will end by marrying her."

"And why not?"

"He will find himself in Queer Street if he does. Old Simon Oldroyd, his uncle, would cut him off with sixpence if he were to bring Mrs. Vavasour to Oldroyd Hall, and the poor fellow has nothing to fall back upon. Besides, the woman is really impossible. She is a divorcée, and I daresay she is coming to Europe with no other object than to cover up her past and provide for her future by marrying some rich young cub with more muscles than brains, and more money than muscles."

"Why don't you say all this to the man most interested?"

"So I will, after dinner to-night."

"Do you mean to do that?"

"I must. I could never face Reggie's mother again, if I were to see the poor fellow blundering on to his fate without interposing a word to save him."

If the speaker had at that moment been looking at his friend, he would have seen something like a suppressed smile hovering about the corners of his mouth. But Herbert Merivale was one of those happy people who have unlimited faith in the efficacy of their own sermons, and he seized the next opportunity of opening his mind to his friend.

Oldroyd was a giant of a fellow, tall and broad, with close-cropped yellow hair, and a fat good-natured smile. His smile vanished, however, as soon as the subject of his friend's address became clear to him. A frown that looked almost like the scowl of a petulant schoolboy, gathered upon his face. He listened in silence for some time, but at length he growled out:

"Drop it, Merivale!" in a tone there was no mistaking. "I know all you can tell me about that. I know that the facts have been grossly misrepresented. I have it on the best authority. Mrs. Vavasour's husband behaved like a blackguard. She is well rid of such a brute, and I am perfectly convinced—in fact, I may say I know—that from first to last in that wretched business Jul——I mean, Mrs. Vavasour, was not in the least to blame. And remember this, old man, if you and I are to remain friends, you must never breathe another word against the good name of that lady. Heavens, man! is the voice of slander to be taken for the sentence of a judge? Is it enough to accuse a woman for her to be deemed guilty? Is that your idea of justice? Merivale, I am ashamed of you!"

"You quite mistake me, my dear fellow," said Merivale placidly. "I brought no accusation against the lady. I merely mentioned some facts which are common knowledge, having been proved before the Divorce Court of Dacotah——"

"They divorce people for absolutely nothing in those regions!" interrupted Reggie.

"I dare say. I was merely asking you to look at the matter from a practical point of view. What will your uncle say to a marriage of this kind?"

A sensation as of a stream of ice-cold water ran down the young man's spinal column as those words entered his ears. Here was the fell shadow that had been haunting the chambers of his mind ever since he had first known that he was madly in love with Julia Vavasour. But Reggie did not care to discuss these matters even with an old friend like Merivale.

"I have no doubt that when my uncle knows Mrs. Vavasour he will admire her as much as I do," he said firmly. "But at any rate, would you not advise me to turn my back upon a woman just when she most needs the hand of—of a friend? That is not your idea of chivalry, is it, Merivale?"

"Reggie, you don't mean to say that you are such an idiot that you have gone and got engaged to that woman?" burst out Merivale.

Oldroyd withdrew his arm from that of his friend, and turning round confronted him in the moonlight. Merivale saw that his face was very pale.

"I must ask you not to speak in that way of the lady again," he said. "Mrs. Vavasour, who is in every possible way my superior, has at last consented to be my wife. I had not intended to mention the fact as yet, and I trust that you will regard this as said in confidence, but the fact is so, and—and won't you wish me joy, old man?" he concluded, his voice changing all of a sudden.

"I wish I could, but I can't —not in the way you mean," said his friend, and there the unsatisfactory conversation came to an end.

Of course the engaged couple were continually together, and the secret of their betrothal was a very open one indeed. They provided a gratis entertainment for the rest of the passengers, without being in the smallest degree conscious of the fact—at least, if the lady knew it, she concealed her knowledge admirably.

"I must go to Oldroyd Hall first, and prepare my uncle for the good news," said the enamoured Reginald as they parted at Liverpool. "I am sure it won't be long before you get an invitation to the Hall. If you aren't asked I won't go there again, let my mother say what she likes," added the young man with an air of defiance.

"Hush, my own! How can your uncle, or your mother (who, I am certain is the sweetest old lady in existence), like me till they have seen me? Don't be ridiculous, you foolish boy!"

"Do you know, Julie, I know it is very sweet and affectionate of you, and all that, but I would rather you didn't call me that quite so often. It makes a man feel ridiculous."

"My darling, as if there were a name on earth good enough and dear enough for you!"

Reginald would have kissed her on the spot, but there was no opportunity for an embrace, and he had to content himself with looking unutterable things.

Mrs. Vavasour was bent on seeing the Lake country, and Reggie insisted on staying behind to see her off to Penrith, while Merivale took the express to town, carrying the news with him.

* * * * *

A week went by, and seven honey-sweet love-letters had passed between the lovers. There was a great deal of affection but very little information in Reggie's epistles. The lady gathered, however, that the dreaded uncle had been informed of the fact of the engagement; but no invitation to Oldroyd Hall was forthcoming.

One afternoon as Mrs. Vavasour was reclining on the top of her bed—a luxury she was fond of enjoying after lunch—a knock came to her door. She jumped up and opened it, and there stood a waiter with a card on a salver. She snatched it up, and the colour rushed into her face as she read—Major Oldroyd—Horse Guards Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

She slipped half-a-crown into the man's hand.

"Take the gentleman into the little drawing-room, and try to manage so that we shan't be disturbed," she said to him with a smile.

She knew that male servants were always her slaves —with servants of her own sex it was otherwise—and she had little fear that the interview, on which so much was to depend, would be interrupted. For a moment Mrs. Vavasour stood before the mirror, and as she touched up her stray curls she looked into her own eyes and smiled. She thought that she would be equal to the subduing of Major Oldroyd. Certainly she was a remarkably pretty woman, with a delicate, pale complexion, dark silky hair, and the loveliest blue eyes in the world. Her nose, with its dainty tilt at the end, her cheeks, and her chin, were all bewitching. With a satisfied sigh she turned away from the mirror and went down to the little drawing-room.

A tall man with a military carriage stood at the further end of the room. He bowed stiffly as the lady entered, and then stood upright, as though he had been on parade.

"My nephew tells me he is engaged to you," began the Major abruptly, scarcely waiting till Mrs. Vavasour had seated herself. "I thought I might as well run down and tell you how things stand. It would be a cruel kindness to lead you to suppose that the marriage can ever take place. The fact is, my nephew has not a penny of his own in the world, and for him to get engaged was a piece of childish folly. I trust, madam, that you will look at the matter in a sensible light. You can't——"

"Sir, you are—you are too cruel!" murmured the lady, and she proceeded to cry in the most charming manner possible. The Major, frowning and uncomfortable, strutted up and down at the other end of the room, casting now and then sheep's eyes at the weeping figure on the sofa.

"My dear lady, don't—pray don't cry like this," he said, at last. "My nephew is a very decent young fellow, but, upon my word, you know, he isn't worth it."

At this the lady fired up.

"Do you suppose, sir," she exclaimed, "that a woman cannot be influenced by any but mercenary motives? Do you suppose I accepted your nephew for what he had to give me?"

"Certainly not, my dear madam. And the proof of it is that he has nothing in the world to give. But why should we not be friends, though we have a difference of opinion? Reginald, you know, is little more than a boy."

It was awkwardly expressed, but Mrs. Vavasour caught the Major's meaning, and smiled faintly.

"He is certainly very young," she murmured, "perhaps by-and-bye you will not refuse your consent to our engagement."

"No, madam, don't ask me to do that!" said Major Oldroyd; but the tone in which this was said was not by any means so austere as the words, and the lady blushed a little as she met the Major's eye.

The waiter had done his best, but he could not keep the other guests out of the room more than a few minutes. One or two ladies came in, and Major Oldroyd and Mrs. Vavasour affected to be engaged in an ordinary conversation, which they kept up for some time. They met at dinner, and after dinner they strolled side by side by the margin of the lake, and the subject of Reginald and his matrimonial hopes was not once mentioned between them.

The next day, and the next, the Major continued to be a guest at the hotel, and Mrs. Vavasour came to the conclusion that he was as much in love with her as ever his nephew had been. It was scarcely wonderful if the thought occurred to her—Why throw away the substance for the shadow? Why hang on to the nephew, and marry a man who might turn out a pauper, when she might become at one stroke the lady of Oldroyd Hall and the adjoining territory? Would it not be better, on the whole, to be Reginald's aunt than his wife?

As the uncle's attentions became more marked this view of the matter appealed more and more strongly to the practical nature of Mrs. Vavasour; and when one afternoon she made a final appeal to the Major not to withhold his consent any longer, and he answered with a look full of meaning: "If I found it hard to do that at first, it is impossible now," the lady made up her mind.

She wrote to Reginald by that night's post, and told him that she feared they had made a mistake. Not that she was not willing to wait for him any number of years, but she saw no prospect of their ever being married. His uncle was quite obdurate, quite impervious to every argument she could think of; and as they had neither of them any money, it was surely better to recognise the stern facts of the case. "Besides, my dear boy," she went on, "you know I am older, ever so much older than you are, and I have thought sometimes that I did you a cruel kindness when I consented to be yours. In a few years I shall be quite, quite an old woman, and then you will be glad that I found the strength to give you up. Do not try to see me, for my decision is quite irrevocable. Though it should break my heart, I must never see you again."
